7073. Are their sentences longer or shorter than ours?—They are longer, I think, as a rule. The recidivision in France does not depend so much on the sentence as upon this, that there is such great corruption in their associated-labour prisons. There is an enormous amount even of unnatural crime in French prisons.

7074. Are the French prisoners somewhat similar to ours in the local prisons, or the convict prisons?—They have central prisons and smaller local prisons.

7075. Long sentence prisoners and short sentence prisoners?—Yes.

7076. Do the long sentence prisoners work more in association than our convicts do?—In most French prisons they all work in association.

7077. Do the short sentence prisoners work in association?—Yes, except in a few individual cases. There is the separate prison of Mazas, in Paris, and another called "La Santé." There are very few separate prisons, and, generally speaking, all the prisoners in France work together.

7078. And also the long sentence prisoners?—Yes.

7079. Are they more in association than in our convict prisons, do you think?—Yes.

7080. And less watched?—Yes.

7081. And great evils arise?—Yes.

7082. Greater evils than in our prison service?—Yes. There is an enormous amount of unnatural crime. It is admitted by Dr. Laurent, who has had a great practice in French prisons, that that is a terrible feature, prevalent there, with associated imprisonment. I consider the French system of imprisonment one of the worst in the world.

7083. I would ask you the same question about Belgium. Is recidivision more common or less?—I think there is much less. They claim that it is so, at all events.

7084. Less than in England?—No, less than in France. I cannot say offhand with regard to Belgium, for this reason: that the Belgian statistics are very imperfect, and the Director-General of the Belgian Prisons is at this present moment preparing some statistics which will be ready soon. A friend of mine has lately been over to Belgium, and the Belgian Minister told him that; but we have not the Belgian statistics to refer to at present.

The witness withdrew.

The Committee adjourned for a short time.

Mr. W. Wheatley.

Mr. William Wheatley called and examined.

7085. (Chairman.) You are Superintendent of the St. Giles' Christian Mission?—That is so.

7086. How long have you been connected with that mission?—I have been in connexion with the mission for about 27 years.

7087. Were you the original founder of it?—No, Mr. Hatton was really the founder of the work.

7088. You have had experience for 27 years, and you have been intimately associated with the work of the mission?—That is so; from early morning until late at night.

7089. Will you tell the Committee what your relation to the prison system is?—Do you mean with reference to what I am doing?

7090. No. I mean under what conditions you have access to prisoners either before discharge or immediately after discharge?—Well, I must say that I have a little less now than I have had before. Although I have been at it for so many years I am told now that I must really take a back seat. My cards of invitation to discharged prisoners to partake of our free breakfast used to be given away inside the prison. So many prisoners first of all came to me and said that they had done this, that, and the other, and I considered it was a premium on crime for a man to boast about crime. I was the first man that went down to the prison gates to give the first breakfast away to discharged prisoners, so that I might actually see who those parties were, and to help them on their discharge.

7092. You do not get any Government grant?—Well, we have some thousands of pounds to pay the convicts on their discharge, that is to say, a convict going home this morning would come to me, and we should clothe him and look after him. Also his money would be paid some time in the course of a month for that man.

7093. The money he had earned in prison?—Yes.

7094. But the regular Government grant is paid annually?—We have never had any grant.

7095. Then you are not looked upon by the Government as a "prisoners' aid society"?—No. Ours is entirely voluntary work.

7096. Do you have access to prisoners before their discharge?—Yes.

7097. To what extent?—Well, if a man is going to be discharged, about a month before his time is up I might see that man; but I may tell you that that has only been done step by step. I first of all went outside the prison. Then, of course, the work was so recognised by the governors that I got inside the prison, and then I had leave to see a prisoner before he was discharged to see whether anything could be done for him on his liberation.

7098. When you say you got inside the prison, was that by the permission of individual governors?—It was by asking the governor, and then after that there was a delay, and then I had an answer that I could do so, but now I have a letter from the Home Office to say I cannot.

7099. I understand that your application to a particular governor would be referred by them to the Prison Commissioners?—I should imagine that would be so.

7100. Perhaps you will read that letter to the Committee?—

"Sir, 6th November 1894.

"I am directed by the Secretary of State to inform you that certain difficulties have arisen with regard to the privilege hitherto enjoyed by officers of the St. Giles' Christian Mission, of being admitted within the gates of Her Majesty's Prison at Wandsworth, for the purpose of offering tickets of invitation to free breakfasts to prisoners about to be discharged, and that, in consequence, he has been compelled with great reluctance to direct that for the future this privilege must be withdrawn, and that no officer of any society is to be admitted within the prison gates for such a purpose. Mr. Asquith desires me, however, to assure you that this step has been taken not because the privilege which you have hitherto enjoyed has been in any way abused by your mission, but because he finds it necessary to make a rule which will be applicable to the officers of all societies alike.

"I am, Sir,
"Your obedient Servant,
"Godfrey Lushington."

7101. (Sir Algernon West.) What is the date of that?—It is dated the 6th of November of this year, but I have other letters as late as this morning.

7102. From the Home Office?—Well, that is to say, that the governors of the prisons are of course only carrying out the order of the Home Office, and that now instead of my tickets being given away in the prison they are not. First of all, when there was no breakfast, I started myself outside the prison to give the breakfast away, because I did not want people coming to me boasting that they had done this, that, or the other, with the idea of getting charity. I said it was the wrong idea to give charity to anybody who boasted of crime; but, on the contrary, if they would hide their crime, and wanted to do right, I thought I should like to help them. Then I went to the prison gates, and the whole of the governors are exceedingly kind at the present time. I have not a word to say against them, and, of course, I can quite understand that it may be that someone wanting to have the same privileges might be debarred of those privileges. Of course I consider that to some extent I am now just starting where I commenced, and although I have gone on for years finding favour in the sight of the authorities, yet by this act I now have to begin outside instead of inside. I might say that the officers were allowed for some time past to give tickets to the discharged prisoners. A man may be received, say, to-day, from the magistrates, and when he comes in custody I suppose his clothes would be received by the reception officer. That reception officer, I imagine, gives out the same clothes again, so that there should be no mistake, and he has been given one of our tickets for breakfast to give to that person. It saves all commotion. There is no nonsense about it and they come to us. The Prison Commissioners are exceedingly kind in allowing us a little place on the prison grounds. We have one at Wandsworth and one at Holloway. I should be very sorry if I was deprived of that, because when men sit down and have breakfast (and sometimes people come from a long distance to meet them), I ask those people to come in if I know they are really their friends, and I give them a word of advice, and ask them whether they think it is right to pursue a downward course. I should be sorry if by reading this letter I had the privilege withdrawn. We pay 4*s.* a year for a piece of ground in the prison grounds to put our house on, both at Holloway and also at Wandsworth.

7104. Now when they ask, is permission always given?—Hitherto it has been. I have not been debarred hitherto, but I believe now, that if I want to see a prisoner, I cannot. If the sister of a prisoner was to come to me to-day say, for instance, from Bonner Road, as one of the nurses from the children's home at Bonner Road came to me to-day, and said that her brother was in prison and had got three months for a forgery in the City, well I have always been in the habit of seeing such a man as that, and seeing whether we could make some arrangement for him on his liberation.

7105. Have you ever had any association with other societies existing for much the same purpose?—I am afraid when I am up at half-past five in the morning and stick to it until the last thing at night, that I have not time to understand what other societies are doing. When a magistrate asks me to take a boy I take the boy. It may be that while I am here to-day the magistrates may send two boys to me, one from one court and one from another court. We have sufficient to do all day long and I say let other societies work in their own order.

7106. Can you suggest to the Committee any scheme which you think would work well for the purpose of giving equal advantages to all bonâ fide societies interested in giving help to discharged prisoners?—I see no reason why any bonâ fide society should not have that.

7107. Do you think it would be as well to give free access to representatives of societies on their application?—I am afraid that is the cause of my position this morning.

7108. How do you mean?—I am afraid that on account of others I have been deprived of the privilege. Perhaps the authorities may have acted wisely; perhaps they have acted unwisely. That I cannot say, but it may be they can see there is a hitch in the way by allowing too many societies into the prisons and therefore they say to me "you must do as you at first "did and give your tickets away outside, because of "course, we shall have to serve other societies the "same as we serve you."

7109. What is the answer of that position is taken up?—Of course if that position is taken up, I must submit to it. If they tell me to do a thing I must do it.

7110. Do you think there is a danger in prison of prisoners finding that various societies are competing in their attentions to them?—You know as well as I do, Sir, that the lower classes of prisoners are exceedingly crafty and it might be that they might say, "It "is no use going to Mr. Wheatley; he knows too "much of us." "Why?" Because I have been so many years engaged in this work that I would not relieve a man unless I thought it would help him to help himself. Then new societies are coming in and the prisoners go to them. Still I do not think that is a reason why they should not have the opportunity of doing some good.

7111. Then to prevent the prisoners taking an undue advantage of the societies, that is, of going from one to the other and getting as much as they can from one and all without any intention of reforming themselves, it would be necessary to have some organisation which should bring those societies into touch with each other?—Well we always keep a book of every case.

7112. But is not it necessary that the different societies which have more or less access to the prisons or the prisoners, all working more or less independently in one way, but for the same general object should be in touch with each other. Would it not be as well for all those different societies to be in touch with each other so that they should not be swindled one after the other?—Yes, for instance, if I have a case come to me to-day which I can see has gone to the "Royal Aid Society," I say I cannot touch the case. The man may say, "I will go to the magistrate," and he may go and make a complaint to the magistrate; but my answer to the magistrate would be that that man was to be passed through the "Royal Aid Society" or some other society, and that I should not touch it.

7114. Would that list be open to all societies?—I do not know whether that would be so, but certainly we have a list; I asked many years ago for a list from the police, the police have a list of all who are going home. You know that all men if they are going to London are simply lodgers at Pentonville for three or four days while the police see them and give them instruction what they are to do if they are on license. That being so, we get a list of those men who are going home whether they are going to the "Royal Aid Society," or whether they are going to the "St. Giles' Christian Mission," or whether they are going to any society at all.

7115. (Sir Algernon West.) Have you any observations to make upon the present distribution of the Government grant?—No, I know very little about that.

7116. You have not studied that?—No, I must confess that as a mechanic I am very bad at figures; for 12½ years, of course, I gave voluntary time to this work and I was asked to take this good work in hand.

7117. You have had great experience of all classes of criminals?—I have.

7118. Now with regard to juveniles?—I have had a very large experience of juveniles, and at present I have 140 boys in our four boys' homes.

7119. From the prisons?—Yes, and I think I might say that I had a great deal to do with Mr. Howard Vincent in the preparation of the "First Offenders Act." He takes the chair at our next meeting, which will be held on the evening of Wednesday, 5th of December, at the Mission Chapel, Little Wild Street, Drury Lane, and there the members of the Committee, if they will come, would see those boys who will receive rewards. Those cases are brought from the magistrates. At Holloway I have got access to the boys' prison.

7120. But do you say these boys are brought from the magistrate?—The boys are remanded from the courts.

7121. To your school?—No, to the prison, and while they are in prison I see them. I write to the magistrate to say that I have seen those boys in prison, and from the conversation I have had with them I shall be glad to assist the boy, if it is the wish of the magistrate. Then, instead of wasting any time, the police help us in the case, because the very constable that takes them up in charge also brings them down on the direction of the magistrate. We get some 500 boys of that description in our "Boys' Home" in the course of a year. These boys will receive a reward at our next meeting, and you will be able to see them yourselves. What do we do with these boys? We advertise all the year round for situations. A man comes and says, "I see you have got our advertise-"ment in. Now what kind of boys are these"? Well, I say, "They are boys that can eat"; he looks at me with surprise first of all; then I say, "If a boy "can eat he can work." We feed these boys and the wages are taken by us; we become security for them to the employers, and the person taking them has to sign a paper to say he knows the whole facts. If we had a boy from Mr. De Rutzen we should say he came from such-and-such a court. We clothe the lad and feed him, and give him pocket-money, and we put money into the bank for him so that when he goes away he is better off than he was when he first came to us.

7122. Then what is your view of the present system with regard to juveniles?—Well, I think there should be great care that no boy under any pretence whatever is allowed to associate with an old criminal, because for a certainty the old criminal never intends to work; his business is really to keep on in the way he has gone on before. Imprisonment is no punishment to him; and I am satisfied that if that boy could be really kept out of the prison there could be some way of dealing with them, and that some of the magistrates might be able to do something without these boys being really sent to prison. I know they do it to a large extent, but I think if those boys could be kept from going to prison first of all and bound over to come up to receive sentence if called upon, at the direction of the magistrate, you may be quite sure that that would be a much better thing than sending these boys to prison in the first instance.

7123. Would you be in favour of raising the age for reformatories from 16 to 18?—As far as age is concerned some boys of 17 or 18 know more of criminal life than others do at 35; therefore it wants someone who is acquainted with these things to separate them; some of these lads are equally as much in crime as a man is at 35.

7124. And I suppose you say there would be greater danger of contamination between these young fellows than between a young fellow and an old fellow?—Yes, that is why I say we want to have a first prison for first offenders, old or young, and that the prison should be sufficiently large. I suppose in London we get 25 per cent. of the prisoners.

7125. You mean your society does?—No, taking the number of prisoners altogether I suppose London would have 25 per cent. of those prisoners. Therefore I do not think it would be difficult for one prison to be set apart for first offenders, old and young, and if the prison be sufficiently large the governors might really separate the old from the young.

7126. (Chairman.) Assuming that there was sufficient classification in the reformatories to provide for the separation of different classes would you be in favour of raising the age from 16 to 18?—Yes, and I am strongly in favour of more ships. We doubtless want more ships. There are ships which of course could be really got for that purpose. Some boys you may try and do all you possibly can with, and they seem bent on going wrong, so that it would be a very good thing if there was a ship to put those boys on, so that they could not afterwards be a pest even to the very missions whose notice they are brought under. There are plenty of institutions now, but I fear there are not sufficient ships. If a magistrate makes an application to the "Cornwall" or some of these other vessels, they will perhaps find that there are only vacancies for one or two.

7127. Do you think that the question of prison labour is a very important one?—Very. I consider if a lad is in from the Post Office and that lad grows up to be a man, that having committed himself he has not had an opportunity while he was a boy of learning a business; and I consider that when you send that boy to prison you should teach him one. Now it is altered; but for a Post Office case they used to give five or seven years' penal servitude. What is the result? Does he come out any better? He does not come out any better. He does not learn anything; he has not had the opportunity, because he has been simply a messenger when he was a boy. I say we ought to have mechanics in our prisons as warders and thorough mechanics, so that when people come out they shall be better than when they went in.

7128. You have had enormous experience of course, in speaking to prisoners when they come out?—Yes.

7129. Do they speak freely to you on the subject of prison labour?—Yes.

7130. What do you think of what is called unproductive labour including the crank and the mill?—Well, it really is useless. The labour at the present time in prisons is useless, and therefore until you can really make a prison a place of reformation and an instructive institution you will do no good.

7131. What do the prisoners say? Do they say they hate that kind of work?—No, I do not know that they hate that kind of work. They do not express themselves that way, but we know for a fact that when they come out there is some difficulty because they come out of prison with no experience at all. Now if Smith is taken away from Jones, that is to say, if Smith is working for Mr. Jones, when Smith gets into prison, then if it is practical at all, why should not he work inside the prison as he would have done out? Why could not part of his labour go towards supporting his wife and children?

7132. Would Mr. Jones care for that?—He has learned his business. It is not robbing Mr. Jones. I am looking at it now at a mechanic and in a business light. He is taken away from Mr. Jones not because he robbed Mr. Jones; or it may be that he did rob Mr. Jones and he is taken away; why should not he work at something what would be profitable, so that his wife might receive part of it. She is the greatest sufferer in nine cases out of ten. We know that from our visitors.

7133. Of course there are great difficulties in that?—I follow that, because the outside people would at once say "Oh! they are doing this in prison. They "are robbing us of our labour outside;" but we are not robbing them of their labour outside. This man, say, for instance, is a smith, and why should not he work at that work in prison as well as out. What I think is wrong is this, that a contractor goes in and buys the prison labour at such a price that other people cannot compete with him; but if this work were done in prison, and things were sold in a right and legitimate way, I do not see where it would come in in that way.

7134. You think at any rate rate it is of the greatest use to prisoners to put them on more profitable work?—Decidedly so.

7135. What is your opinion of associated work in prison, I mean working together in a shop as against working individually in their cells?—Well as far as that goes I am not so wonderfully in favour of association in prisons; but I do think that if these people had thorough mechanics over them they would be more engaged in their work, they would be more interested in their work, they would go on with it with some pleasure and would go out better men to my thinking.

7136. Do you think that the present practice of giving short sentences to habitual criminals is an evil?—I do not think it is any good. As far as that goes if a man is determined to do wrong and to manufacture criminals I certainly do not think that we are doing a great deal of good by giving him his liberty to start on the same thing again.

7137. Would you be in favour of a system of cumulative punishments?—Well I can hardly answer that question.

7138. Do not you find that there are a considerable number of criminals who pursue a life of crime?—Decidedly.

7139. Upon the knowledge that if they do not go beyond a certain crime they will probably get something like six months' hard labour, after which they can go out and prosecute crime as before?—Take for instance the case of a coiner. If once a man commences coining and starts at that, especially if he is a maker, the chances are that he never leaves it off. The only thing is that he has not a chance of making coins in prison or I believe he would even make it there.

7140. A coiner would probably receive a severe sentence. I am alluding to a class of people who are principally thieves and pickpockets who go on practising their vocation and do not allow a temporary retirement of a few months' in prison to interfere with them. To that class of men imprisonment for three months or six months is no deterrent at all. Is that your opinion?—It all depends on the home where the boy lives and the home surroundings. A lad may first of all start in that way with companions, but I say let the young one down light, though I have not the slightest sympathy with letting a man pursue a system of crime.

7141. (Mr. De Rutzen.) Do I understand that this letter which I have just handed in stops you now from going into prison under any circumstances?—Well I do not know whether it will amount to that, I do not think at present that it does, but it amounts to this that I am not now allowed to do that which I have had the privilege of doing. For instance, I cannot take out a bundle of tickets to-day for to-morrow and ask the officer to give them out. I used to be allowed to give these tickets away inside, but now I must give them away outside. The order now is that we must not go inside and give these things away.

7142. Then you stay outside, and do not go inside now?—That is for these breakfast tickets.

7143. What you used to do prior to that letter was to go in and see any of the boys who happened to be there, either just before their discharge, or those who were there on remand?—Yes.

7144. As a matter of fact, I suppose there is a great number sent to prison simply on remand?—Yes, that may be so.

7145. Perhaps you have had a communication from a magistrate to know whether you will see a certain boy in prison, or not?—That is it.

7146. And when you receive a communication of that sort, you make it your business to go and see that boy?—That is so.

7147. At the only place where he can be kept at present?—That is so.

7148. He is too old for the workhouse, and, therefore, the prison is the only place to send him?—Yes.

7149. Now you say that you are now stopped from going to see that class of prisoner, owing to that order from the Home Secretary?—No, I do not think it has come to that; they have not stopped me from seeing those boys, but I fear from what I can see of this, that this is only the stepping stone towards coming to that sort of thing.

7150. Then so far as your usefulness in that direction is concerned, you are not stopped from seeing these boys in prison?—Not at present. Of course, I speak now to you gentlemen as a committee, and I say that I do hope that you will say that, knowing the time our work has been carried on, we shall have the liberty to see these boys as before.

7151. I was rather anxious to find out the fact that you are not debarred, at any rate, from seeing them at present. You are not debarred from seeing that class of boy in a prison, who is simply sent there for detension while some provision is being made for his future?—No.

7152. I should rather hope you will not be stopped from doing that?—I thought that the letter came at a very awkward time, and I was very anxious that you should know how the thing was, because I do not think we ought to be stopped.

7153. Do you know at all the number of voluntary homes there are in London for boys?—I do not.

7154. There is an immense number of them?—There is.

7155. Are you inclined to think, there are too many?—I do not think so, not genuine ones. There may be people who jump, and say they are going to do this, that, and the other, but the public should look into that, and see that they are not giving their money to those societies which are not useful.

7156. There are a class of prisoners you used to go down and visit in the gaol, and you could provide them with work or something of that kind when they came out?—Yes.

7157. That is the principle on which you go now?—That is so.

7158. What is the proportion even of those to whom you kindly make the offer who avail themselves of it, or rather, what is the proportion of those who refuse it?—Well that is rather a difficult question, I should say of the boys, we are saving 90 per cent.

7159. But does that take in those particular cases I have alluded to, in which the magistrate will say, "Will you take an interest in them as I desire that "something should be done for their future"?—That is so.

7160. You cannot say now, of the general number you visit, how many go into your home?—We have a home for 50 men, we have a home for 150 boys, but then they are entirely separated from one another, and yet they are within a stone's-throw; but no man is allowed under any pretence whatever to have anything to do with the boys' home.

7161. We have had evidence to this effect, that some people would prefer the boys having punishment by imprisonment, before they receive them into a home or a reformatory. What would be your view about that?—I do not see where it comes in.

7162. You would not?—No, distinctly not. Of course I think if you bind a boy over, and that boy breaks faith with you after you hand him over to us, and if he is determined not to do well you cannot do much with him. For instance, if I got him a situation and then another situation, and he does not do well, there is not much hope for him. I should have about 200 places to get for these 150 boys; first of all there is a difficulty in getting a boy to start work; he has not been used to it in some cases.

7163. You have had some communications made to you sometimes I suppose with reference to boys who are hardly fitted for work?—I have got now a boy of that sort, I intended to bring the magistrate's letter which said, would I take this boy who had been examined by the medical man at the prison, and found unfit for heavy work, that is to say, he would not pass the doctor. At the same time we have taken that boy, and we have taken several of those boys including some who were on crutches, I say we ought to help them. If we take funds we ought to try and help them, because they cannot really help themselves, and in those cases I am putting them at tailoring. We make the whole of the boots for these boys, and of course the clothing for the men coming home from penal servitude. When a man goes into penal servitude his clothes are taken away and sold under the hammer, and the consquence is that we make the clothes for these convicts when they come out, and we take private orders; but where we take private orders we pay fair prices for the work.

7164. Do you think about three of these crippled boys in a year would probably be about the number that would come to your house?—You would know better about that, sir, than I do, as you are one of the magistrates that send them to me.

7165. You have had applications made to you to take boys who are unfitted for industrial training?—Yes, and we do not hestitate to take them; we have taken some that we know other people would not take; they cannot help themselves.

7167. Prisoners no doubt they are, but they are in no sense criminals; I am speaking of a great many of the remand cases?—I find sometimes there are boys there who have been convicted four or five times, but on account of their age they are put in the boys' part. That is why it wants someone to separate them and see that a lad who is vicious is not mixed up with a child from, perhaps, a respectable family.

7168. That is your experience when you have paid your visits from time to time inside the gaol, and have found them so?—Yes.

7169. Are they in separate cells?—Yes.

7170. They are kept apart in that way?—They are kept apart, barring at exercise.

7171. And then at exercises they can all see and talk to each other; at all events they can all recognise each other?—Well, it is impossible to keep them otherwise, perhaps, if you have got three men to take charge of 100 men, although their eyes may be open.

7172. Have you got any kind of suggestion to make as to what should be done with boys of that description who are simply sent there for the purpose of detention until something can be done for them?—I think if boys were really brought before the magistrate and not sent to prison, but simply handed over to some institution, it would be better. There are plenty of institutions. If those institutions could report on them after an experience of three months or six months or nine months, I think it would be useful.

7173. What institutions are you alluding to?—I think the magistrate should use all the institutions which they consider right and proper institutions.

7174. Can you suggest any that you could be certain would take them in. No order could be made for it?—No, not at present.

7175. But you would suggest that there should be some place other than a prison to which boys could be sent?—Yes, to a place of detention which was not called a prison at all.

7176. That would be something new?—And yet not new, because you had a place of detention once, which was not called a prison.

7177. It is a distinction without a difference, I am afraid; it may be called a "house of correction" or a "house of detention," but still it is a prison?—Yes.

7178. Would you suggest any place that could be made available for that purpose?—There seem to be many places which are being pulled down, which, of course, might really have been made use of.

7179. You get employment for most of your boys?—Yes.

7180. What is the length of time which you keep them?—That depends upon circumstances; for instance, if a mother came and said, Well, cannot I have my boy back again; we say, Yes, if he goes on allright for 6 or 12 months, and you can show that you can do something better for him than we are doing. But we cannot keep these boys.

7181. Do you know a place in Chancery Lane where they ship boys on board smacks if they express a wish to go to sea?—I know that there is some such place, but there is no institution.

7182. (Sir Algernon West.) Is not that in Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields?—Yes, that is Mr. Williams's. They go to the "Shaftesbury" now. They have a training vessel, but their vessel is generally full. It is one thing for a lad to ask you to send him to sea, and another thing to find a ship to put him on. Many people say they will do this that and the other, but the thing is "can they do it?"

7183. (Mr. De Rutzen.) You have found out in your experience that there is a great difficulty in providing for boys who express a desire to go to sea?—There is.

7184. And who are fitted for it?—Yes, and by that means I started a plan which has not been touched upon; that is to issue a policy with every boy, and to make the person we issue the policy to, sign that they know the whole of the facts of the case as to that boy. We are responsible for some thousands of pounds with regard to these boys in the course of a year, but I am bound to say we do not have to pay a great deal.

7185. (Dr. Bridges.) Have you found some difficulty in getting boys admitted into reformatories? Have you had anything to do with that?—As a rule I never recommend unless it is to a ship, and then I generally find when I get them examined by a doctor at the prison that in many cases they are not fitted, and that in other cases the ship is full.

7186. Is there a difficulty sometimes in disposing of boys who have some physical defect?—Yes.

7188. What do you do with them?—We have arranged for that; we have a home and we have arranged to meet that. We have arranged for hammocks and that sort of thing to meet that difficulty, and sometimes they grow out of it.

7190. Are they below it?—Yes, I think so.

7191. Do you find many of them stupid or ignorant men?—No, I do not know that; some of them I find are a great deal too sharp, that is, too sharp for themselves.

7192. You do not find much defect in their brain power?—No.

7193. It is rather that their physical power is weak; is that what you mean?—Yes.

7194. How long do you keep them in your homes?—It all depends.

7195. What is the longest time?—Well, a lad may be with us perhaps for two years, while another lad perhaps might not be with us for more than 12 months, and another for not more than six months. It is according to the circumstances. If we find that the parents are respectable people, after we get them a place, and that we could trust them to go with them, we make an arrangement with them.

7196. Have you many runaways from your home?—Yes, several, but still not so many as you might expect, taking into consideration the number we have.

7197. Unless they run away you always provide for them in some way or other?—Yes, when we have a boy we find him work, food, clothing, and pocket money, and he has his liberty in the evening, but he must be in by 9 o'clock, and on Sunday he must be at some place of worship.

7198. (Sir Algernon West.) Have you any suggestion to make as to any place in the country where these boys might be sent so as to deal with the runaway boys?—I would suggest a training on a vessel; for instance, I may have a boy whom a magistrate has committed to my care, and if he leaves my place probably he finds his way to another police court. I would see him in the prison and I would write to the magistrate and say, "This boy was under my care, so-"and-so, and under these circumstances I think that "that boy would be just the boy to be put on board "a ship to be trained for the navy or for some "vessel."

7199. Is the industrial school ship usually full?—Well, I think the magistrates are able to answer that question better than I can. I asked for a vessel for a long time, and Mr. Howard Vincent advised me to do so, but at that time there was no opportunity for doing so. We are now paying the Prudential Assurance Company for a place for these boys 500*l.* a year rent. It is just off Holborn.

7200. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You think the industrial schools are nearly all full?—Yes.

7201. And it is the same at Liverpool?—As a rule we find that there is not sufficient room.

7202. Your impression is that there might be more industrial school ships?—I think so.

7203. (Mr. De Rutzen.) The runaways that you allude to in your answer are generally a class of boys who are to be found about the railway stations?—Yes, the wanderers.

7204. And it is in consequence of the love for the life they have been leading close to your place that they run away. Numbers of instances no doubt come into your mind where as soon as you get them they run away and are caught again at the place where they were originally caught, and so they go on?—That is it.

7205. It is simply because you cannot take them away from their old surroundings?—You can do nothing with them.

7206. (Chairman.) Can you tell me why there are so many aid societies? In the Prison Commissioners' report in connection with Wormwood Scrubs there are no less than eight, whereas there are only three at Wandsworth, one at Pentonville, and four at Holloway?—Well, I do not know; but I should advise some of these other societies that want to get in to go to Wormwood Scrubs. There are other societies, I believe, at the present time which are really wanting to go there, but I do not think there is any more done at Wormwood Scrubs than anywhere else.

The witness withdrew.

Colonel Buchanan called and examined.

7207. (Chairman.) You are the Secretary for the Royal Society for the Assistance of Discharged Prisoners?—Yes.

7208. I think you have been secretary for eight years?—Yes.

7209. Will you briefly describe to the Committee the constitution of the Society?—Would it be interesting to you to know the origin of it?

7210. I do not think that is so necessary as the actual constitution bearing on its work?—The society was founded in 1857. It was really founded when transportation was done away with; Mr. Samuel Whitbread and the late Mr. Bayne Ranken were the founders of it. It was then intended entirely for convicts, in fact, up to the time when I became secretary it was almost exclusively for convicts. Since that we have enlarged the work, and we became two years ago, at the instance of the Commissioners of Prisons, the society for Wormwood Scrubs; and we have enlarged our work also by extending it a great deal to the local prisons, especially those bordering on the neighbourhood of London and in the Home Counties. The Society is managed by a committee, that is to say, the committee meets once a month for the reception of reports and for deciding any very important matter, but every day, of course, I am at the office, and one member of the committee attends with me to receive and interview the men as they are brought out for discharge, and to deal with each case on its own merits.

7211. Do you see all the discharged prisoners at Wormwood Scrubs?—Every one of them who are to be discharged to our care. I see them twice. I go every Friday to Wormwood Scrubs Prison and interview the men in their cells, and consult them about their future, and so on. If possible, I get the addresses of their wives, mothers, or fathers. Then I send one of my agents, generally speaking, a female agent, to visit them, and get all the information I can so that we may be better prepared to deal with these cases when they come out.

7212. Then have you free access to prisoners?—Yes, that is with the sanction of the Commissioners; I go every Friday. I get there at half-past 2, and I am passed into the prison and taken round by the assistant chief warder to see the men in their cells. I do not go into their own cells, I go to special cells in each hall, and the men are brought to me by the assistant chief warder.

7213. But then you have got standing authority to go to the prison?—Yes, every Friday.

7215. But there are seven others associated with you in the work?—Well, I was not aware there were so many as seven. I know there are one or two, but I think the far larger proportion of the men seek our help rather than that of any other society. Although I may not be right in that I imagine it is so. I understood from the chief warder that a larger number seek our aid than that of all the rest of the societies put together.

7216. Would the representatives of other societies have the same authority to go into the prison that you have?—I do not know that. I know Mr. Wheatley has the same right that we have, but whether other societies have I do not know.

7217. Mr. Wheatley thinks he has had a letter from the Home Office this month, curtailing his privileges?—I do not think it is likely we should have our privilege curtailed, because we took Wormwood Scrubs Prison over at the request of the Commissioners. Although I should be glad to extend our work, this particular work is not very desirable, because the men from Wormwood Scrubs are the most difficult in the kingdom for a Prisoners' Aid Society to help.

7218. What grant do you get from the Government?—We have, so far, got 40 guineas last year; 40 guineas this year, and that meets about half our expenditure, roughly.

7219. Do you know of any other societies attached to Wormwood Scrubs receive a Government grant?—I cannot tell that.

7220. Have you any experience as to how the Government grant is distributed generally?—Before being appointed Aid Society to Wormwood Scrubs Prison, my society never applied for the Government grant at all. The work that has been done up to that point has been without a Government grant.

7221. Then upon what basis is the 40 guineas paid? Is it at per head?—I think it is according to the number of the cases dealt with. I think so; that is my impression, but I do not know for certain.

7222. Then you see nearly all the prisoners?—I think the form of procedure is this: that a certain number of men who are desirous, we hope, of leading a better life, and of starting afresh, apply to us. These men see the governor, about a fortnight before they are discharged; I go on a Friday; their names are entered on a sheet, and that sheet is submitted to me when I go, and I interview these men one by one. I only reject those men whom the Society has assisted during the previous 12 months, and men whose conduct in prison has been very bad; such men, for instance, as those who have refused to work in the prison and have been insubordinate, and have been insolent to the warders, and so on. I think it is only fair to refuse such men as those.

7223. You are quite independent of those other societies, and you are not brought into relation with them?—We work in co-operation with a great many societies, but we are independent of them; we are not affiliated with any of them.

7224. In what way do you work in co-operation?—Roughly, I should think we work in co-operation with 20 of the leading societies in England, that is to say, whenever they want work found for men in London they write and send them to me, and I do my best to find them work; and in the case of those societies which we will call the home counties, that is to say, Surrey, Essex, Kent, Berkshire, Hertfordshire, and Hampshire, we are constantly receiving men from them. We take men from those societies; we provide them with work which these societies have not the same facilities for doing that we have. For instance, if they wanted a man shipped they probably could not ship him, and, therefore, they send him to us.

7225. Do you think it is a matter of importance to your work to be able to see prisoners before their discharge?—Certainly; it is the greatest help possible, not that the information given by the prisoners is of any great value. It may be sometimes, but the information of real value is the address of a man's relations. I send a very capable agent to visit them. She thoroughly understands the whole of what I want to learn, she visits their relatives, and gives me very valuable information about them which helps me immensely.

7226. You said that you had a very bad class of prisoners at Wormwood Scrubs?—Yes, I have, I think, the worst. From my own experience I should take them to be the worst class; perhaps Wandsworth may be almost as bad. I can speak of Wandsworth to a limited extent, but I should think those from Wormwood Scrubs are the worst class of prisoners we have in England.

7227. For what reason?—They are London thieves and fellows who have been mixed up all their lives, practically from birth, with the lowest possible people, whereas if a man comes from a country prison in an agricultural district he is a different kind of man altogether.

7228. Of course you get the men apart and help them in a variety of ways?—Yes.

7229. Are the general results of you work satisfactory?—I should like to say that one point we lay great stress upon is that we try to separate men, as far as possible, from their old surroundings. We have found that there is a chance, and a very great chance, even for the worst men, even for the men whom I have described as being at Wormwood Scrubs. There is very often a good chance even for them. I can tell you of wonderful instances of men being quite reformed, and leading, at any rate, honest lives, by the fact of having been taken away from their old surroundings, and put into a new district altogether. I can give you a remarkable instance of a man who was a coiner, and I need hardly tell you that a man who once takes up the life of a coiner is the most difficult man to reform there is. It is very easy to make money as a coiner.

He makes large sums of money, and these men form a kind of coterie in London. They have a sort of club, and they are all known to each other, and it is an old police saying, "Once a coiner, always a coiner." If once a man has become a coiner, he always will be a coiner. A coiner was discharged to our care. He was quite a young fellow. I was rather favourably impressed with his appearance. He did not look quite so hardened as many of them are. I took him into my own private room and talked to him about the misery of his life, both now and hereafter. At first he did not show much signs of caring, but after a little while I talked to him about his mother, and so on, and I think he was a little softened; at all events, he said, "Now, sir, I will do whatever you ask me." While I was speaking to him, one of my agents came in and said, "There is a gang downstairs who "have an unmistakeable look of being coiners," and one of them, whom I knew is waiting downstairs for the fellow. I said to him, "Put yourself in our "hands and we will do what we can for you." I waited until these men had gone into the public-house at dinner time, and I then sent for a four-wheeler, and put this man into it, and told my agent to take him to Euston. I sent him to our shipping agent at Liverpool, and wrote saying, "We are "anxious about this young fellow; get him ship-"ped as soon as you can." He went away as a coal trimmer to Buenos Ayres. He has come to see me since three times, and is a prosperous man. He showed me a Post Office Savings Bank account with 30*l.* in it. He said, "That is honest money, sir; that "is the first honest money I have ever earned." I said, "I hope you are not going back to your old "habits." He said, "No. There was a man with "me in my last case, and he came to me just now in "the street. He said he did not know exactly what "I had been doing lately, and asked me to go with him, "and I said to him, 'No, I will not come with you; "'you come with me. My life is a happy life; I am "'not afraid to look anybody in the face, whether they "'are police or anybody else. My skipper is a good "'fellow, and he has told me I could take you with "'me.' Now, sir, I am going to take him back "again to-night and ship him with me." That is to me an enormously happy case and proves that the worst men, and the men who are surrounded by the worst characters in London can sometimes be turned.

7230. Do you think that your difficulties with men increase as they become habitual offenders?—Yes, very, very much, in fact, when they become habitual offenders the work of a Prisoners' Aid Society is not much good.

7231. But I suppose there comes a time in the lives of an habitual offender when he gets sick of crime, say when he is 50 years old. Do you find that?—No, that is not my experience at all.

7232. You find the habitual offender is hopeless?—I think the receivers of stolen goods and the coiners are the two worst of habitual offenders, and most dangerous to the community, and they are dreadful corruptors of the young. These fellows are incorrigible, and nothing short of a man having a serious illness, and his mind being turned will ever have any effect in turning him. They have no fear of imprisonment, because it is abundantly clear that the convict prison has no terror for them, and they do not mind it in the slightest degree. Many of the chaplains in the convict prisons have told me that these men have told them in the most plain way that they are going back to their old life as soon as they are free.

7233. Then what is true in that respect with regard to convict prisons would be à fortiori true as to local prisons?—I do not think quite so much.

7234. I mean if they have no dread of convict prisons they would have no dread of local prisons?—Pardon me, the work in a convict prison is less, and the food is better.

7236. There are a great number of prisoners in local prisons who are really habitual prisoners?—Yes.

7237. And the local prison loses its terror for them?—Yes.

7238. They get accustomed to it, they are in for six months perhaps, and they go out for a life of crime of 18 months say?—Yes.

7239. I am rather speaking of that class. Do you find it difficult to deal with them?—Well, it depends very much indeed upon circumstances. I should be sorry to speak of them as a body collectively, because it would be misleading, but there are individuals who, owing to some cause or another do make up their minds. A man may have four or five sentences, and to all intents and purposes, to the police, and to us he may be looked upon as an habitual criminal, and yet, for some reason, that man may have turned over a new leaf and be really desirous of leading an honest life.

7240. Do you consider that the giving of short sentences to these habitual criminals is a mistake?—Well, I should be entirely in favour of short sentences for some things, but, on the other hand, there is one point I should very much like to endeavour to impress upon you, though very feebly, I am afraid. It is a subject I have thought about nearly all the time I have been secretary to this society. It is that there are a certain class of criminals who are very well known to all the detective police, men of the most dangerous possible kind—men, for the most part fairly well educated—perhaps even well educated, clever men; and if they had turned their attention to any other branch of life they would have been good members of society, but they become coiners, receivers of stolen goods, and men who are the heads of gangs and instructors of the young. As to those men (I speak it with all respect), it seems to me that in a civilised country it is a perfect scandal that these people should be allowed to be at large at all. They do an infinity of harm. Nobody can tell what mischief they do; I am sure I do not exaggerate at all when I say that a man who is a receiver of stolen goods, or a coiner, would corrupt a very large number of young fellows a year during the time he was out. I should think that is not at all an exaggeration.

7241. These men have themselves been in prison, I suppose?—Yes, though there may be instances where they have not. I know of one instance where there is one of the worst men in England, and one of the most dangerous men; that is to say, he is a forger of bills and a receiver of stolen goods, but he has never been in prison. The police have been trying to catch him for years, but he is too clever for them. Such men as that, if they are once caught, and if they are known to the police to have been carrying on these practices for years, ought either to be sent to prison for a long period, or they ought to be put under police supervision, or banished to some place where they cannot do these things.

7242. Does that class of man get hold of young people who have not been in prison and make them into criminals?—Indeed he does.

7243. You are speaking of that from your own knowledge?—From what I have been informed many times in the course of my work. The other day, when I was in Wormwood Scrubs, I saw a man there who is perhaps not one of the worst cases, of whom I will say something. In fact, I saw three young fellows in Wormwood Scrubs on the same day. I was talking to the first; he seemed more or less simple, and I said to him, "Who trained you?" I put it quickly, and this fellow suspected me. I said, "I am only trying to help you, my lad; tell me who trained you?" He said, "Long Tom trained me." I did not know who Long Tom was, but still Long Tom was a nickname of a well-known trainer.

7244. What class of offence was his?—Picking pockets. I asked two other fellows the same afternoon that same question. I did not in the smallest degree prompt them, but I asked them to get it out of them, and they both told me that Long Tom had trained them. There were three men whom I saw on one afternoon out of about ten who told me Long Tom had trained them. They had no object in telling me lies, and they knew I came to help them, and they will generally tell me the truth, although they would tell you probably what was not the truth. Still, I think as a rule, they tell me the truth. Of course it must be evident to you that if there were no receivers of stolen goods it would make thieving very difficult, because if a man takes your watch or takes jewellery or plate, or anything of that sort, he does not take it to the pawnbroker, but he takes it to one of these receivers, who makes away with it. If a man knew that if he had taken a watch it was a most difficult thing to dispose of, it would, in my opinion, decrease the number of thieves.

7245. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You say these men are well known to the police. When they get caught how could you bring it home to the judge's mind that these are very dangerous characters who ought to have a sentence far beyond what they would get considering the nature of the offence with which they are charged?—I think for the most part when a man is brought before a judge for sentence in a case of that sort the police know all about the man; at all events they do in nine cases out of ten, and they tell this to the judge, and I think the judge would be guided by his own knowledge and give him increased punishment.

7246. But surely they are not allowed to tell that to the judge?—No?

7247. The jury having found a verdict it is then placed before the judge that the man has been convicted on so many occasions before?—Yes.

7248. But very likely he has not been convicted before, and then nothing comes before the judge?—The instances where they have not been convicted before would be comparatively rare; but I presume that in giving the list of his convictions the detective would be able to say that this man was a dangerous man if his offences had been of a very bad nature. The judge would be informed, if the prisoner was a receiver of stolen goods, whether he was a well-known receiver, and the same if he had been found possessing a mould twice.

7249. That would be clear evidence, and that would refer to a particular case; but you are rather pointing to this, that the sentences ought to depend upon the general character of the man, which at present does not come before the judge and cannot come before the judge in practice?—Well, I have always understood that the detective who had the case in hand had the means of pointing out to the judge if a man was a dangerous criminal.

7250. After the jury have found a verdict the previous convictions are laid before the judge, but they are put down in writing. There is no evidence given I think?—That would, I should think, be all that was necessary if a judge were informed that this man had been convicted three times of receiving stolen goods. I mean there is to my mind such an enormous gulf between a man who is an ordinary tool, a poor wretch perhaps who steals a loaf of bread or snatches a pair of boots from a shop to sell, possibly because he is hungry, and who gets a sentence of penal servitude because he has been in prison before, and the clever man who receives the things because they are stolen.

7251. You would say that the judge should be allowed to know the general character of this man, and should be prepared to receive evidence of his general character after the verdict was found?—Of course it was my ignorance not knowing it, but I was under the impression that the detective who had charge of the case had the power of doing that.

7252. No, I do not think it goes further than I have stated. What is known is put before the judge in the shape of a list of his previous convictions?—I am sure you are right, and your knowledge is greater than mine can be, but I was speaking to one of our old detectives the day before yesterday, and I asked him about it. He was the only person I consulted when I knew I was coming here to give evidence. He is a leading detective, and a well-known man. I said, "Now, in the case of men being found with a mould, "and in the case of receivers of stolen goods or "trainers of thieves what do you do?" and he clearly told me that a detective would have the opportunity of mentioning these facts to the judge. I was under the impression that he would have been able to speak openly, but I suppose the detective meant he would have an opportunity either of handing up a memorandum in writing or passing on to the judge somehow information as to the man. He did not tell me how, but he said the detective would have the opportunity of mentioning those facts to the judge.

7253. In the simple form in which I have expressed it. I think it is done, but I do not think it goes to the extent that you would wish to inform the judge's mind upon it. I do not think the judge gets these large facts put before him. If a man had never been convicted before, however bad he was, I think he would have a clean sheet?—Yes, I understand that.

7254. (Chairman.) Do you think that a considerable number of these criminals are trained or taught in prison?—I have heard that said, but I have no evidence at all to prove that.

7255. You do not think there is very much of what is called contamination?—I should say not. I do not see how there can be.

7256. Have you a great belief in industrial labour in a prison?—I think that it is a very great help to a man to give him some work in which he is interested. The giving men work which they cannot but think is unprofitable is undesirable.

7257. Do you find that the work which a man has learned in prison is often of use to him in getting employment afterwards?—Very seldom, exceedingly seldom.

7258. Is that because he is an inefficient workman, or that he does not know the trade?—It is a sort of combination of the two. Very much more is required in free labour than is required of a man inside a gaol. Some of these men who come out of prison have been perhaps patted a little on the back because they have shown a marked aptitude for learning, and when they come out, they think themselves tremendous chaps and that they are going to get work at once. They come with a letter from the chaplain and these men say, "No, we will not take anything under 10*d.* an hour." They have been so flattered with the work they have done in prison that they will take nothing but the very highest Trade Union rate of pay, but they have to come down to about half the money they expected, eventually.

7259. Do you think that could be eliminated at all by the better training of prisoners?—It might be if it were desirable to do it.

7260. Do you believe in associated work in prisons?—So long as there is sufficient supervision over them.

7262. And far preferable?—No.

7263. With regard to prisoners' aid societies, would there be any objection, before a man is discharged, to give him a list of all bonâ fide societies which do that class of work, and of allowing him to see any one of them?—Not the least. I think that is practically done.

7264. Are you speaking of convict prisons or local prisons, or both?—In convict prisons a man is sent for by the governor and asked what society he would like to join. If, for instance, he is a man who belongs to Leeds or Birmingham he can be placed under the charge of the local societies in those places, and although he may be going to Birmingham he may come to either our society or Mr. Wheatley's first, and go to Birmingham afterwards.

7265. You see no harm in allowing the prisoner to see such a list. Would you further think it desirable to let him have access to the representatives of the society he might elect to see?—Yes, but I should think it would be a great mistake to let the prisoner think that there were a great number of societies competing for him; it would be putting the Prisoners' Aid Society in a false position, if they were to try and compete for him. I think that ought to be avoided.

7266. That danger exists to a certain extent, at the present time, does it not?—We do not feel it at all.

7268. Provided you avoided that danger of undue competition you see no reason why all bonâ fide societies should not be helped as much as possible in getting access to prisoners?—Not at all.

7269. (Sir Algernon West.) Following that up, would you see any possibility of organising all these various prisoners' aid societies in any way?—I think there are eight competing for good, if I may so call it, and Wormwood Scrubs alone?—Yes.

7270. And scattered all over the country there are quantities of these societies?—Yes.

7271. Would it be practical suggestion that these societies should be in some way amalgamated and re-organised?—Well, you see, I cannot speak about the "Prisoners' Aid Societies" competing for Wormwood Scrubs, because I do not know them. I know Mr. Wheatley's and I know our own; but if you take the local prisons in the counties, then, for the most part, certainly; and as far as I know, all of them are absolutely local. That is to say, if you take Birmingham and Liverpool, or the big towns, all those that I know of are only and entirely for local cases. They would only aid Birmingham men or Liverpool men; but if a man, say from Manchester, were to go to Liverpool and place himself under the charge of the society there, they would have nothing to do with him. They exist absolutely only for their own centres. That, of course, applies also to societies like the Hampshire Society at Winchester, or to any of the local societies.

7272. (Chairman.) Are those "Provincial Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies" affiliated to your society?—No.

7273. They are perfectly independent?—They are perfectly independent; the way in which they are affiliated, if it can be termed "affiliation," is that we assist discharged prisoners from the home counties, that is to say, the counties bordering on London, and we take the cases of men who have never been in prison before, from them, and they are hopeful cases for the most part. We either send them to sea, or to suitable work, or we help them in some way; and for these cases we make no charge to the society in question. By the home counties I mean Surrey, Berks, Hants, Herts, Essex, Kent, just those societies which are round London; but we take cases from all the other important societies over the kingdom, when they send them to London and we find them work, and send the local societies in a bill. We charge the home counties half the expense of those men that they recommend, who have been previously convicted.

7274. Then you have only direct connexion with Wormwood Scrubs and convict prisons?—We have direct connexion with all these.

7275. Yes, and you are not officially attached to them?—No, it is by mutual arrangement. I went down and interviewed their secretaries and made this arrangement with them some three years ago. I felt it would be a desirable thing to do, and I asked my committee to allow me to do it, and I went down and did it.

7276. What is your exact relation to the convict prisons?—We are on the same footing now as other district Prisoners' Aid Societies. Originally we were the only society for convict prisons, but now we are only in the same position as Mr. Wheatley or any other "Prisoners' Aid Society."

7277. (Sir Algernon West.) May I then limit my question, and ask as there are 17 in London or its surroundings, whether there is any possibility of amalgamating or organising those various societies for London?—The difficulty I think is that the good work that a society does depends very much indeed upon individual work. To take one's own society, which of course I know best about, we have a committee of seven or eight men who have taken an immense interest in this work for many years, and who are capable clever men, and I do not think that they would particularly like to be amalgamated with other societies, because we feel, rightly or wrongly, that we do our work rather better than other people do. However that may be conceit on our part.

7279. Will you tell me how many men pass through your hands in the conrse of a year?—This year we shall have about a thousand, last year it was 880.

7281. For which you get how many prisoners through your hands in the course of a year?—380 last year.

7282. Is it given on any principle; is it given by results or how?—I think it is given in proportion to the number of cases assisted by the society during the year. We are not the only people who get this grant; I think 1,500*l.* a year is roughly the amount that is given.

7283. You get 40*l.* you mean for 380 prisoners?—Yes.

The witness withdrew.

The proceedings were adjourned till Thursday 29th November, at 12 o'clock.

FIFTEENTH DAY.

Home Office, Whitehall.

Thursday, 29th November 1894.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P. (CHAIRMAN).

The Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B.
Sir JOHN EDWARD DORINGTON, Bart., M.P.
ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Esq., M.P.
ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis; and
Miss ELIZA ORME.

JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

Captain C. W. HILL called and examined.

Capt. C. W. Hill.

29 Nov. 1894.

7284. (Chairman.) You are the Governor of Strangeways?—I am.

7285. How long have you been there?—Since the 1st of January last.

7286. Will you tell the Committee what posts you have previously held in the prison service?—I have been Governor of Winchester Prison since 1869, that is 25 years ago.

7287. Then you came straight to Strangeways?—Yes.

7288. Is Winchester a large prison?—No; it has about 400 cells for males and 60 for females.

7289. Were you appointed direct to the governorship at Winchester?—Yes.

7290. You had previously served in the army?—Yes.

7291. In your opinion is it advisable to extend the discretionary powers of the governor or of the visiting justices in regard to certain prison regulations, such as those governing the reading of books, visits, letters, and so forth?—I do not think there would be any benefit derived from increasing either one or the other.

7292. You think that the present system works well?—Very well indeed.

7294. I mean when a prisoner has exhausted his right, say to receive a visitor or to write a letter, he makes a strong representation to you, and you see that he has got some reason for wishing to write a letter, and then you have to write it yourself?—Yes, it does not take very much time. There are very few applications of that kind, not enough to be worth noticing.

7295. But is not that rather because the prisoners know there is a stringent rule?—No, I think not; it is those who come in for short sentences. They are not allowed to write, and they make applications on their own private affairs, such, for instance, as the wages which are due to them, and which they have not received.

7296. You feel that there is nothing wanting in the present system with regard to this point?—No, nothing.

7297. We have had the evidence of the Matron from Strangeways. On the male side of the prison, have you had any overcrowding since you have been down there?—Yes.

7298. To what extent?—About 20 or 30 prisoners, as to which, of course, we took steps to relieve the prison by an application to the Home Office, and an order was made by the Home Office for their removal to Knutsford.

7299. What was the influx due to?—I can scarcely tell you; but I think it was the Queen's visit to Manchester. People from London and different places came down to see the Queen.

7300. What did you do with those prisoners; how did you accommodate them?—We put them in association rooms; that is the way we accommodated them when we had the overflow.

7301. How many had you to put together?—Five in a room; then we had to supervise them, or the chances are that they would fight.

7302. Did you put a warder in charge that night?—Yes.

7303. He stayed with them all night?—Yes.

7304. Is that the only occasion on which you have been overcrowded?—I think there was another occasion, but what the reason for that overcrowding was I do not know.

7306. You strongly disapprove of association where it can be avoided?—Yes, it is ruination.

7307. It is likely, you think, to lead to very evil consequences?—Yes, it is.

7308. Do you think that the present system admits of improvement with regard to further classification of prisoners, such as apparently was contemplated by the Act of 1877?—When you have separation I do not think it much matters, but you must have absolute separation.

7309. Do you take in any convicts?—No.

7310. They all go to Knutsford?—Yes.

7311. Do you have convicts at Winchester?—Yes, we had 20 cells there specially for them.

7312. Do you think that there was any particular advantage derived from sending convicts to local prisons in the first instance?—Well, I do not know, except that they want to stay there.

7313. The convicts do?—Yes, very often.

7314. Do you think the convicts prefer the local prisons?—Yes, they do not like association.

7315. That is only on their first experience?—No, those that have been in before, represent association in the convict prison as being of a lower region than they like.

7316. What class of prisoners are you speaking of now? Do you mean that the hardened criminal objects to association?—Yes, that is my experience of those that have been there under my observation. They do not like going back again to hear the language which they hear, and they think it is the proper thing to be alone.

7317. That is the reason from the point of view of the convict himself, but from the point of view of administration, do you think it is desirable to send those men into association?—I would not go further than my experience tells me.

7318. But that enables you perhaps to form an opinion on the point?—Yes, I should say separation is the only chance of reforming them.

7319. Is there any reason from the administrative point of view for sending convicts to local prisons in the first instance instead of direct to convict prisons?—I think it is beneficial to them.

7320. Because they are under closer supervision, or what?—Yes, I think so.

7321. Did you find them more difficult to manage?—Oh! dear no; one or two men were certainly; but they always give in by being kept altogether separately. They wanted to show off before the others, that was their great idea.

7322. But they keep them separately?—Yes, except at exercise and in chapel. One actually assaulted a warder in chapel in one case I remember.

7323. Do you think it is in the interests of the local prisoners that the convicts should be sent to the same prison?—I do not think it is anything but beneficial to both. In fact, they are separate, and therefore it does not very much matter.

7324. Coming to other classes you have a great number of men at Strangeways who are in for drunkenness?—Yes.

7325. Do you think that they should be specially treated and kept as a class apart from the ordinary criminal?—No, I do not think so. You see they are all put into separate cells and kept separate.

7326. But drunkenness is an offence somewhat different to ordinary criminal offences, is not that so?—Yes.

7327. And habitual drunkenness is more of a disease than the commission of ordinary crime?—Well, I think it is very much due to want of other aliments such as nutritious diet. They go to drink because it is cheaper than buying food.

7328. Is not that an argument itself for a different and, probably a separate treatment of them?—Medically, yes.

7329. Have you seen the report of the Inebriates' Committee?—No.

7330. The Inebriates' Committee last year proposed that habitual drunkenness should be looked upon as an offence warranting compulsory detention and special treatment?—No, I have not seen that.

7331. Should you be in favour of that, speaking generally?—Well, I think it is rather a premium on drunkenness.

7332. The compulsory detention for not less than a year?—Yes, they would be taken care of, but drunkards as a rule are people who have got no proper nourishment in the way of their food, and they rush to drink as a simple way of getting rid of hunger. It is poverty which causes it.

7333. Assuming that is so, would not it be better they should go into detention for a year or two years and receive proper treatment which might end in their redemption rather than they should be perpetually coming back to prison on short sentences?—Of course it would.

7334. Then you would be in favour of some such treatment of them?—Yes.

7335. In that case it is tantamount to saying that you would be prepared to favour the treatment of drunkards as a class apart from other criminals?—Well, you see they are all kept separate.

7336. But I mean separate in the sense that there should be a system which would allow special medical attention being given to them, and such treatment with regard to diet as might afford the best chance of reclaiming them from drinking?—That is quite right, I think so, because when a drunkard comes into a prison if he is badly fed he goes out with a greater thirst for drink than he had when he came in, but if he is fed better that would be obviated. In fact they have told me that over and over again.

7337. I pass now to another class, and that is a class which is generally known as the habitual criminals. Do you have a great many of them?—Yes, a great many.

7338. Men who are in constantly for the second third and fourth time?—Yes.

7339. You are of opinion that short sentences on such men as men who have deliberately chosen to live by crime are of little or no use as a deterrent?—Well, I do not think it is any deterrent because there is a philosophy in their crime that I think is not taken into account.

7340. Do you think their philosophy would make them have a greater terror of a cumulative sentence?—I think so.

7341. You would be in favour of that?—Yes.

7342. Then do you think it would be desirable to treat the habitual criminals as a class distinct from other offenders?—In the way of cumulative punishments?

7343. In that and in others. I mean to keep them either in a separate prison or a separate wing of a prison?—No, it does not matter where they are kept if they are kept in separation.

7345. In that case these habitual prisoners as they would be sentenced under cumulative sentences would be in for a considerable time?—Yes.

7346. And in that case it would be easier to find productive labour for them. You would have more time in which to instruct them?—Certainly, there is no doubt about that.

7347. That would be an argument for keeping them in a special prison and concentrating them?—Yes. May I say also that there must be regard had to their ultimate work when they go out of prison. For instance, if a man is an agriculturist and his regular work is at agriculture he must not be liberated in a town where there is no agriculture.

7348. I will come to the question of labour later. Then we pass from the question of drunkards and the habitual offenders and we come to the question of the younger men. Are you satisfied with the age limit now?—Yes, quite. I think it is a very fair average. There are boys, of course, much younger than 16 who are men, and sometimes lads of 17, 18, and 19, are children. The average of 16, I think, is a good age.

7349. Still you find sometimes boys of 18 or 20?—Yes.

7350. And it is most undesirable to associate them with very young people or with old criminals?—There should be no association at all, I think.

7351. Would you approve of the age for admission to reformatories being raised say from 16 to 18?—That I am not prepared to give an opinion on. My experience of reformatories is rather against the reformatories, because I can only see the boys who came back again from reformatories on re-committals and they are always the worst prisoners.

7352. But the boys who would revert to prison after being at reformatories would be the very worst in the reformatory?—Quite so.

7353. So that it would be rather hard to judge of reformatories by that?—I do not say anything more than my experience justifies me in saying.

7354. You are aware that reformatories claim that from 60 to 80 per cent. are reformed?—Yes, I am quite aware of that.

7355. I do not gather that you meant that the prisoners that you had from reformatories are the worst that you have?—Generally.

7356. They are the worst prisoners that you have of all?—Yes, generally.

7357. In what way?—Shouting; assaulting warders, other prisoners; and giving trouble in every way in the prison.

Capt. C. W. Hill.

7358. Still you would say it is rather natural to expect that the lads who deliberately turn back after four years in a reformatory would naturally be incurably bad?—Well, I do not say "incurable," because they get quieter afterwards when they find it is no use; and if they are treated leniently they give in if they find there is no opposition. In fact, they cannot work except against opposition.

7359. I know you have a high opinion of what can be done by personal care in relation to the prison?—Yes, I think that good-will will correct anything; if they see that, they will give in.

7360. Assuming that in the reformatories you have better machinery for getting at the lads and the girls and reforming them and reclaiming them, of course, you would approve of larger opportunities being given for the admission of boys and girls to reformatories?—Yes.

7361. Assuming that the opportunities at the reformatory are greater than at the prison?—Yes; I think even there more separation than they have would be better.

7362. We will agree that a very complete system of classification would be essential in reformatories?—Yes, I think it would because they are associated. You see in prisons they are kept in separation. There is no need of classification.

7363. But given that complete system of classification and an adequate staff would you be in favour of raising the age of admission from 16 to 18?—Well, I think not.

7364. On what ground; on the ground you have already said?—Yes, on what I have already stated.

7365. Do I understand that you think that the prison is a better agency for reforming and reclaiming a lad or a girl say from 16 to 21 than a reformatory could be?—Certainly, if properly treated in prison.

7366. Now, coming to deal with the point of the agency, have you in the prison, except through your individual effort, and that of the chaplain, and, perhaps, the medical officer, any influence for the moral reformation of the prisoners?—Yes, the training warders and separation.

7367. I mean of the agencies in a prison other than the individual efforts of the governor and the chaplain, and in a secondary degree that of the medical officer, for exercising a reformatory influence on each individual prisoner?—There are the warders.

7368. Can you depend upon them?—Well, as much I suppose as anywhere else. They must be trained.

7369. Have they had any training for that particular purpose?—Well, I have been there only a short time, but I think I have done something in that direction.

7370. I have no doubt you have done all you can, but do you feel confident that all superior officers throughout the service are equally anxious to train the warders?—I think they are. Of course I do not know, but they ought to be.

7371. We will take the case of a chief warder in charge of over 100 prisoners. Has he had any training which would lead him to think that it was part of his duty to exercise a moral and reforming influence over the prisoners?—Well, I hope so.

7372. But you think I understand, that the prison is likely to be a better reforming agency for the prisoners than a reformatory?—Yes, a properly conducted prison.

7373. It all depends on what you mean by "properly conducted"?—Separation is the thing to do it.

7374. Do not you agree that personal intercourse does as much as anything, or more than anything, perhaps, in the exercising of a healthy influence?—Yes.

7375. Is it physically possible for any governor or for any official under the present system to have that close personal relation with each individual prisoner which would be likely to exercise a permanent reforming influence upon him?—It is more a question as to the length of their sentences.

7376. Is not it the fact that under the present system you find that there is, I will not say a large proportion in relation to the whole number of prisoners, but still a very considerable per-centage of prisoners who are distinctly habitual criminals?—Yes, I think so, certainly.

7377. It is also the fact according to the best informed sources of information that those men who become habitual criminals are manufactured between the ages of 16 and 20?—I think they commence much earlier than that.

7378. I think the prison statistics show that that is the case?—Yes, they are convicted.

7379. And that the period of their lapse into crime begins, as a rule, when they are quite young?—Yes, they are then found out.

7380. And then they come back repeatedly to prison during those years I have mentioned?—Yes.

7381. And therefore, as I say, it is during those years they become trained criminals?—Yes.

7382. Cannot that state of things be improved? Does not that state of things show that with regard to that special class of young habitual criminals some stronger and better system is required for the reclaiming them before they permanently lapse into crime?—Well, it would be advisable to have one if you could. It would be as well to have a better system altogether, if possible.

7383. Would you approve of such an institution as a Government penal reformatory. I do not stand by the name necessarily?—No.

7384. But I have in my mind an institution midway between a reformatory and a prison?—Yes.

7385. With ample opportunities for agricultural labour or gardening, and teaching productive trades, and with a special staff trained for the purpose?—I think it would be admirable.

7386. I mean a place where you could send that particular class who are not bad enough for prisons, and who are not good enough for reformatories?—Yes, I think it would be a very good thing, and then to educate them in connexion with their after life, and where their surroundings would be afterwards.

7387. You would approve of that?—Yes, I would educate a sailor for a sailor, and a shoemaker for a shoemaker, and so on. I would educate him for a trade that he could follow afterwards.

7388. That is to a great extent the system of existing reformatories?—Yes.

7389. But I put this particular prison to you as being a place where there would be ample means of restraining and coercing a prisoner as distinct rather from the means at the disposal of the reformatory manager. You can understand from that the kind of place I have in mind?—A sort of Parkhurst as it used to be; a boys' prison?

7390. Yes, but Parkhurst was a failure, was it not?—Yes, I think it did break down.

7391. You do not know why it broke down?—No. I had an official under me at Winchester who was the chief warder at Parkhurst, and I think the boys got the mastery of them.

7392. With regard to punishments, do you approve of unproductive labour?—No, I do not.

7393. You prefer giving productive labour to a prisoner wherever you can?—Yes.

7394. Do you approve of the plank bed?—Yes.

7395. You see no objection to that?—No; of course, with the present modification. I think it is very wholesome, because the prisoners go from stage to stage in an amelioration of the conditions of prison life.

7396. And flogging?—No.

7397. Under no circumstances?—You must resort to it in certain circumstances, but it should be avoided whenever it can be avoided.

7398. Do you think it is advisable as far as is possible to punish by the suspension of privileges rather than by any penal method?—Yes, you bring the man face to face with himself.

7399. Holding that view you would be rather in favour of extending small privileges to the prisoners, or giving them power by good conduct to earn privileges?—I think they have sufficient privileges now.

7400. I mean such as a special dinner on Sundays, for instance?—No, I think not. That is a matter which would not touch the moral mind, I think.

7401. Well, it would give you an extra power of punishment which might be efficacious?—No, I do not think that would be efficacious.

7402. You do not think anything in that direction could be done?—No.

7405. Under the old system?—Yes.

7406. Would you like to revert then in some degree to that?—I mean only with regard to the marks for long sentence prisoners in the first stage—in the first month—so that they should commence earning marks at once.

7407. What amount can prisoners earn now on hard labour?—10*s.*

7408. That is the maximum?—Yes.

7409. And how soon do they earn that?—In seven months.

7410. Would you be in favour of extending that power?—I think, perhaps, they might go up to 12*s.* or 12*s.* 6*d.* If they had a two years' sentence I would run it the whole way through.

7411. But is there any reason why they should not continue to earn money on the same scale?—You would get beyond the maximum of 2*l.* then which is fixed by Act of Parliament.

7412. Is that maximum advisable?—I think 30*s.* is a good sum to let a man have an opportunity of getting up a little trade.

7413. Does not it have rather an unfortunate effect when he has earned his money and he feels that there is nothing more for him to get by his prison labour?—Certainly. You know, of course, that he has got this to lean against him, that he may lose it if he does not behave well, but that is, of course, in another direction altogether. It is not making money, it is not earning it.

7414. You are strongly in favour of prison productive labour?—Yes.

7415. Associated labour?—No.

7416. Under no circumstances?—No; of course sometimes you cannot help it and it is very advisable to have associated labour, such as gardening, but only for very few people and well supervised.

7417. Still you have a most excellent laundry for your prison?—Yes.

7418. And that is associated work and it seems to have a very good effect?—Yes, but then it is for women.

7419. Do they talk?—They cannot very well talk in the laundry without being detected.

7420. Have you seen the shops at Wandsworth?—No.

7422. Do you find much difficulty in Strangeways in training your prisoners. Are the warders capable of giving good training; training them for productive labour?—Yes.

7423. Yes?—There would be no difficulty.

7424. How do you get warders who can do it?—The productive labour does not require much skill. It is picking cotton and picking oakum.

7425. Are you in favour of picking oakum?—No, I would much prefer mat making, which is very easily learnt; it does not require much trouble to teach, and it is very productive.

7426. Then if you have skilled industries it is necessary to have warders who understand it?—Yes.

7427. And complaints are made by Government departments that the work of the prisons is not so good as the work of outside labour?—That is the mail-bag work.

7428. I am speaking of the general work of the prisons?—I do not think my experience is of anything but mail-bags. Of mat-making they never had any complaints. The only complaint was that the mat lasted too long.

7429. There is a lack of finish about the work turned out by the prisoners. That is what the Government departments say?—Not mats.

7430. That is what the Office of Works says at all events?—I do not quite understand it.

7431. Is not it natural that a highly developed manufactory should turn out better and more efficient work than a prison could possibly do where the workmen are scratch men, so to speak, and where they have not any highly skilled instructors?—Quite so.

7432. You would be in favour of introducing into the prison service a great number of skilled workmen as warders?—If you want skilled work, certainly you want skilled teachers.

7433. Do you think that the warders should have special remuneration for teaching skilled labour?—Yes, it is greater headwork.

7434. Are you in favour of the present system of sending the chief warders to be warders in charge of prisoners where there are less than 100?—It depends very much on the officer in charge.

7435. He is a uniformed officer. He wears a uniform as a warder-in-charge?—Well, I do not know whether that would work, because I think an officer who had been a uniformed officer would think he was not on duty except he was in uniform.

7436. And, perhaps, that would conduce to slackness. He wears a uniform now as a warder-in-charge?—If you put him into plain clothes I think he would get into the way of supposing he was always on duty, but if he has got to wear a uniform he thinks when he takes his uniform off that he is not on duty.

7437. Is that a good system. I rather gather that you think it depends upon the selection of the officer?—That is it; quite so.

7438. Do you think that the existing staff offers a sufficient supply of good men for those posts?—Well, that is a matter of selection, because a man may be very good in one place but not in another.

7439. But we assume that the Prison Commissioners in making their appointments take the best men that they can?—Yes, they would do so undoubtedly.

7440. Then you say the system works as well as possible?—Yes.

7441. Is it a good system?—Yes.

7442. You approve then of putting a warder in charge to have the sole charge of say 100 prisoners exercising exactly the same functions as you yourself do?—Yes, if he is competent to command, but, of course, that is the point.

7443. That is my point. Does the system work satisfactorily as it is?—Yes, I think so.

7444. Would you be in favour of raising the quality of the present staff?—Certainly.

7445. The better men you could have the better you could administer it?—Yes, because it is a grand service. There is no doubt about that.

7446. Do you think that speaking generally the the warders are adequate for their duties?—I think so, I think they are amenable to be taught and they are able to learn.

Capt. C. W. Hill.

29 Nov. 1894.

7447. Do you think their pay and their hours of work are satisfactory?—I think they are very fair indeed.

7448. Do you have any complaints?—No.

7449. The usual hours for a warder are from 6 to 6?—Yes.

7450. And they are liable to serve on until 8?—Every man has 10 hours a day as nearly as possible.

7451. He very often is called upon to stay up till 8 o'clock where prisoners are coming in for instance. In that case he would have two hours off in the morning?—It is all done in reliefs. Those men that will be called upon would get so much off in the day. They would not do anything in the day. At least so many hours as they are called upon to do at night time they would be relieved from in the day.

7452. You have called upon warders to work more than 10 hours sometimes?—Very seldom, and then it is always made up to them, they get a day off.

7453. But when warders have to sleep in the prison and have to answer the bells, is that reckoned as part of their hours of work?—Yes, because there are patrols. The same men do not do it always. Those that go on for night duty get a proportion of the day off.

7454. But then it is night duty in the sense that a man is there asleep in his quarters but liable to have to get up and go to the prisoners' cells, but is that night duty reckoned as hours of service?—Yes, because it is night duty.

7455. Is all your night duty done by men patrolling?—There are two night watchmen, and that of course gives great relief.

7456. But when a bell rings and a prisoner wishes to communicate what happens?—The night watchman—the inside man—goes to him.

7457. He goes to the cell?—Yes, after waking the "orderly officer." It is the "orderly officer" who is in charge of the prison for the night.

7458. Is he a warder?—Yes, a principal warder. Then if there is anything the matter with them medically, of course the outside night watchman is communicated with, and the chief warder is called and lets him out, and the night watchman goes for the doctor.

7459. Then all the answering of bells is, I understand, by your night watchman?—Yes.

7460. But the ordinary officer is summoned?—If necessary.

7461. Is that a matter of discretion with the night watchman?—It depends on the complaint or the requirements of the man.

7462. Then the night watchman has to judge?—Yes; if the prisoner says, "I want to see the doctor," then of course the doctor is sent for.

7463. Do you think the hours of work on the women's side is satisfactory?—I do not think the Commissioners have settled that yet; you mean with regard to the officers?

7464. Yes?—They have not settled it in the way they have on the male side.

7465. Are you inclined to think they are too long?—No, I think not, but I do not think the officers are sufficient. They are allowed temporary officers it is true, but they are not on the male side.

7466. You mean in point of numbers?—Yes. They work very well on both sides, both male and female.

7467. Should you be in favour of establishing certain prisons as training prisons for officers and prison officials generally?—It would be a grand thing, a great thing, to send trained men instead of men on probation.

7468. Would you approve of the selection say of two or three prisons and of their being placed in charge of the most experienced men in the service whose duty it would be to train both warders and perhaps deputy-governors?—Yes, that is a very good thing. It would be a great relief.

7469. You would strongly approve of that?—Yes, that is a very good thing.

7470. You would like to have the training of such officers yourself perhaps?—Well, I do not think I am quite competent for that. There are much better men than myself, I think.

7471. Still you would see your way to approving of such work?—Yes; it would be a great relief to me if I got a trained man instead of an untrained man.

7472. With regard to deputy-governors, I think you have no deputy?—No.

7473. And you have 1,200 prisoners?—Yes.

7474. Do you find it a great strain upon you?—No.

7475. Do you work long hours?—Well, 12 hours sometimes.

7476. Most men would find it a strain?—Well that depends upon whether they take pleasure in their work or not.

7477. You, I understand, take so much interest in your work that you scarcely care to devolve it on others?—Well, I think that is true.

7478. If you dissociate the question from your own personal view, and take human nature on a general average, do you think that it is fair to charge a governor with the care of 1,200 prisoners?—I think it is a little too much, because he would lose touch with the prisoners. At least I find that I cannot gain touch with them. I think 600 would be quite enough.

7479. What do you think should be the relation of the matron to the governor or deputy-governor, or, in the absence of one or both, to the chief warder?—I think she ought to be made as responsible for her prison as possible.

7480. Taking the case of Strangeways, supposing you are away would the matron be under the chief warder?—Yes.

7481. I will not apply it to your particular prison, but as a general rule do you think that that is desirable?—Well, I think perhaps it would be better as it is, in this way, that the matrons have not been trained to keep accounts and different other arrangements, and so forth, that the male officers would be. They have not got a storekeeper, for instance, or a clerk, and of course the prison work requires that books should be kept, and they are kept by a male clerk, so that I think it would be just as well to keep it in the hands of the male chief warder when the governor is away.

7482. Of course the matron would feel that she could be thoroughly backed up by the male officer?—That is it. She must have her responsibility amongst the prison officers.

7483. But at the same time you think that she ought to have a position of dignity of her own, and not be subjected in any way to the authority of the chief warder in the absence of the governor?—That again depends upon the chief warder. If he is a man of tact of course there would be no friction at all.

7484. It is rather difficult to adjust the precise relation, but if people of common sense wish to get on there would be no difficulty at present from the practical point of view?—None.

7485. Your matron is a first class matron?—Yes.

7486. There is no second class matron, is there; it is first and third?—Yes.

7487. But no second?—No.

7488. And a third class matron has not the power of visiting the prisoners?—Oh, yes, the matron visits all her prisoners.

7489. I think it was the governor of Knutsford who was telling me, that at Knutsford he had only a third class matron, and that she could only have charge of a certain number of female prisoners, and had no power to go round, and that therefore he had to visit the whole of both the male and female prisoners?—Well, I think the matron ought to do it.

7490. You think that at any rate the matron ought to have that in charge?—Yes, she ought to have that discretion and responsibility.

7492. That is quite apart from the discipline of the prison?—Quite apart from it.

7493. Because a man may have had the seeds of insanity in him, which may have become developed while he was in prison?—Yes.

7494. In your opinion, I gather you do not think the prison system as it exists is responsible for producing madness?—No, not for a sane man, certainly.

7495. And you can say that, after your experience of 24 years as governor?—Yes.

7496. Do you think that the treatment of unconvicted prisoners is satisfactory?—Well, I am not quite sure as to their diet.

7497. An unconvicted prisoner with money can obtain various comforts?—Yes.

7498. And the man that cannot pay cannot get those comforts?—No; and I do not think he is fit for hard labour after three months of the diet.

7499. Do you think that that is a distinct grievance?—It is.

7500. You mean that an unconvicted prisoner who has been in for say, as long as three months on ordinary unconvicted prisoners' diet, and then goes up for trial and is sentenced for hard labour, has been so let down by the previous imprisonment that he is not fit for the hard labour?—Yes, that is if he has been left alone by the doctor. The doctor can arrange that, and can give him an increased diet if he likes.

7501. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) The unconvicted prisoners' diet is not adequate?—It is not adequate without the help of the doctor.

7502. (Chairman.) I understand you to think that a very grave hardship may be inflicted upon perhaps, totally innocent men?—Well, I do not think it is allowed to reach that point, because the man is watched so carefully. There are experienced warders and the governor, and besides which, the doctor goes round every week; and a great many people are weighed.

7503. But still, if I were an innocent man, and had to live on prison diet until I got so ill that I could not work, I should think it was a grievance?—But then the doctor could attend to you.

7505. But you would think that something ought to be done to treat these unconvicted prisoners on rather better terms than those who were convicted?—Well, I think they ought to get the best diet of any of them.

7507. And do you think that every consideration is not paid to them?—Well, I cannot quite see the logic of the thing, because if a man is in very good health, and there is nothing the matter with him at all, he does not want so much. If his organic arrangements are perfect, he would want less food. It is like a locomotive engine; you must have much greater heat expended on an old locomotive than upon a new one. It wants to be arranged, of course, according to a man's condition.

7508. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Is the diet adequate for a man in sound health?—If he is doing nothing.

7509. So that for people who are at all wrong in their health, it is inadequate?—I think so. Of course the doctor is there, and he sees to all that.

7510. Do you think it right that that should depend upon the doctor?—I do not know.

7511. Is not it drawing things rather fine to prescribe a diet which is inadequate for a mass of unconvicted prisoners, and to rely upon the doctor to put it right?—Well, I think it could be safer, perhaps.

7512. (Chairman.) Do you attach much importance to the work of th inspectors of the prisons?—Yes, because everything is kept in apple-pie order for the inspector, and as he comes round once a month at uncertain times, there is no slackness, I think everybody is affected by that.

7513. You think they are vigilant and that they look well after all the details of prison management?—Yes, they know it well, but they have no power of giving an order in the prison.

7514. Yet the fact of their noticing everything would be enough?—Yes.

7515. Do you think that anything is to be gained by their reporting direct to the Secretary of State rather than to the Prison Commissioners?—I think not.

7516. You are satisfied with the working of the arrangement?—Yes.

7517. What Prisoners' Aid Societies have you at Strangeways?—We have one.

7518. What is that?—The Manchester Prisoners' Aid Society.

7519. Does it do good work?—Well, I work the prisoners myself.

7520. But does that society do any work at all?—Yes, they commenced in March when I started it; and up to yesterday 432 were helped.

7521. Do you know what Government grant they earn?—Well, it is not quite settled yet. I was told that we might rely upon 100*l.* a year, and see how that would work, but I am afraid that will not go near it. You see there are 10,000 prisoners.

7522. Do you arrange the visits of the officers of the society to prisoners?—No, I visit the prisoners myself and send the particulars to the agent. No warder's time is taken up or anybody else's about it.

7523. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You are the Prisoners' Aid Society yourself?—Yes, I am one of the agents.

7524. The other agent is outside the prison?—Yes. You see you have got to bring the prisoner down to the agency and bring him back again which all takes time. You can do 20 cases by following that plan, where on the other plan you could only do one or two; it is simply to ask a few questions.

7525. What was done at Strangeways before you came there about prisoners' aid?—Nothing.

7526. (Chairman.) Then the Manchester and Salford Society seems to do a large work?—A very large work.

7527. It is really an effective society?—Quite.

7529. How is the system worked? Will you just explain it?—There is a schedule with certain headings, and a table and statement that I fill up. It takes me about two or three minutes for each prisoner. It depends upon the questions to be asked. Of course I do it with as much care and discretion as I can, because it would run to any amount of money with an average of 10,000 prisoners every year.

7530. (Mr. O'Connor.) You are speaking of males?—Both males and females are helped by the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society Then I fill up the particulars that are required by the secretary, and then I put down what is wanted to get this person into work. We cannot find work for all of them, that is impossible; but where they can find work is especially with women as charwomen and for laundry work outside. We supply them with respectable clothes when they go to work.

7531. (Chairman.) Then I understand that that work really depends upon the officers of that Society and yourself?—Yes. I did not not quite finish what I was going to say. That statement goes two or three days before the discharge of the prisoner to the secretary of the society outside. Each one of the prisoners who has put his name down on this statement gets a paper, which is sent to the secretary's room. That is a letter of identity really; it is for identification, telling him the name of the prisoner and what is required, and a statement of what was sent.

Capt. C. W. Hill.

29 Nov. 1894.

Then he gets what is required; sometimes it is tools for working with and so on; sometimes it is dress.

7532. You have nothing to do with fixing the amount of the Government grant?—No.

7533. That is done under the Treasury rules?—Yes.

7534. The Treasury grant, as I understand, is divided under Treasury rules and goes to each society according to the work it does, the number of prisoners it has to look after, and the number it aids. I understand that there is no direct payment out of the grant for a particular prisoner?—No.

7536. Saying that 2*s.* 6*d.* or 5*s.*, or whatever it is, allowed for each prisoner and that the charge is a Government grant?—No, the statement comes to me at the end of the quarter, embracing the names of all that have been sent up and aided. Then my storekeeper checks that with the book I keep, and on the schedule being found correct I sign it, and it comes to the Treasury which pays it.

7539. Yes?—That is the outside agent, but he never exceeds 2*l.*; sometimes it is 2*s.* 6*d.*, sometimes it is 1*s.* It depends upon what it is, but he goes about and picks up things where he can get them cheap, such as a skirt, a jacket, a shawl, or an old pair of boots. Once I think a carpenter and joiner went in for about 30*s.* for tools. He was a very good workman indeed, and he has not come back.

At this stage Sir ALGERNON WEST took the Chair.

7540. (Sir Algernon West.) You told us that amongst the worst of your prisoners were those that came through reformatories. What reformatories have you received boys from? You are talking probably more of Winchester than anywhere else?—No, everywhere all over the kingdom.

7541. Have you received any boys as prisoners from Redhill in Surrey?—I think not.

7542. You told us, I think, that a prison has more reforming agency in it than reformatories in your opinion; can you support that by anything?—No.

7543. It is merely a matter of opinion?—Yes.

7544. You said you were opposed to flogging?—Yes.

7545. Would you be opposed to whipping boys?—Yes, in every way.

7546. You are opposed to that altogether?—Yes.

7547. Will you kindly tell me how the value of labour in prisons is estimated. I am anxious to know something with reference to that question because I see it varies so much. The washing at Strangeways varied very very much in two following years. Was there anything to cause that change?—I think it varied because there were no customers.

7548. Then you think really the actual washing was less one year than another?—That is it. It cannot be anything else but the applicants, the people who are washed for; because there is a regular schedule of prices for these things which is issued by the Home Office.

7549. In one year you see it was 607*l.* for the prison washing, but you think it depends entirely upon the amount of washing done?—Yes.

7550. It is not a question that the store clerk or anybody else estimates?—No.

7551. It is strictly according to what is done?—Yes.

7552. May I ask you what experience you had of the visiting justices at Winchester; did they attend and do good work?—No.

7553. Do the visiting justices do the work well with you at Strangeways?—Yes.

7554. But they did not at Winchester?—No, they visit every day nearly at Strangeways.

7555. But was that your experience at Winchester?—No.

7556. Then it depends upon different counties and different gaols?—Yes, as far as I have an opportunity of judging from what I hear I think so. Some of them seem to think you must take two warders away when the visiting justices come in, and therefore they think they ought not to come too often.

7557. Would you think they would work better if more authority and power was given to them?—May I ask in what way?

7558. I imagine visiting justices do not do good work if they only come once a month?—No.

7559. We have some places where they take an interest in the gaols and attend. We have had evidence of that?—Yes.

7560. But in some places they do not attend except just their monthly meetings?—Yes, that is so.

7561. Do you think they would work better and take more interest in the prison management if more power was given to them?—I do not quite understand in what direction.

7862. Supposing that something of the old authority and position that they had before the prisons were taken over by the Government were restored to them, do you think it would have the effect of making them more interested and taking a greater part in the management of the prison?—It would make two boards instead of one. It would make two boards of the directorate.

7563. Could you give us any suggestion how you would increase the interest taken by them?—I think they take great interest in it now.

7564. But you told us that at Winchester they did not take any interest at all?—They did not take so much. They always come when there is anything to be done.

7565. Take a place like Winchester where they really do nothing. Could you suggest any means whereby you could interest them and induce them to take more interest. You have no suggestions to make on that point?—No.

7566. What do they do at Strangeways when they come?—They go round and see the prisoners.

7567. And probably take some personal interest in the prison?—Well, sometimes.

7568. Not as a rule?—No.

7569. Have you at Strangeways many men who are committed for contempt of court?—Very few. We have got two at present.

7570. Contempt of court generally means that they are men that can pay and will not pay. Do you think it advisable that they should be treated separately from other prisoners?—I think so.

7571. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) To go back to the Prisoners' Aid Societies Grant, you sign a schedule for a prisoner, which he takes to the agent?—No, he does not. It goes by post.

7572. And you state he wants such and such clothes?—Yes.

7573. Do you state that you allow him, say, 2*s.* 6*d.* for a pair of boots?—No.

7574. The agent outside would say it was 2*s.* 6*d.*?—Well, he would get them for 1*s.* 6*d.* if he could.

7575. Or 30*s.* for the carpenter's tools?—Yes.

7576. The agent puts that down?—Yes.

7577. Then at the end of the quarter there is 30*s.* for the tools and half-a-crown for the boots and the other things, and they are added up; that makes a total which you send in, and which is a charge against the Government grant?—Yes.

7578. So that you are not responsible in each individual case, but the agent is?—Yes.

7579. And you are only responsible that the total Government grant is not exceeded?—Just at present it has not been settled. They started with 100*l.*; but in the first six months we exceeded it, and I wrote up to the Commissioners, and said, "We are doing a "good work; shall we stop here, because we have "exceeded the 100*l.*?" They said, "Oh, if you are "doing good work you had better go on with it, and "we will see if we can adjust it afterwards."

7580. Do you think your practice is a general one —that you certify at the end of the quarter?—Yes.

7581. Do not you think some governors think that they have to certify for each individual case?—Well, everybody gets the same papers.

7583. But the purpose of them is not realised, perhaps, in exactly the same sense?—Well, perhaps not.

7584. The Chairman asked you about managing convicts in local prisons. A convict in a local prison is treated in a slightly different way to the others, is he not?—Yes.

7585. Does any objection in point of discipline arise from two different prison treatments of two different classes of prisoners?—No.

7586. There is no jealousy or trouble in the administration?—No, because they recognise the knickerbockers as a separate thing altogether, and then, of course, the sentences are different; so that they all get different diets; but they are all treated the same.

7587. So that if, for reasons of economy, it is better to keep your convicts for nine months in local prisons rather than in a convict prison, there is no reason why that practice should not be continued?—None whatever.

7588. At all events you think that the convicts who have had experience of penal servitude before, dislike going back into associated labour?—Not labour, but into association.

7589. In a convict prison there is no association in the cells, I think, but only in labour?—I do not know, but from books one reads, of course, one thinks there is.

7590. They are associated in labour?—Not in the rooms, I think, but I do not know.

7591. Have you any idea what proportion of your prisoners are in for drink?—Well, I think every one of them drinks, but the offence, I think, is all attributable to their low living.

7592. I have got a prison return here showing that 21 per cent. on a certain day were in for drunkenness?—Yes.

7593. Is it probably about the same proportion with you?—Quite, I think. On Mondays we get the most prisoners from Manchester. Sometimes they bring us 150 a day, but they are principally women. They are all arrested about 1 or 2 o'clock on Monday morning.

7594. And all for drink?—Yes, and disorderly conduct.

7595. Those would come under the charge of drunkenness?—Yes.

7596. And you are in favour of a reformatory prison instead of reformatories. If a boy was sent to prison for three months you could not reform him in the prison?—Well, in this way. If you once get them to understand (and they are quick at that) that they are responsible agents you can; but they think they may do just as they like, and that everybody else must bear the brunt of it. If you get that out of a prisoner's mind you can fit him for social life at once.

7597. You think that with a short sentence in prison on a boy of 15 or 16 years old you can do as much as they can in a reformatory in three or four years?—If you once get that into their minds they are all right, and you do a great thing.

7599. However constituted you would not keep a boy in prison for three or four years?—No.

7600. You would be rather inclined to do away with the reformatory sentence altogether?—I beg your pardon, I thought you meant a prison for three or four years.

7601. You were suggesting that reformatories were not good places, and that a boy properly treated in prison might be dealt with quite as well as in a reformatory school. In the prison a boy must be sent for a short period—not a long period?—That depends on whether you can get hold of him in a short time or not.

At this point Mr. HERBERT GLADSTONE again took the Chair.

7602. You would not send a boy to prison on what was practically a reformatory sentence for four years?—No.

7603. You would not suggest that?—No.

7604. In the case of a boy who would now be sent to a reformatory for four years, would you think it would be advisable to send him to prison for three months' reformatory treatment under a judicious person?—Certainly.

7605. And that as much might be done in three months under judicious treatment as in a reformatory school under a four years' term?—Quite; that is if the reformatory adopts the separate system. I think that would be better.

7606. If the reformatories were altered in character then you would prefer them?—Yes. That is judging from my own experience of what prison work is. That is separation. It is the herding together of the bad boys that makes the bad men. It is the separation of the bad boys and instilling good moral ideas into their minds that makes the good men.

7608. You think the reformatories are taking cases which are too small at present?—Yes.

7609. And that they would be better dealt with in prison by short sentences?—Yes.

7610. Do you know any of the reformatories in your neighbourhood?—No.

7611. You have not been to Idle, near Leeds?—No.

7612. And you think that the boys might with advantage be imprisoned a good deal more than they are and less sent to reformatories. There was a remark made last week about the quality of the warders. Have you had many warders fail from harshness or cruelty to prisoners?—I think that is their general failure.

7613. Do you get many failures from that?—You have to train them. Everyone is the same in this respect.

7614. They want to be taught the proper treatment of prisoners?—Yes.

7615. But you do occasionally get a warder who misconducts himself from that point of view?—Yes.

7616. What do you do with him?—It is a matter of temper and it requires a great deal of disciplining of one's own temper to get proper discipline; but if you talk to him and point out to him exactly where the difference between harshness and severity and patience comes in then he quite understands it after a time; because he sees it himself, and that it applies also to him as well as to anybody else. He sees the usefulness of it.

7617. Do you think that cases of unfair treatment of prisoners are common?—Well, I think they have been in former days certainly.

7618. Of late years, that is to say within the last ten years have many cases come under your observation?—One does not like to say anything about it especially coming to a new prison, but I think it was so in Strangeways. It took me some time to get rid of this formerly.

Capt. C. W. Hill.

29 Nov. 1894.

7619. The warders were not satisfactory?—No.

7620. And you are inclined to think that that is an occasional fault in prisons where the Governor has not exercised adequate supervision over his warders?—Yes.

7621. So that complaints of prisoners against warders might occasionally be supposed to be not unreasonably founded. Yes, that is so.

7622. Have the visiting justices in your experience ever dealt with any complaints of that kind?—No.

7623. Do you think prisoners are willing to mention them?—Yes, they frequently do so.

7624. But they do not mention them to the Visiting Committees?—Yes they do.

7625. What do the Visiting Committees do?—They hear what they have got to say and adjudicate upon it, and either punish the prisoner or otherwise. I think, generally, they punish the prisoner.

7626. What, for misconduct on the part of the warders?—That is my experience.

7628. You say it took a great deal of time to get Winchester in order. That was under the old magistrary?—Yes. It was in very good order before the Government took it over.

7629. You came in under the old system?—Yes.

7630. And it took you some time before you could get it into order?—Yes.

7631. Now you have got to Strangeways you find the prison not quite in order?—It was not, but it is getting better now.

7632. Are there any defects that you think the inspectors ought to have seen and judged of?—That I cannot say.

7633. Do you think their inspection is too cursory?—No, I think not. They go pretty fully into matters.

7634. Still the government of the prison is very much dependent on the quality of the governor?—I think so. There is no doubt of that.

7635. And there is not much check from the outside?—Well, I do not think there could be except from the inspectors.

7636. Whenever a governor is slack the inspector has not much means of finding it out or correcting it?—I think he would, because the government of the prison would naturally fall into the hands of the warders, and I think that must come out some day.

7637. Sooner or later?—Yes.

7638. Well, from what you are saying, both under the old system and under the existing system you seem to have knowledge of prisons in which everything was not quite to your mind, where it took some little time to put things straight?—Yes.

7639. So that after all the prison is dependent on the governor?—Yes, mostly.

7640. (Mr. O'Connor.) If such a case as the Chairman suggested really occurred, namely, that a governor had to see the prisoners that his third class matron could not visit in the separate cells, under what authority would that state of things be?—I do not know, because she is responsible for the whole of it, I should say at all events.

7641. It would not be under the governor's authority?—No.

7642. It would be under the direction of the Home Office?—I do not think there is any direction upon it.

7643. I believe the local prisons are worked by a system of standing orders?—Yes.

7644. These standing orders are laid upon the table of the House of Commons for some weeks, and if not objected to, then they come into force. As far as you know, are those standing orders published at all?—I do not know. The heads of the departments in the prisons get one each.

7645. I am speaking of the outside public. They are not made known to the public, are they?—I do not know.

7646. By means of the publication of those orders the public could know what the administration of the prison system was?—Well, I suppose they would.

7648. In that time a very large number of those standing orders have been issued, taking it from first to last?—Yes.

7649. Have they been classified or codified at all to your knowledge; or are they merely a mass of papers?—Well, I think they are now undergoing the process of being codified.

7650. But that has not yet been done?—I think it has pretty well.

7651. Have you a copy of the code?—No. The recently issued standing orders embrace a great number of others that are on the same subject.

7652. Yes; some are superseded?—Yes.

7653. And there are others which are not superseded?—Yes.

7654. A great many different standing orders are in force?—Yes.

7656. Have not you, besides standing orders, what are called circular letters?—Yes.

7657. They are something in the nature of standing orders, are not they?—In this way. I think they precede the standing orders. That is my general experience. Then we work on that, and after that the subject is embraced in a standing order.

7658. Well, it may be or it may be not?—Yes, but it generally is.

7659. But not necessarily?—No, not necessarily.

7660. So that you have not only standing orders, but you have circular letters?—Yes. They are not of general importance—not of public importance.

7661. But whatever they are, and whatever they relate to, they exist?—Yes.

7662. They are not published?—No.

7663. But I suppose under these standing orders and circular letters also, the interests of the officers and the interests of the prisoners are or may be affected?—Yes.

7664. Do not you think it would be a good thing if there was a book of instructions in respect of prison administration?—Well, it would take a great deal of trouble to compile such a book.

7665. I am assuming it was taken in hand by a competent man. Would not it be a good thing if there was a compendium of instruction for prison administration?—I think it would.

7666. You have been in the army?—Yes.

7667. And you are acquainted with the books of instruction they have in the army?—Yes, the Queen's Regulations and the Drill Book.

7668. Do you know any advantage there is in keeping these standing orders and circulars and regulations from the public knowledge?—No; none that I know of.

7669. But at any rate, in the army the general orders and army circulars are published. They are in the Army List, are not they, at the end?—No. Some of them are, but not all of them.

7670. At any rate the prison regulations are not so published?—No.

7671. So that as compared with other branches of the service, the prison administration is a secret service as far as the public are concerned?—Well, I do not know whether it should be called a secret service.

7672. But as far as you know the public have not any information as to the details of regulations which are in force?—No, I think not.

7673. The Chairman asked you about the hours of work of the staff. Do you know that under the Factory Acts certain hours of work are limited in different occupations especially for females. Those Acts are administered by the Home Office and employers are fined for employing women beyond a certain number of hours. What is the longest time that female warders are employed?—Ten hours a day.

7674. Are there any female warders employed from 6 o'clock until 10 at night?—Not the same.

7675. Never?—No.

7676. Will you say that no female warder at Strangeways is ever employed on duty from 6 o'clock in the morning until as late as 10 at night?—No.

7677. You will not say that?—No. I say they are not.

7678. Are many of the male prisoners employed so long?—No.

7679. What is the longest time that they are employed?—10 hours; they come on duty at 6 and then they go off so as to make the whole day about 10 hours.

7680. What schoolmasters have you at Strangeways?—One.

7681. And how many prisoners?—I have an average of 700 males—741 is the number.

7682. And one schoolmaster?—Yes.

7683. What are his hours?—The same, 10 hours a day. He is not a schoolmaster really; he is a warder schoolmaster; he is not a certificated schoolmaster.

7684. Are you acquainted with the time table of daily duties in local prisons?—Yes.

7685. It says: "School instruction will be carried "on between the hours of 8 a.m. and 6 p.m. except "on Saturdays," is there not a circular or standing order with regard to schoolmasters?—Yes.

7686. "Schoolmasters when fully employed in that "capacity should devote six hours daily to teaching "except between 8 a.m. and 6 p.m. on Saturdays, "when they shall be employed for three hours "between 8 a.m. and noon. The term schoolmaster "shall be understood as including schoolmistress." Is that regulation observed?—Yes.

7687. That there are only six hours' teaching a day? Yes.

7688. With one man who is a warder and 700 prisoners?—Yes.

7689. What amount of teaching can that man give?—Six hours a day.

7690. How does he manage to teach?—Some men only want a few hints; it is cellular up to a certain sentence and a certain standard of education.

7691. Do you regard it as a serious provision of school staff that 700 men should have one warder employed six hours a day?—Well, if they were all illiterate I should certainly think it was not sufficient. The care of books is what takes the time.

7692. I suppose that is what it practically comes to. They look after the library?—No, because when once a library is got into trim it is kept very easily. Method is required.

7693. How often has your prison been visited by the Prison Commissioners?—Since I have been there, once.

7694. By all of them at the same time?—No, by one.

7695. How often has the chairman of the Commissioners been there?—Only once, and that was last year.

7696. You have had one Commissioner there once?—Yes.

7697. Now I have been taking out some figures from this last report, and I see that you have cells and rooms for males which added together make 829?—Yes, that is on the male side.

7698. I also see that the greatest number of prisoners which you had at the period of this report was 841?—Yes.

7699. That is that the whole of your cell accommodation even when you put in these rooms was 12 short of the number that you actually had in custody?—Yes, 7700. Now on the female side I see that the cells and rooms added together come to 382?—Yes.

7701. And the greatest number of females you had in custody was 416?—Yes.

7702. So that there was a deficiency on the female side of not less than 34?—Yes.

7703. So that you then had absolutely no working margin of cells at all?—No, there were some in hospital.

7704. Yes, but that did not afford you a working margin of cells at all?—No.

7705. Do not you make a weekly report?—Yes.

7706. And that fact of the excess on the female side of 34 cells would appear upon that report?—Yes.

7707. That report goes up to the Home Office?—Yes.

7708. When you sent up the report, showing that state of things can you tell us from memory what was done or what communication you received from the Prisons Commissioners?—I do not remember what the time was.

7709. Neither do I, because the report does not state it; but it must have appeared on the weekly report?—Yes.

7710. Do you ever have any communication from the Prison Commissioners in reference to a weekly report showing such a state of things?—Not with reference to that report, because that report goes up whether no; but previous to that report going up arrangements have been made for the transfer to another prison.

7711. I am asking you did you ever receive from the Prison Commissioners any letter with reference to the fact that your prison had not cell accommodation equal to the number of prisoners you have in charge?—No, because there was no call for it, arrangements having been made for people to be sent away.

7712. Not within 24 hours?—No, but there was no occasion to write upon that statement, because arrangements had been previously made to send them away.

7713. The want of accommodation at Strangeways was perfectly well known at all events, or might have been at head-quarters from that weekly report?—The report goes up previous to that.

7714. Would not the weekly report furnish the information?—They have got the information, and it would confirm it.

7715. So that even if from no other source of information it would through the weekly reports come up to the Home Office?—Yes, and then a question is sure to be asked.

7716. You were in the prison service in the county time?—Yes.

7717. Do you think that at that time the magistrates were helping to improve the prison administration?—Yes, perfectly, they instituted prison reform all over the world. It was Lord Carnarvon's Committee, I think, that started it.

7718. So that at the time the Government took over the local prisons the prisons themselves were in process of improvement?—Yes.

7719. Do you think that if the old system had been continued that process of improvement would have continued also?—Yes, I think so.

7720. You have no reason to doubt it?—No.

7721. And it would have kept the present system, I suppose, in touch with local people, the magistrates being acquainted with the local people?—Yes.

7722. We have had some evidence to the effect that under the old system the industries in prison were comparatively in a flourishing condition?—Yes.

7723. They are not so now?—No; at least I do not think so, from what I have seen personally.

7724. Do you hold with the maxim of John Howard, the philanthropist, that if you make men industrious you make them honest?—No, the dishonest are the most industrious.

Capt. C. W. Hill.

7725. Do you attach importance to industrial occupation for men whether they have been in prison or not?—Well, it depends upon the personal motive altogether. If a man does not gain the fruits of his labour it does not matter whether he is industrious or not.

7726. But I suppose something or other still comes to idle hands to do?—Yes.

7727. Do you think that the present system of cranks and treadmills is likely to give prisoners a taste for industry?—If the crank or the treadmill produces money to him he would willingly work on it, he would follow it as his vocation.

7728. Do you think that the occupation prisoners now have on cranks and treadwheels is likely to develop in them a taste for industry?—No more than any other occupation.

7729. What I mean is would they by reason of having been employed on cranks and treadwheels in the prison be any more likely to be industrious after they had left; because you told us, I think, that your idea was to improve a man's chances of getting on as a decent man after he had left the prison?—Yes.

7730. Do you think employment on the crank or treadmill is likely to improve a man's chances of getting on as a decent man after he had left?—Well, it depends on whether he embraces the opportunity of being industrious.

7731. I am speaking of the fact of the crank and the treadwheel. I suppose if men take to industry after they leave prison that they are not so likely to return to a fresh charge?—It depends on where they ve.

7732. You say it is of some importance to the reformation of a criminal that he should if possible be led up to habits of industry?—Yes.

7733. And that the prison period ought to be used for the purpose of developing those habits. Would you say that the destruction or comparative destruction of the prison industries under the present system has had a good deal to do with the increase of old offenders?—No, nothing whatever to do with it.

7734. With regard to the work of the schoolmaster, a good deal of it is done under circumstances which is very trying. I suppose it is probably harder to teach a lot of convicts, being many in number and a large mass passing rapidly through the hands of the master, than any other kind of teaching. It is very trying to the temper and more exhausting to the schoolmaster?—Do you mean reading, writing, arithmetic, and that kind of thing?

7735. Whatever the schoolmaster has to do with him?—Yes.

7736. Would you say that too severe punishments would defeat their own purpose and hurt the prisoner?—Yes, there is no doubt about it.

7737. Would you generally begin with a caution?—Yes, I would try an admonishment first.

7738. You would not give a prisoner three days' bread and water in the cell for a first offence unless it was a very serious one?—No.

7739. Do you think that such a punishment as that would be calculated to exasperate him?—Quite so.

7740. Have you ever had any revolt among your own prisoners?—Never.

7741. Even when you went to a prison where you found that the warders' staff were not all that was desirable you had no outbreak?—No; where I came from there was an assault upon a warder by an epileptic man, but the warder was assisted by the other prisoners.

7742. I suppose if you had you would almost expect a public inquiry into it?—Yes, certainly, if there was a revolt.

7743. You think there should be an inquiry in the case of a revolt?—Yes, certainly.

7744. You say a good deal depends upon the governor?—A great deal does.

7745. And a deal upon the staff?—Yes.

7746. You would say that a very large proportion of punishments raises the presumption that there was something wrong in the governor or something wrong in the staff. Taking two prisons and comparing one with the other, if you found that one prison had two or three times as many as the other, you would think that would be so?—No, I think not; it depends, I think, very much on the longer sentences prisoners.

7747. Assuming that the sentences and the class of prisoners are the same in two prisons, and that one prison has twice as heavy an amount of punishments as the other, would you say that there was something to be desired in the staff?—Well, I would not go so far as that. It depends on the numbers of prisoners and whether they are new ones or old ones.

7748. I am saying, the conditions being the same in the two prisons, both with regard to the class of prisoners and the sentences, would you say that the very marked difference of the punishments being two or three times as large in number in one prison as in the other would call for an inquiry?—Well, I think it would be noticeable.

7749. You say that there are and have been cases within your knowledge in which complaints against warders have been well founded?—Well, I think so.

7750. And that it is a common failure with warders until they have been trained that they should be inclined to be rather harsh to the prisoners?—Yes.

7751. What is the greatest distance that any of your warders sleep away from the prison?—I do not know, there are several over a mile off.

7752. A mile or two shall I say?—Yes.

7753. They receive 3*s.* 6*d.* per week for lodging allowances?—No.

7754. Do they get any allowance for lodging when they sleep outside?—Yes.

7755. Is not that according to the regulations?—That is an allowance which is made in regulating their pension as well.

7756. What allowance do they get for it?—9*l.* 2*s.* a year; they have got to pay their own rent.

7757. Is no warder allowed 3*s.* 6*d.* per week in lieu of quarters?—Yes.

7758. I will ask you, generally, what do you think are the conditions necessary for making prisons as reformatory as possible? First of all you have told us that much depends upon the governor?—The separation of prisoners.

7759. Then the training of warders was another thing?—Yes.

7760. Are there any additions which you think necessary to make on things which you have not drawn to the attention of the Committee?—No, I should make no alteration.

7761. Would you say that the matron in charge should have full responsibility? Would you say also that her authority should be concomitant with her responsibilities?—If she was superintendent I should think so.

7762. Do not you think the accounts of stores and everything else of that kind could be kept just as well by women as by men?—Not according to any experience; that is according to the present staff, of course?

7763. Yes?—Outside I know they would be. I know a great many females that could keep them just as well as men.

7764. (Mr. De Rutzen.) I understand that you are of opinion that, taken as a whole, the present system is very good?—Yes; very good.

7765. You say that when you went to Strangeways you found that there was a good deal which you had to put right?—Only harshness amongst the warders, that is all; I do not mean anything more than that.

7766. But was it anything that took place whilst you were Governor or was it something which had taken place previously?—Oh! nothing before I went.

7767. And that was a complaint which you had to make?—No complaint at all; I only had to stop the harshness of the warders towards the prisoners.

7768. In what way?—In the way of speaking to them. It was merely in that kind of way.

7769. It was harshness in speaking?—Yes.

7770. Nothing more than that?—No.

7771. No dereliction of duty of any sort?—No. I am only talking with regard to the treatment of prisoners personally.

7772. The Visiting Committee, I understand, are very regular in their attendance at Strangeways?—Very.

7773. And, if I may say so, they are attentive to their duties?—Yes.

7774. And as a matter of fact, I suppose, they make their reports to the Secretary of State from time to time?—I believe so.

7775. You, of course, were in the service in 1882 and long before that?—Yes.

7776. I suppose your attention was called to a letter of the Secretary of State which was allowed to be made public and printed in the reports with reference to that matter of visiting justices. I daresay you saw it in the "Times"?—I do not remember it; I do not recall the circumstance.

7777. It was a letter of the 12th June 1882, speaking of visiting justices and what they had done?—No; I do not remember it.

7778. In that sense visiting justices have as much to do even almost as the inspectors themselves; they have the privilege of reporting direct to the Secretary of State on any question?—Yes.

7779. And they are therefore inspectors in every sense of the word?—Quite so.

7780. So far as Strangeways is concerned, they do uncommonly well?—Yes; they are very attentive.

7781. Now about short sentences, what is your view of repeated short sentences; do you think it has any effect?—Well, I really cannot say; it depends so entirely on circumstances.

7782. Most of the short sentences, I suppose, are for such things as drunkenness, disorderly conduct, and so forth?—Yes.

7783. And may I assume that almost all of them are?—A great many are.

7784. They are sentences for three days, and that sort of thing?—For three days and up to seven days.

7785. In your experience do these people return over and over again?—Sometimes, but others you never see again.

7786. Those who come for the first time, as far as you know, and who have been sentenced to three days, perhaps you never see again?—We never see them again.

7787. But as to the great mass of them?—Well, I do not think they come very often.

7788. Do they come back with more?—Yes.

7789. You recognise them as coming back?—Yes.

7790. They come back, and they come back with a longer sentence?—Yes, commencing with a short sentence and afterwards getting longer.

7791. Then they come back with a little longer sentence still?—Yes.

7792. I suppose some of those come back again?—Yes.

7793. With a little longer sentence again?—Yes.

7794. Your prison is a large one of about 700; and it has been nearly up to a thousand?—Male and female.

7795. It was before you were there—I see that that was so?—Yes.

7796. Now with reference to labour, you have no unproductive labour?—No.

7797. You have grinding corn, and so forth, but no unproductive labour?—No unproductive labour.

7798. Looking over the description of employment there and the daily averages, I see that in counties you have grinding wheat, rug-makers, knitters, and needlewomen. Then come labourers?—Yes, they are cleaners, that is keeping the place clean.

7799. Then bag-makers, pickers, shoemakers, tailors, and washing?—Yes.

7800. All those employments can be carried on just as well singly as they could in association?—Yes, excepting the washing.

7801. And no two people could be doing the same thing at the same moment, but it could be carried on in that kind of way?—Yes.

7802. I notice that in building there are these descriptions of employment: bricklayers, carpenters, labourers, whitewashers, paviers, painters, and plumbers, gas-fitters, smiths; a good many of these could be carried on separately?—Yes.

7803. But I see that the average daily number of such prisoners as are capable of doing such work is only 18 and a decimal?—Yes.

7804. Then the whole prison population that are capable of doing work is only 18?—Yes.

7805. Then going on from that, there is "baking, "cooking, cleaning, washing, and repairing the "clothes." All under that head are each capable of being done singly?—Yes.

7806. They amount to a considerable number, 64. Then the "non-effectives, unemployed, awaiting trial," and so forth, come next. They get some employment, but is there any kind of employment other than those which you would like to get for the prison?—I should like to get bag and matmaking; it is remunerative, and it is very easy.

7807. Is it your opinion that it is of the greatest possible use that people who are confined in prison should have constant employment, so far constant at all events as is consistent with their health?—Yes.

7808. And you would like to go back to something like matmaking or something else?—Yes.

7809. Can you suggest anything?—No. Rug-making and those things we have, but mat-making is the only one I can think of besides. It is so very simple.

7810. Do you ever make anything that you do get rid of at Strangeways, or do you only make for your own use? Have you anything to spare?—No; we have got heaps of mail bags; we can make them as fast as we can get them.

7811. But those are only for the Post Office?—That is all.

7812. Of course you could not get rid of them for anything else?—No.

7813. I see that oakum is used; have you any objection to oakum?—Well it does not give a return, certainly.

7814. The only objection to that is, I suppose, that you do not get any return for it?—Not much.

7815. It is something very small?—Yes.

7816. But that is your only objection to it?—That is it.

7817. And is that one of the only things to which you could put very short sentence prisoners?—That is one of the only things.

7818. Although it returns nothing it keeps them employed?—Yes.

7819. And you have never seen any hardship arise from it?—No.

7820. Such as injuring people's fingers in any way?—No, it only hardens the fingers and makes them more capable of hard work.

7821. Just one word with reference to the warder in charge. Of course, he would not be placed in that position unless he was a superior man?—Quite so.

7822. And a warder in charge is, as we know, a man in uniform?—Yes.

7823. And he has a man in uniform similar to himself under him?—Yes.

7824. Do not you think that his position with reference to those immediately below him would be improved by placing him in a better position, like, being allowed to dress in plain clothes?—I quite agree with you.

7825. Then you would be in favour of the position of a warder in charge being improved in that sense?—Yes.

7826. That placing him in plain clothes would rather elevate him?—Yes, I think it would.

7827. Then you would approve of that?—Yes.

Capt. C. W. Hill.

29 Nov. 1894.

7828. There is one other question I want to ask you, and that is with reference to long sentence prisoners in your prison. I notice that in the return here the minds of judges and those who furnish you with prisoners do not seem to run much between 2 years, 18 months, 15 months, and 12 months. They omit the intermediate ones almost entirely?—Yes.

7829. This is the total prison population. I notice there are 119 of two years, which is the hardest sentence that there is, is not that so?—Yes.

7830. And that perhaps accounts for there being only 119. When we come to those of 18 months there are 679 of them and very few between. Then we come to 15 months where there are 217, but when it comes to 12 months there are 1,105. I mean that the go-by is given to the intermediate months altogether?—Yes.

7831. You are aware that in a convict sentence, a three years' penalty is really practically only a sentence of two years and three months?—Yes, he gets the remission.

7832. And we have heard it stated here that that remission is looked upon, of course, as a very great privilege. It goes for marks?—Yes.

7833. What do you say then about a short remission, or whatever you may like to call it, between 12 months and 2 years. If a prisoner earns marks sufficient to warrant that, would you be in favour of allowing a man to earn some little remission of his sentence?—Well, I have been thinking of it all round again after we spoke about it the other day, and I think I would have it as it is.

7834. You think it would be an advantage?—No, I would leave it as it is without any remission, because I think if the judges understand that, they do not put on the sentence in order to meet the remission.

7835. But apart from that, you know it is quite impossible to put down that anybody is able to estimate the punishment for a month because it runs from different periods, as for instance, from two years to 18 months?—You have confined the remission to two years' sentences.

7836. No, to what I call long terms of imprisonment, say from 12 months. I ask simply for the purpose of ascertaining your view. Do you think it would make people who do that look forward to more industrious behaviour?—No, not a bit of it.

7837. You do not think that they would look upon that as anything to be gained?—No.

7838. And that they would rather be without it?—Well, I do not know about that, I do not think that.

7839. Where do you stop between the two. You say you would not think they would wish to be without it?—The prisoner, of course, must not give himself his own sentence.

7840. I do not want to labour this; he is able to earn a remission of nine months in a sentence of three years' penal servitude?—Remission is not always a boon.

7841. Have you been to Wandsworth Prison?—No.

7842. I suppose I may take it that the number of skilled artisans who go to prison is very few?—They are very few; no skilled artisan comes to prison.

7843. May I take it that what I have mentioned here, and, indeed, I have put it down more than once to-day because there are labourers and whitewashers included in that, that there are only about 18 of what I have put down as rather skilled people, such as carpenters and bricklayers, and that sort of people?—They are very few. Now and then you get a good one, but every man who is said to be a carpenter is what carpenters would call a "duffer."

7844. (Chairman.) What is about your average number of weak-minded prisoners, that is, prisoners requiring special supervision?—About seven or eight.

7845. Are you quite satisfied with your hospital accommodation for men?—No; they are erecting an addition to it now.

7846. For the men?—Both for males and females.

7847. Do you get men sent on remand for the purpose of being seen by the doctors?—I am sorry to say, yes.

7848. Do you have a large number of them?—Well, very frequently, but then there is no good comes of it unfortunately, because directly a man comes to prison, supposing he is insane, there is a lull in the symptoms at once, because there is a change from his ordinary life. Directly he comes to prison there is a lull, and unless it is a marked case it does not show itself.

7849. It takes some time for the madness to develop?—Yes.

7850. (Mr. De Rutzen.) As a matter of fact, are there not a good many from time to time in your long experience who have been returned as insane within that period?—Committed as insane?

7851. No. As you say, a great many people are sent to gaol on remand for the purpose of having their sanity tested?—Yes, that is to say, of the remands.

7852. A great many of them are sent there for that particular purpose?—Yes.

7853. Are there a great many instances where they are returned as insane at the end of that time?—Yes.

7854. To whatever court they came from?—Yes.

7855. A great many may, I take it?—Yes.

7856. Which shows the necessity of having some places to which they can be sent for the purpose of seeing whether they are insane or not?—But from the surrounding inhabitants, and from the people which live close to them you would be able to tell better than in any other way.

7857. But a person who comes before the court if he comes at all comes charged with some offence?—Yes.

7858. And his appearance or something has secured the belief that that man is not in his right mind. There is a charge pending against him for which he may be punished or for which he may not be punished entirely in accord with whether or not he happens to be a sane or insane person?—Yes.

7859. And therefore pending that knowledge it is necessary that some inquiry should be made?—They can get the best information from the outside.

7860. (Mr. O'Connor.) How many medical officers have you?—Two. The effect of the lull in the symptoms if they are real is rather inclined to mislead the prison medical officer.

7861. It makes the diagnosis more difficult?—Yes; the doctor who knows him outside will know much more about him than the doctor who knows him inside the prison.

7862. With your large and shifting population and with many of them insane, do you think that two medical officers are enough?—No, I think the work is tremendous.

7863. You think they are rather overworked?—Yes.

7864. You think there ought to be another assistant medical officer?—Yes.

The witness withdrew.

The proceedings were adjourned for a short time.

Maj J. Knox.

Major James Knox called and examined.

7865. (Chairman.) You are the Governor of Armley Prison?—Yes, Leeds Prison as it is called generally.

7866. How long have you been there?—Six months.

7867. Will you say what position you occupied in the service before you went there?—I am a major in the army. I had charge of Kingswood Reformatory near Bristol for four years. I was 20 years all but a couple of months governor of Gloucester Prison, and I have been six months at Leeds.

7868. Speaking generally, do you think that as governor you have sufficient discretion under the present system in all matters relating to prison discipline?—Well, I had more under the counties.

7869. You had more discretion before 1877?—Yes.

7870. Do you think that the present system is sufficiently elastic?—Yes, as a system I think it is.

7871. Do you think it would be advisable to increase the powers of the visiting justices with regard to matters of prison discipline?—Personally I should like it very much.

7872. In what respects would you like to have larger discretionary powers?—I do not know that I can say.

7873. For instance, would you like additional powers in respect of visits to prisoners and letters, and the reading of books?—I think that is very fairly dealt with now, in the libraries and the visits.

7874. In what respect did you lose useful discretionary power consequential upon the change in 1877?—I cannot put my hand on anyone thing; but I felt this, that if I wanted anything I could refer immediately to the Visiting Committee, and it would be talked over between ourselves, but I do not think that is so now. We are all in a groove and we keep in the groove.

7875. We know that the prison service is highly centralised. That must involve considerable difficulties in making known wishes as they arise and special circumstances in any given locality. You think that inevitabiy carries with it certain drawbacks?—I think so.

7876. With regard to the classification of prisoners do you think that the present system can be improved upon?—I do not see how it is to be done, but I think you could have a broad distinction amongst the prisoners of which there is already a base in the present service. There are certain classes of prisoners of whom we need not take the description; they are persons who have been convicted of offences which would not entail further punishment on them if they were reconvicted. Perhaps I may explain it in it this way. A man who is convicted of a larceny, if he is tried for a larceny again before the justices at petty sessions those justices have no power to deal with that man but must send him for trial by indictment because the second offence entails a sentence of penal servitude. I believe I am right in the law.

7877. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Might entail a sentence of penal servitude?—Yes, might entail a sentence of penal servitude, and therefore the petty sessions have not power to deal with it. But there are a certain number of offences we have sent down to us on a circular such as those under the Education Act and others which do not entail further punishment if a prisoner is again tried; and if I may call these "offences" as opposed to "crimes." I think that is a broad distinction, and one which is worthy of consideration for classification purposes.

7878. (Chairman.) You are referring to people who are not guilty of what you may call criminal acts?—Yes, "offences" rather than "crimes."

7879. Have you got a list of them?—Yes. It is the same in every prison.

7880. Then, as I understand, you would treat prisoners convicted of those offences as a class to be kept separate from others?—I think you could make a very good distinction in that way, because I think the criminal is, I was going to say, a born criminal and a thief is a born thief.

7881. Perhaps you will just read that list out to the Committee?—Yes. There are offences under the "Education Act; Local and Borough Acts; Vaccination; Public Health; Hackney Carriage; Highway; Turnpike; Waterman; Railway; Attempt Suicide; Bastardy; Sureties; Vagrancy; Refusing to work in turn; Deserting Family; Hawking without license; Soliciting; Soliciting Alms; Assault; Brothel; Poaching; Trespass; Revenue." I do not know whether I should be in order in saying that a medical inspector of prisons visited my prison at Gloucester, and he was good enough to ask me about this. He said, that he thought there was a great deal too much labour given in prisons in making out descriptions and former records of prisoners He asked me whether I could define any cases where it was not necessary to take the descriptions, and I sent him up the list; and the bulk of the above list is the list that I sent him up 8 or 10 years ago.

7882. But you would not be prepared to say that all those offences which are specified are of an identical character?—No, but I think they are not crimes.

7883. Conceivably, a desertion of a family or an assault might be a crime?—Not in the sense of burglaries and larcenies; poaching is a crime, but it is the sporting instinct in the man that prompts it though it is thieving, perhaps, as much as anything else.

7884. However, I understand the general drift of your position with regard to these offences. Now passing on to other classes, would you be in favour of separate treatment for drunkards?—Yes.

7885. Have you seen, or do you know of, the report of the Inebriates' Committee?—In the House of Lords?

7886. It was a Departmental Committee of the Home Office?—No, I do not know it; I knew there was such a thing, but I do not know the provisions of it.

7887. They recommended that habitual drunkards should be liable to periods of compulsory detention. You would be in favour of that?—Yes; at present the utmost they can get is a month.

7888. Drunkenness, of course, is an offence quite distinct from ordinary criminal offences; and should you say that the three days in prison has any considerable effect upon the class named as habitual drunkards?—No.

7889. They are known to be rather distinct from other classes in the prison?—Quite, I think.

7890. Should you then be in favour generally of a separate treatment?—I should very much. I have frequently had a prisoner say, to me "I have been "in here many times, but it is only for a drunk," as much as to say I scorn the idea of being a thief.

7891. Have you any views as to the treatment?—No, I cannot say I have. I think they should be shut up apart. It should be an imprisonment.

7892. Then taking the case of habitual criminals, are you of opinion that a succession of short sentences on men or women who have taken to crime as a profession acts at all as a deterrent?—I do not think it does.

7893. They lose their fear of prison?—Yes; I do not think they mean it.

7894. Even if because of previous offences a somewhat longer sentence is inflicted, unless that is a material addition to the sentence, would you say that it weighs at all with the offender?—I do not think the man who is going to commit a theft or a burglary looks to the sentence a bit.

7895. Then should you be in favour of cumulative sentences?—Yes, for larcenies, burglaries, housebreakings, and so on.

7896. You have had experience of reformatories?—Yes.

7897. Do you think that the reformatory system is a good one?—Well, I have been 20 years out of it, but I certainly did think it very good when I was there; and, of course, now I can only judge from the residuum, from the re-convicted.

7898. Who come to prison?—Yes; my own experience at Kingswood is that out of 90 odd—I took the trouble to inquire about this of the police and clergy of the parish from which these boys have come—and more than 60 had not in the three years gone back into prison. Some were dead and lost sight of, but some did go back.

29 Nov. 1894.

7899. The record was generally satisfactory?—Yes.

7900. Should you be in favour of raising the age of admission from 16 to 18?—I would rather leave that to the justices, judging by the physical development of the prisoner, and not by the age that he gives.

7901. Well, in principle that amounts to the same thing. I understand that you would be in favour of sending to reformatories all cases fit for those reformatories up to the age of 17?—Not if they were big men.

7902. But I mean if you had an immature lad of 18 or 19 you would send him to a reformatory while you would not necessarily wish to send a lad of 15 or 16 who was more developed?—If he was grown, no.

7903. In other words, you would like to send to reformatories all lads or girls that you could?—Yes.

7904. Then of course that would involve a very clear and distinct system of classification in the reformatories?—Not in the single reformatories; in separate reformatories.

7905. It would not do to associate lads of 17 or 18 with lads of 14 or 15?—No, I always drafted them away as soon as they developed into manhood.

7906. You could have a system under which the more developed lads or girls could go to certain reformatories and the younger ones to their reformatories?—Yes.

7907. Am I to understand that you would be in favour of taking from the prisons as many of the younger prisoners as ever you could in order that they might be sent to reformatories for the special purpose of being reclaimed from crime?—Do you mean instead of giving them a sentence of imprisonment sentencing them more to reformatories?

7908. Yes?—Yes, I think that should be done.

7909. As a general principle, you would be disposed to act upon that?—Yes.

7910. Of course there are a considerable number of young offenders who might be too violent for reformatories to deal with?—I never had any difficulty at Kingswood.

7911. But there, of course, I had rather in my mind the more dangerous classes who up to the present have not been sent to the reformatories but who have been sent to prison. Take, for instance, the case of lads of 17 or 18 who will probably develop into criminals. It is quite conceivable that they might be beyond the power of the reformatories?—Yes, but then you have got the prison at your back.

7912. Would you be in favour of establishing a half-way house between reformatories and prisons where such young offenders could be sent?—And associated?

7913. Yes, and associated, and have the opportunity of learning productive work or a trade?—Yes, if there was a prison at your back; that is to say, if a well-developed young fellow was sent to a reformatory and it was found that it was beyond the powers of the reformatory to treat him, I would have the power somehow, I do not know where, to remit him to prison for the rest of his sentence.

7914. But I have in my mind an institution which should really be in the nature both of a reformatory and a prison; that is to say, that they should have all the methods and force in work at the reformatories for reclaiming and educating lads and at the same time that they should have the coercive and punitive resources of a prison in the event of a lad being contumacious?—I think it would be better to expel him to a prison.

7915. You do not think that the halfway house offers any advantages?—If you mean by a halfway house a bigger and more advanced reformatory for the better developed men, yes; but I have one or two persons in my mind now whom I do not think any reformatory treatment would ever do any good to. There is a man going to be tried next week whom nothing would reform.

7916. You think, at any rate, it would be absolutely essential to have power by some process or other—by a magistrate's order or by some process of the court—to send an offender who is incorrigible to prison?—Yes, and I do not think there would be 1 per cent. of them.

7917. Generally speaking, you would be strongly in favour of very special treatment and attention being paid to young offenders?—Yes, I am.

7918. With regard to punishments, are you in favour of the plank bed?—I have very rarely had complaints about the plank bed.

7919. You do not think it is an evil?—I think that it accentuates very much the difference between the prison life and the home life. Prison is a very comfortable place for a great many people who come there—much more comfortable than their homes are; but they have not got the plank bed at home.

7920. Are you in favour of unproductive labour?—No.

7921. Have you the crank?—I have a treadwheel by which we grind the whole-meal for Stafford, Derby, Wakefield, and for myself.

7922. You have not a crank in the cell?—No.

7923. Do you consider that punishment as far as possible should be rather in the direction of suspension of privileges rather than being of a direct character, such as dietary punishment?—No, the dietary punishment is a very strong weapon in the hands of governors.

7924. Do you approve of the dietary punishment?—Yes.

7925. The effect is to lower the prisoner?—In his health?

7926. Constitutionally?—Well he is always inspected by the doctor day by day.

7927. Still the general effect would be that no prisoner could be reduced to No. 1 diet without its having some effect upon his constitution; it may be only temporarily, but still it would have some effect?—Well, I am not in a position to say that. I should not have thought it for a three days' diet.

7928. But you think that that is a useful punishment, and one that ought to be maintained?—Yes, I do.

7929. Now to come to the question of labour. I understand you are against unproductive labour?—Yes.

7930. Are you in favour of giving to the prisoners as much productive labour as possible?—Yes, if it can be got, certainly. I do not quite follow what you mean; do you mean that they should be put to anything that does not pay?

7931. I ask whether you are in favour of their being put to labour that is productive in itself and calculated to teach them work which may be useful when they come out of prison?—Yes, if possible.

7932. At Leeds you have a good many hand looms?—Yes, we weave the flannel, I believe, for the whole of the prison service.

7933. You have 40 or 50 looms, I think?—Yes, I could not tell off hand, but it is about 40 I think.

7934. In passing, I observe that at Leeds the looms are in the prisoners' cells?—Yes.

7935. Where they sleep?—Yes.

7936. Do you think that is advisable?—No.

7937. But you have nowhere else to put them?—No, that is so. When we did weaving at Gloucester towards the end of the time. I removed the looms and made the men sleep in separate cells.

7938. I suppose there is dust set up and that it diminishes the air space in the cell?—I should think so.

7939. That in your opinion is distinctly undesirable?—Yes, but I have no other room for the prisoners; the prisoner must occupy that cell whether the loom is there or not. I have only a few vacancies now.

7940. With regard to this weaving do you know whether the prisoners who are taught to weave when they come into prison take to weaving subsequently?—Very rarely I should think.

7941. These hand looms do not train them for working in the big mills?—No, I should think not.

7942. Do you think from your experience that trades acquired in prison are followed when the prisoner gets released?—No.

7943. Have you any suggestion to make on that point to induce a prisoner to learn a trade which he could follow afterwards?—Well, at Gloucester I learned printing under John Bellows in order to teach the prisoners to print, and I think we taught about 16 or 17, but I do not think one of them became a printer afterwards.

7944. You have no suggestion to make on that particular point?—We have tried it, but you cannot ensure the work.

7945. Then perhaps it is best to try and teach prisoners the value of methodical work and methodical habits?—Yes.

7946. And industrial pursuits, so that they may settle down more comfortably at whatever they like when they go out of prison?—Yes.

7947. Do you think that industrial labour in prison is more likely to be a moral than an industrial training?—Yes, I think the prisoner would rather shirk when he comes out doing anything he learned in prison. The bulk of them would.

7948. But you have no doubt as to the moral value of labour in prison to the prisoner?—Well, I cannot say, I have no doubt.

7949. You think it is better for a prisoner to do some work with his hands in the shop as an artisan, or at a loom, or at some other occupation, than to be thrown back upon himself in his cell?—Than picking oakum, certainly.

7950. Anything that would employ his mind is better than keeping him in a state of mental vacuity?—Yes.

7951. You are certainly of that opinion?—Yes.

7953. It is a question of supervision?—Yes.

7954. You have no garden at Leeds, I think?—No.

7955. Had you at Gloucester?—No; none that was cultivated by the prisoners.

7956. Do you think that gardening and agricultural labour are desirable for prisoners if you can get it?—It certainly is for the younger prisoners. At Kingswood I put every boy into the field when he first came. I gave him six months at digging.

7957. With good results?—Afterwards I passed them through the different shops, and if I found one more fitted to be a tailor I made a tailor of him; if he was more fitted to look after pigs I gave him that to do.

7958. Did you find that the boys took subsequently to the trade they had learned on their discharge from the reformatory?—I cannot say; I taught them no trade except shoemaking and tailoring; but, as a rule, I got them into service on farms, and some of them went to sea, some enlisted, and some emigrated.

7959. Do you think it is desirable that warders should be more specially trained for the purpose of teaching industrial work?—We have some very good warders, but I doubt very much whether you will get a very skilled artisan to become a prison warder.

7960. Do you think that the quality of the warders is up to the mark?—I have had very little to complain of in men under my charge.

7961. They are a very good class of men?—Yes, as a rule.

7962. But still you would say that the better they are the more advantageous it would be for the prisoners?—Yes.

7963. Have you had any complaint as to the hours of labour?—No, I have not had any; but I think the position of the warder compares very favourably with what the position of the same man would be if he had not come into the prison service.

7964. You do not think the hours are too long?—They are long, but I do not think they are too long compared with the privilege a man gets by his 14 days' leave, and being sure of his Saturday half holiday, and that sort of thing.

7965. Do any of your warders sleep in the prison and are liable to be called up by the ringing of bells?—Everybody in their turn is. It comes about once a week to warders, but to females always.

7966. Then when a bell is rung by a prisoner, does the warder answer the bell?—The night watchman answers it, who rouses the officer in charge, and he and the night watchman together go to the prisoner's cell and see what he wants.

7967. The night watchman does not go to the cell in the first instance?—He may go and ask what he wants, but he cannot go into the cell. He cannot communicate with the prisoner directly.

7968. So that the warder who is sleeping in has to attend to it?—Yes.

7969. Does that night duty reckon towards his hours of work?—It is beyond the 10 hours a day, but it comes about once a week.

7970. It is over and above the 10 hours a day, and it is not specially paid for?—No; but if that man were kept up very much it would be made up to him. The other day there was something wrong with the steam early in the morning. The night watchman was afraid there was something wrong. As a matter of fact there was not anything wrong, but the night watchman thought there was, and a warder was up two or three hours over it. I took the responsibility of making that up to him in the way of leave afterwards. There are various necessities where, as governor, strictly speaking, I have no right to do that sort of thing; but we know it would be condoned by the Prison Commissioners if there was any fault.

7971. What was the special work that this officer was subjected to?—He had to go down and rake out the fire and make up the fire again to make the steam all right.

7972. Had he been in charge more than one night a week?—No; it was his turn to sleep in.

7973. As it happened it was work which was special for him on that occasion?—Yes; because he was working from 3 or 4 in the morning until the ordinary time, so that I made up the two hours to him in other ways.

7974. Are the warders who come on duty at 6 in the morning liable to be kept on duty until 8 or 10 in the evening?—Those who sleep in are; at least, the officers who sleep in can go away from a quarter to 4 until a quarter to 6 to get their tea. That is the rule throughout the prison service; but at Gloucester they were allowed 40 minutes. At Leeds they have two hours for their tea.

7975. Then do they come back and stay?—They come back at half-past 6 and stay until 8. Then the night watchman relieves them.

7977. Are they kept beyond half-past 8?—No; it might be so just at odd times, but not as a rule.

7978. Have you a first-class matron?—I do not know; I believe she is a third-class matron, but I really do not know. I only think that is so because she has just been promoted to be matron; I cannot tell you her class. I think, however, she cannot be a first-class matron, because the matron whom she has replaced has gone away to be a first-class matron.

7979. Then did your last matron or does your present matron go round to all the female prisoners?—Yes, I only go once a week.

7980. As a third-class matron, does she do that?—Whoever is in charge has to do that. I should say she would have to do that whether she was a chief warder or not.

22 Nov. 1894.

7981. Whether a third-class matron or a first-class matron?—Yes.

7982. Whichever of them is in charge of the prison at the time performs exactly the same duty?—I think so.

7984. Do you think that the present relation of the matron to the chief warder, in the absence of the governor, is satisfactory?—Well, I was told that I should probably be asked that question and I asked the matron. She says that she has no feeling whatever that she ought to be, except under the chief warder's orders. I would not say orders, but she feels that he should be there for her to lean upon.

7985. I suppose you have never known a case in which a chief warder had any wish to usurp authority over a matron in the discharge of her special duties?—No; being in charge he would have the power of punishing; the matron would not punish.

7986. Have you any view as to the best and most convenient size for prisons?—Personally, I think my size at Gloucester was about the size. I have had 262 prisoners there. I should think it is as much as a governor can do properly to have 300 male prisoners to look after very well.

7987. You are not a believer in the larger prisons?—No, I am not.

7988. You have not yourself had any experience of larger prisons?—No, I left 505 yesterday morning, men and women.

7989. And you find your hands are quite full enough with that number?—Yes.

7990. When do you think a deputy-governor becomes necessary?—I think that is only a name, because the next in command is your deputy, whether he is a chief warder or a principal warder, or whatever he is.

7991. Well, presumably, a deputy-governor has higher qualifications for his work than a chief warder has?—If it is a question of chief warder in charge and a higher qualification for being in charge, that is one thing; do you mean in that way, or do you mean whether my second in command should be a man of my own class of life, or a man of the warders' class of life?

7992. Yes?—Well, I have not found the want of it.

7993. Do you think it would be a satisfactory practice to appoint chief warders as warders in charge?—I think it is the most retrograde movement that ever was done.

7994. That you mean is since 1877?—I do not know when it was.

7995. Were chief warders made warders in charge before 1877 in the smaller prisons?—I could not tell you the date.

7996. You say it is retrograde. It is retrograde against what?—I think the tendency of all our official life has been to level up, and though amongst the warder class, and the non-commissioned officer class, I have some men whom I highly esteem and think very highly of; I think there is wanting amongst that class a sort of that delicate sense of honour which, for want of a better word, I will say exists amongst gentlemen. Although they are highly honourable, honest, and straightforward themselves, they would do little things which I may call sharp practice, and I think the tendency of the whole age is that they should be officers who are sans peur et sans reproche.

7997. Then you think that the appointing warders in charge from chief warders in prisons of 100 is not satisfactory?—No; I think they should be people of one's own class of life.

7998. You would not debar warders from promotion?—No; but amongst that class I mean you may very often pick out a man who is admirably fitted for it, and I would not debar that man from getting on, but to say that as a rule I think is a great mistake.

7999. Should you be in favour of establishing training schools for prison officials?—No, I think we train them ourselves.

8000. But when a warder is selected he is absolutely immature and ignorant of the duties he has to perform, and yet he has to begin at once?—He is appointed on probation and we teach him.

8001. You do not think it would be desirable to select a couple of prisons and appoint a highly experienced staff whose special duty it should be to receive probationers, train them methodically and scientifically in their duties, and let them work out their probationary period under their eyes so that they might see that they were fully qualified to be established as warders?—No, I think not; I think they are trained very well under the present system.

8002. But do not you find in the present system a great variety of men among warders, in fact all prison officers, some being highly efficient, some less so than others, perhaps, and some perhaps inefficient; but would not you get a higher standard of excellence by passing them through some such school as I have indicated?—It never has occurred to me before. I feel that it is the same as in a regiment; the regiment trains your recruits.

8003. Yes, but you do not send your recruit straight away into the field; he has to go to the depôt and go through some period of severe training before he is selected as fit for service?—I do not know about that.

8004. However you have not thought of that particular point?—No, I have not.

8005. In your experience do you think that the prison discipline and the system of imprisonment produces insanity?—No, I think not.

8006. You are satisfied on that point?—We have never been able to trace any insanity to imprisonment. It is true that in the last week or two there has been a case in my own prison of a man who was sentenced to be flogged at an interval of three months, first 30 lashes and then 20. In the interim he has been removed to an asylum, and the doctor thinks it is very much owing to the fear of the second flogging; but with that exception I do not think the average imprisonment has produced any result of that kind.

8007. Was there any idea that this man was in a dangerous state mentally?—Originally?

8008. No, before the first flogging?—No, he was a man of very bad character; he was a young fellow.

8009. But there had been no suspicion that he was verging on insanity?—No, none whatever.

8010. The attention of the medical officer had not been specially directed to him?—No.

8011. (Mr. O'Connor.) How long had he been in?—He was sentenced at the assizes which were held on the 25th of July, and he delayed his first flogging by pretending he had something wrong with his lungs and spitting of blood, which we found was due to a laceration of the inside of the gums. Then he had his 30 lashes, and, speaking without book, I should think it was a month after that that he was put into association.

8012. What was his offence?—Robbery with violence.

8013. He was sentenced by the court?—Yes, by Mr. Justice Grantham.

8014. He was sentenced to 30 lashes?—Yes, and to 20 more in three months. The other three had had their 50.

8015. And in the interval he became insane?—Yes.

8016. Was it a case of violent mania, or what?—No, it was not.

8017. Do you think that the treatment of unconvicted prisoners is satisfactory?—Well, I do not know how it could be made otherwise.

8018. Do you think the diet is sufficient?—The diet is, I think, very meagre.

8019. A man with money can make that good, but a man without money cannot?—Yes. Half of my unconvicted prisoners come from Leeds and Bradford, and there are, I should think, 20 dinners come in every Sunday for the unconvicted from Leeds.

8020. But those who have not friends outside with money you think have a very meagre diet?—Yes.

8021. And it lowers them?—I tried at Gloucester to experiment, but I had not been long enough there to produce any results. I weighed two or three men at first, but there was not enough done in that way to generalise them.

8022. Should you be in favour of giving them better diet?—Yes, I think they ought to have better food.

8023. Or any additional privileges, such as smoking?—Well, I do not see why they should smoke. They are allowed to drink, but they are not allowed to smoke.

8024. What Prisoners' Aid Society have you got? One at Leeds and one at Bradford. At Bradford for the Bradford prisoners and at Leeds for the Leeds prisoners.

8025. Do they work satisfactorily?—Well, I think it is very well in its work. I mean the Leeds one.

8026. But the Bradford one?—I have not had so much experience in that, but they had been unfortunate in their agents before I went to Leeds.

8027. Can you suggest any improvement in the way of Prisoners' Aid Societies working in connexion with prisoners?—No; I think they do really admirable work. At Leeds we have a very good male agent and a very good female agent, who visit the gaol every morning and see every male and every female prisoner before they go out.

8028. (Sir Algernon West.) Do they visit inside the gaol?—Yes, they come inside.

8029. (Chairman.) Under what authority do they come inside?—Mine, that is to see the prisoner just before going out. I do not know of any authority but I suppose there must have been an authority somewhere, I had an authority at Gloucester from the Prison Commissioners.

8030. Do you know of any authority at Leeds. Was it their custom to come and see prisoners before their discharge?—That was a custom there before I went there.

8031. Then there must have been some special arrangement made by the Prison Commissioners?—Possibly. Just before leaving Gloucester I thought there might possibly be a difficulty with my successor a chief warder, and I wrote to Mr. Ruggles-Brise to get authority for the male agent to come in, and also for the female lay agent to come in whenever the matron should apply for her.

8032. Do you find that the visiting justices at Leeds take any interest in the work of the prison?—No, they do not. A board of them come once a quarter and I have asked them many times to come more frequently. Since I have been there they have come three times. Except on the actual quarter day they do not come. At Gloucester we had a visit from them every other week and I think it is very essential to a governor that that should be so. It is a protection to the governor.

8033. Do you suggest any way by which their interest could be increased?—Well, their interest will not increase unless they have more to do with the working of the system and I think it is human nature that it will be so.

8034. Could you suggest any way in which they could have further powers put upon them?—I have not thought it out at all. Various suggestions have been made to me.

8035. Have they ever expressed any views to you on the subject?—No, they have not.

8036. They have not expressed a wish that additional duties and other responsibilities should be put upon them?—No.

8037. (Sir Algernon West.) Just in connexion with that, you evidently wish that great interest should be taken by the visiting justices and some more power given them. Would you think it a good thing to have ladies' aid committees to deal with the women's side of your prison?—No, I should not. I think one female agent is quite enough. She talks to the matron, and then any case is brought to my notice.

8038. That is the female visitor of the Prisoners' Aid Society?—Yes.

8039. And she works satisfactorily?—Yes, very.

8040. As to the chaplain system, do not you think it would be very advisable that there should be some change in the preachers at your prisons. I am not asking you a personal question, but from your general experience, do not you think the prisoners get tired of the same chaplain?—I think if a five years' change, or something of that sort, could be made it would be a very good thing.

8041. There was a warder, I think, when I was at Leeds by the name of Greaves who had been, before the taking over by the Government of these prisons, a skilled instructor. He had additional payment for being a skilled instructor. Do you know anything about that?—I could not say without referring, but that used to be the case under the old local authority that there were trade instructors who were specially paid. But trade instructors are not paid now, and I do not think he can have been reduced in his salary.

8042. No, I do not go to that extent; but do you think it was a good system which gave some extra additional payment to warders who were really skilled and able to instruct?—Yes, I think you would get a better class of skilled instructors.

8043. You think skilled instructors are more valuable?—Yes.

8044. Do you think it would be advisable that by way of encouraging good conduct amongst prisoners they should be allowed to earn some small wage?—They do earn a gratuity now.

8046. But that is different from a wage. What I gather you mean by a benefit is that, for instance, he has a plank bed, and a well-conducted man ceases the use of that plank bed?—Yes, he has a mattress.

8047. You would hardly call that an inducement. It is a cessation of punishment, not a gift by way of any encouragement?—No.

8048. And the woman has not even that inducement?—No.

8049. Because she has never had a plank bed?—She has a mattress. You never take the mattress away from her.

8050. Then would you be willing to allow women to earn some small wage?—Yes, but the per-centage of women who earn marks is something ridiculously small.

8051. Is that because they have very short sentences?—Of the women who were sentenced during this last year, 1893–94, there are 92·27 per cent. of them who have one month's sentence and less; so that leaves you only with 7·73 who earn marks.

8052. I quite see that, but the principle would be the same?—Yes.

8053. And you would not object?—I think a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush. Very often I think if there could be some encouragement then and there it would be a good thing, and something that you could take away.

8054. (Mr. De Rutzen.) I think I heard you say that you thought an increase of power to the governor would be a good thing?—Yes.

8055. Then I heard you say that you gave three hours extra leave to a man which you had no power to do, but that you did it, and you were quite sure you would be condoned by the Commissioners?—Yes.

8056. Do I understand by that that there is that sort of going back, that things of that description may be done by the governor, but that they are not done?—Well, they are not authorised to be done.

29 Nov. 1894.

5057. But I mean as a general matter of fact?—I do not think that individually the Commissioners would find any fault with me for what I did.

8058. But if you did exceed the letter of the law they would not take the smallest notice of it?—I think they would condone it. I have never been found fault with yet.

8059. Could you suggest any single thing in which the governor's power should be increased?—I do not know that I can just now off-hand.

8060. You know what days the visiting committee are coming, I suppose, or do they come when they please and without giving notice?—At Leeds they always give me notice. At Gloucester I very often used to write and ask them to fix a day. I used to remind them of it. There were three visitors and they had alternate weeks. I used to write to the gentleman whose turn it was and say "Please re-"member next week is your time to come," and perhaps they would inform me when they were coming, and perhaps not.

8061. Then you look upon them as a great reliance to lean upon, do you not?—Yes, they were great friends at Gloucester.

8062. And they have very great powers. They kept a regular book of minutes?—Yes, they kept a book of minutes, but I do not think they had any power except to punish.

8063. But they have power to report anything to the Secretary of State?—Yes.

8064. If they found anything wrong of any sort or description, they would have power to report it to the Secretary of State?—Yes.

8065. And are therefore really, in a sense, inspectors of prisons in that sense, that if they saw anything wrong which they could find fault with they could immediately, quite apart from the commissioners, report direct to the Secretary of State?—Yes, and they do.

8066. They are independent of the commissioners? Yes.

8067. (Miss Orme.) When you were at Gloucester some of the female prisoners used to do washing for the outside public, did not they?—Yes; we earned about 240*l.* a year.

8068. You do not do that at Leeds?—No.

8069. Have you any reason for that?—We have as much as we can do for the 500 prisoners.

8070. The prison washing?—Yes.

8071. So that it is not from want of custom but from want of labour that you do not do it?—Yes, from want of labour. The washing for prisoners who continually change as ours do, our prison population changing 11 times in the course of a year, gives a great deal of washing to be done.

8072. I notice that you employ some women in needlework and knitting?—Yes, on repairs.

8073. How many women do you have brought into the prison in one day? What is about the largest number?—14 or 15, with an average of four or five.

8074. Then you have ample accommodation in the reception ward, I suppose?—Yes.

8075. Have you a separate cell for each woman?—Yes.

8076. I mean, when she is brought in, in the reception ward?—Yes.

8077. Have you also boxes in which they are put before they have the bath? Have you seen those used in prison?—No.

8078. In some prisons they have a box into which the prisoner is put when she first comes in, and then after having a bath she is put into a clean cell?—No.

8079. What is your method?—They are received and put in their reception cell.

8080. In the separate cell?—Yes.

8081. That is when they still have on their own clothes?—Yes.

8082. Then after they have had a disinfecting bath they go back to that same cell?—I could not be sure of that.

8083. Your matron would know that probably?—Yes.

8084. You were telling us about the hours of the warders. In the case of the female side of the prison the night watchman would not be the one to answer the bell?—No.

8085 The warder in charge does it?—Yes.

8086. You do not call it night work; that partial work of being liable to be awoke by a bell does not count as part of her work?—No.

8087. She has that extra?—Yes, all the female warders sleep in every night.

8088. And they take it in turn to answer the bells?—Yes.

8089. And that is not counted in their regular work, but they have their 10 hours besides?—Yes.

8090. What is the latest hour you think your matron and the reception warders would be kept up when there is a heavy reception?—Never after 10 o'clock.

8091. You never get a late delivery?—No. I am not allowed to open the prison gate after 10 o'clock.

8092. But supposing one came in at 10, how long would you think the matron and warder would be kept before she was finally put away in her cell?—The Leeds prisoners come up in bulk about 5 or 6 in the afternoon.

8093. So that it is very rare to have late hours for the warders?—Yes.

8094. You gave us the very large per-centage you have of short sentences amongst the women?—That is not mine, that is the Commissioners' report.

8095. I presume you have a very large proportion?—About the same.

8097. Supposing these were being treated in a separate prison the matron would have much fewer ordinary prisoners under her charge of course. Do you think that it would be a great advantage from the point of view of a reformative system that the matron should be able to study each case and that she should have very few to look after and that she should be able to devote her time to the study of those ordinary prisoners apart from the habitual drunkards?—To exercise a reformative element over them?

8098. Yes?—I doubt it very much.

8099. You do not think if she studied every particular case and studied the sort of work to give her that it would have an appreciable effect. I am speaking of the ordinary prisoners, not of drunkards?—They must have the same class of work. I do not see what other work they could do.

8100. Do you think any greater care can be exercised in choosing work according to whether a woman will have to earn her living when she leaves the prison, or whether she will return to the ordinary domestic duties of her family?—I cannot see how it can be done; there are only just two or three classes of work that we have.

8102. Your second officer in command is what?—He should be a chief warder, but, as a matter of fact, I have not got one at the present moment. I have a principal warder.

8103. You spend all your time at the prison, you are always there?—Yes, a good part of the day; from half-past 6 in the morning on and off till 6 at night.

8104. As a matter of fact, you pass the official day there?—Yes.

8105. And you have got plenty to do?—Yes.

8106. If you had a larger number I suppose you would consider it necessary to have some further assistance in the way of deputy-governors or warders?—Yes.

8107. Do you notice that the population which goes into your prison is, from a physical or mental point of view, rather below the average of the general population?—I should say so.

8108. In point of health it is rather lower?—Yes.

8110. In any way?—Yes.

8111. Have you a medical officer at all at Leeds?—A resident?

8112. Yes?—No.

8113. So far do you think your staff is satisfactory?—Yes.

8114. To that extent, then, would you say your medical staff is satisfactory or not satisfactory?—Yes, I think it is satisfactory.

8115. You think it is a satisfactory thing to have no resident medical officer?—Well, if he spends the greater part of his day there that is sufficient.

8116. Is it true that complaints have been made by the prisoners at Leeds that they have not had adequate medical attendance?—I have not heard of it.

8117. You have never known of cases where a man has asked to see the doctor and the doctor has not been on the premises?—Yes, they have sent for the doctor frequently.

8118. You are not prepared to say that in Leeds people have not complained that there was no medical officer, that he was a medical man in considerable practice in the town that he had not time to give to the prisoners, and that they had not proper medical attendance?—No.

8119. At any rate you have no resident medical officer?—Yes, that is so.

8120. The man who was medical officer is dead?—Yes.

8121. He was a man in considerable practice, was he not?—I could not tell you that.

8122. But he was in general practice outside?—Yes; he told me one day he had 30 persons to go and see after he left the prison.

8123. Thirty private patients to see in a single day?—Yes.

8124. And that practice of 30 private patients was supplemented by such attendance as he could give to the prison?—He had to be at the prison for certain hours of the day.

8125. But he was not there altogether?—No.

8126. Is your staff of warders sufficient?—I do not think so.

8127. Then not only in point of medical attendance but in point of warder staff you think something might be done to improve the condition of things at Leeds?—Yes.

8128. Your staff is practically starved at present?—Yes, we can do very little with it.

8129. Of your warders are some military and some civilians?—Yes.

8130. If you were to draw any distinction between them, which would you prefer apart from your military proclivities?—Well, all the senior warders I have had to do with in 20 years have not been military men, and I think very highly of them.

8131. Some of them I suppose would be fit to be chief warders in charge of a small prison?—They would like it.

8132. I suppose that here and there you find men in the prison service who are governors of prisons who have themselves been warders, and who are admirable governors?—I believe so.

8133. I suppose if a man makes an admirable governor at a large prison he would be fit to be a chief warder in a small prison?—Yes.

8134. Now about the schoolmasters. What schoolmasters' staff have you?—One.

8135. Is he a warder also?—Yes.

8136. As a warder his hours are from 6 until 6?—Yes.

8137. But as a schoolmaster under the regulations his hours are only from 8 to 6?—But he does a great deal of warder's duty.

8138. That is to say, you use the man as a schoolmaster under regulations which prescribe that the schoolmaster's hours shall be only from 8 to 6, and you make him not only a schoolmaster but also a warder, and you give him extra hours besides?—I think the position is that he is a warder acting as schoolmaster.

8139. But if he was not a warder and only a schoolmaster he would have less hours to work?—Yes.

8140. But being a warder besides being a schoolmaster he has actually longer hours?—Yes.

8141. As to the case of flogging which you told us about. I think it was a case of a sentence by Mr. Justice Grantham. That was in open court, was it not?—Yes.

8142. The prospect of a second flogging appears to have had at any rate a very serious effect on one of the prisoners sentenced. He is alleged to have become insane partly from dread of a repetition of his first experience. It is a very serious thing to sentence a man to flogging?—I think so.

8143. The Visiting Committee can sentence a prisoner to flogging, cannot they?—Yes, two members can.

8144. (Chairman.) How many lashes can they give?—I do not think there is any limit. The statute says "personal correction."

8145. (Mr. O'Connor.) And after having prescribed one flogging, on another visitation they can prescribe flogging again for the same man?—Yes.

8146. When the Visiting Committee comes who conducts the prosecution before them?—I suppose the governor would.

8147. Did it ever strike you that seeing the governor in charge of the place who has the man actually under his control is the prosecutor, the Visiting Committee are only a couple of justices who have the power of giving, I will not say unlimited flogging, but of giving very considerable flogging to a man over and over again, did it ever occur to you that it might be a good thing to allow publicity to the trial by the visiting justices?—For prison offences do you mean?

8148. Yes, for such offences as may entail corporal punishment?—There is no doubt publicity is a good thing.

8149. I can quite understand from a governor's point of view it would be rather a nuisance?—Oh dear no; I do everything I possibly can to stop flogging.

8150. I mean the introduction of reporters?—Oh, I should not mind that; you know there are offences as to which after an application to the Home Secretary the Visiting Committee can primarily deal with them in the prison where reporters are admitted. Supposing a man commits an offence just before going out, and the Visiting Committee think the man should be sent before the court, the evidence is taken and sent to the Home Secretary, who decides whether or not a prosecution is to be instituted. That would be in open court.

8151. But the fact is that a man under the charge of the governor can be brought up before a couple of justices coming from the outside, and there in the quiet of the prison on the prosecution of the chief governor of the gaol a man can be sentenced over and over again to flogging?—Yes.

8152. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) How many cases of flogging have you known in prison?—For prison offences?

8153. Yes?—Four in Gloucester.

8154. And in Leeds?—None at present.

8155. So that this question of the powers of justices to flog is not a very important one, as in 20 years you have had only four cases?—There were three last year, as Mr. O'Connor points out.

Maj. J. Knox.

29 Nov. 1894.

8156. That is at Leeds?—But I was not there.

8157. This has been in force for 20 years, but you have been at Leeds only six months. Your treadmill at Leeds is a productive machine?—Yes, we grind corn with it.

8158. Your treadmill at Gloucester was as unproductive machine?—It pumped water just to clean out the sewers.

8159. Do you think it had any important effect on the mind of prisoner engaged in grinding corn?—No.

8160. I suppose being on the treadmil they hardly realise what they are doing?—No, I think a great many of them do not know.

8161. What was the effect on your prison at Gloucester of the change of administration; was there any marked distinction in consequence?—We lost all our productive labour.

8162. Was not that in consequence of the diminution of the prisoners?—Well, I think it was partly that. We had to give up the weaving and the mat-making, and we had a large trade in tin-smith's work, such as making cans, and so on; and then we did the washing and printing.

8163. On the change in 1878 were they stopped immediately?—No, they gradually died out. The washing died out. I think it was because the rate paid was rather less than the rate supposed to be paid outside, and gradually the prison industry dropped off.

8164. Why was the tin-pot making done away with? Was it for want of prisoners?—Partly from that and want of some one to look after the men.

8165. And mat-making?—The mat-making and weaving I had no special instructor for. That gradually fell off, and we had to stop the mat-making.

8166. Was that in consequence of the falling off in the number of prisoners or by the orders of the commissioners?—Mat-making was by the orders of the commissioners.

8167. In point of treatment of prisoners and discipline what changes took place?—I do not think much.

8168. The prisoners went on practically the same?—I think so.

8169. And instead of being controlled by the Visiting Committee you are controlled by the inspectors?—And by the commissioners; the inspectors only see that the commissioners' orders are carried out; I have never looked upon the inspector as having control over me.

8170. He can give no orders?—No.

8171. The Visiting Committee did give you orders?—Yes; I was the servant of the Visiting Committee the same as I am the servant of the Government now.

8172. Then you became the servant of the Commissioners who very rarely see you?—Once a year.

8173. And they use the inspector as their eyes?—Yes, he goes to see that their orders are carried out.

8175. You were rather intimating that you wished to be more in touch with what I may call "your masters"?—No, I think the Visiting Committee are a great help to a governor. I think he can talk about various prisoners, and they are also a protection to him, because a prisoner may bring a charge of cruelty or anything of that sort against me and I have no protection, whereas if a Visiting Committee comes once every alternate week every man has the power of complaining to them.

8176. But that Visiting Committee does act as a protection to you, does it not?—At Gloucester it did, but they have not come so often at Leeds.

8177. There they are deficient in the performance of their duty; at least they do not come so often as at Gloucester?—I suppose they are gentlemen engaged in business who cannot come so much as the justices in the county.

8178. You would rather like, I gather, to restore the prison industries that formerly existed?—Yes; but then I am not a fair person to ask that, perhaps.

8179. Would it be possible to associate the Visiting Committee more than is done at present with the management of a prison as the agent of the Commissioners?—I should think it would be advisable.

8180. What powers beyond those they now exercise would you give to them so as to restore their interest?—A great many have been suggested; amongst them the appointment of warders, and so on.

8181. Do you think that is a matter which would interest them very much?—I do not know whether it would give the Visiting Committee any more interest.

8182. Would it be possible to associate them more with the reception and discharge of prisoners; that is to say, that they should see all prisoners on reception?—I do not think that would be possible.

8183. Or within a few days?—Well if they came every other week, you see, they would see every man with more than a seven days' sentence.

8184. They might have them brought before them?—Yes.

8185. I suppose in the old days the prisoners were reported?—No; the visitors used to see them in the same way.

8186. And the Visiting Committee were not placed essentially then in a different position from what they are now?—No; of course they had the control of the expenditure.

8187. That would be impracticable now; you could not in any way associate them with the expenditure?—I should think not.

8188. You say you are under-staffed now; was that your experience at Gloucester as well as at Leeds?—Yes.

8189. Did you often have temporary warders in at Gloucester?—We are only allowed to have them on special occasions, such as for assizes, sessions, and things of that sort, and for men under medical observation, and so on.

8190. If you have men in hospital under observation you are obliged to get a temporary warder?—Yes.

8191. Is that of frequent occurrence?—It must be when there are unconvicted men who are at all off the balance of their minds.

8192. But you have no staff sufficient to deal with a case of that sort?—No. I think it was Sir William Harcourt's order that any man who was unconvicted, if the doctor thought he was not mentally fit, should be always under the superintendence of a temporary officer.

8193. Or a permanent officer if you had one, I suppose?—We always have to employ a temporary officer for that purpose; he is relieved by the permanent man at times.

8194. Is it desirable to get temporary warders?—I do not like it.

8195. How do you get your temporary warders?—In fact the other warders generally know someone who is out of work.

8196. So that anybody who is out of work is brought in as a temporary warder?—Yes, but they are not a very great help.

8197. At the assizes at Gloucester were these the men you sent into court?—Sometimes; you would use a temporary officer in the prison.

8198. And send the permanent officer to the court?—Yes.

8199. At Leeds have you any temporary officers now?—Yes, continually.

8200. I mean yesterday had you any temporary officers?—I have got one now who is always employed at Leeds because we are doing extensive drainage work.

8201. You have one temporary warder who has been constantly on?—Yes, for a couple of years I should think.

8202. Have you had in four or five on any occasions during the last six months?—Yes, always at assizes and sessions.

8203. At the last assizes?—Yes, at every assizes and every quarter sessions.

8204. Are they obtained in the same manner?—One or two of them are; generally they are persons who are known to the others. It is always difficult to get them.

8205. In your opinion would it be possible to maintain a larger prison staff, so that casualties of that kind might be avoided?—I think it is only a question of expense; the theory is that there should be one disciplined officer for every 20 prisoners.

8206. That is 5 per cent.?—There is always one officer away one whole year for 26 fortnights in the year, so that, though on paper and in theory you have got 5 per cent., you have only got 4.

8207. And that necessitates his constant employment?—We are not allowed now to have temporary employment; last year we were, but that has been stopped recently.

8208. So that the staff has been rather reduced lately?—Yes, within the last 12 months.

8209. There has been no regulation increasing your staff so as to avoid the employment of temporary warders?—I believe the three officers have been increased at Leeds, but what they did without those three I do not know.

8210. I believe you have paid a good deal of attention to criminal statistics?—Well, I have some here.

8211. You have a large number of re-convicted prisoners in Leeds, and the statistics show there are a large number of them. Do you think the number of re-convicted prisoners is increasing?—I do not know that it is; years ago at Gloucester I used to think that 25 per cent. of the men and 30 per cent. of the women were recidivists. On the 14th of November there were in my prison 346 men and 97 women. Of those, 231 men had been re-convicted 412 times, and 61 women had been re-convicted 121 times.

8212. You do not know whether that is any growth in the re-convictions, whether there are more re-convictions than there used to be a few years ago?—Yes, I think so.

8213. You think there are really more?—Yes.

8214. The prison population has largely diminished?—Very much.

8215. The offences for which people go to prison have not increased?—No, the committals have gone up.

8216. So that the cause of the diminution of the prison population is a shortening of sentences?—Yes.

8217. You have sent me a diagram which shows a constantly diminishing length of sentences from 1880 to 1894?—Yes.

8218. The length of sentences diminished from an average of 48 days to an average of 34 days?—That is so.

8219. The same table shows a rise of previous convictions corresponding rather to the diminution of sentences?—The per-centage of previous convictions is now going up.

8220. It went up pretty steadily until 1891?—Yes.

8221. Then according to this it fell in 1892, it ascended a little in 1893, and in 1894 it went right up to the highest mark ever reached?—Yes.

8222. This is the sentences after previous convictions?—The committals. There is a difference in the police court where a man does not come to prison but is treated as a first offender and fined, and not sent to prison.

8223. So that notwithstanding the First Offenders Act has reduced the number of persons who are committed, the amount of committals increases?—It is increasing now.

8224. This is for the whole country?—Yes, this is taken from the Prison Commissioners' Reports from 1884 to 1894.

8225. The per-centage of first re-committals to committals is very steady?—It is very steady I think.

8226. Which looks as if the sentence on first convictions were quite as adequate as they used to be, that is to say, that you get no more re-committals now on first convictions that you did a good many years ago?—No, I have only got the returns from 1884, I have only got them for 11 years, and the second committals as compared with the first committals have been pretty much the same.

8227. But when you get to second committals and more, there is a very considerable increase?—Of previous committals, yes.

8228. And that pretty well coincides with the constantly diminishing amount of sentence?—If one goes down the other goes up.

8229. Yes that corresponds. As the first re-committals to committals are pretty steady the increase must be due to re-convictions of persons who have been more than twice convicted?—Yes, I think so.

8230. Your impression then will be that the sentences after persons have been more than once or more than twice convicted are rather inadequate and that it increases the number of committals to prison, and that it also increases the quantity of crime?—A great many of them are for drunkenness and you have not power to give a longer sentence than a month for that.

8231. As regards serious crime you have not tried to divide that?—I have divided it into three heads.

8232. For Leeds, and not for other places?—Only for Leeds; I have no knowledge of anywhere else.

8233. For drunkenness at Leeds it is 21·76 per cent.?—Yes, of both sexes. That re-committal for drunkenness does not mean that the first committal was for the same offence. In that total of re-committals I do not know that the first offence was drunkenness, but the re-committal was for drunkenness. The first may have been for something else, but I do not know that.

8234. There is no such diagram as this in the Prison Commissioners' Report?—I do not think so.

8235. That is your own preparation?—That is my own preparation.

8236. Perhaps you will put this in?—Yes. (The document was handed in, see Appendix III.)

8237. This table shows that, of the prisoners in the whole country, 96·22 have sentences of three months and less?—Yes, that is the Commissioners' report.

8238. So that only 3·78 have sentences of more than three months?—That is compiled from Appendix No. 7 of the Commissioners' last report, page 55.

8239. Of that 96·22 per cent., 86·82 per cent. have one month and less, 64·69 have 14 days and less, and 38·90 have one week and less?—Yes.

8240. So that the great amount of our prisoners have less than 14 days?—It is two-thirds; it is two out of three.

8241. What is your opinion with regard to cumulative sentences? Bearing these figures in mind, are you of opinion that some different kind of sentences would be advantageous to prisoners who had been frequently convicted?—That is what I was led to believe at Gloucester.

8242. Is it your opinion?—Yes.

8243. We waste a good deal of judicial strength in sending back to prison for short sentences persons who are determined to commit some sort of offence?—I do not think they are determined to commit it, because I think the habitual drunkard can scarcely help himself, and I do not think persons mean to commit crime when they come out; I do not think they mean to go back to crime, speaking, at all events, of a great many of them.

8244. Apart from the convictions for drunkenness, are there a great many people who are convicted of larcenies and what you have classed as offences which are re-convictions?—Yes, about 40 per cent. of each.

8245. And you would rather wish to see some different treatment with regard to those cases of re-convictions?—Yes.

8246. (Chairman.) How many weak-minded prisoners have you on an average at Leeds?—Who require supervision?

Maj. J. Knox.

29 Nov. 1894.

8247. Yes?—Those are only unconvicted persons who have to be specially looked after and have a special attendant, and it is very rare that there is a temporary officer employed.

8248. Have not you any prisoners who have to be associated because they are epileptic or weak-minded?—Very rarely.

8249. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) With regard to the distribution of the Government grant for prisoners' aid, does the Prisoners' Aid Society get the whole sum certified by the Government or such sum as you certify in a lump sum, or do you certify in respect of each prisoner that he is to have a certain sum out of the Government grant?—The course is this: I report to the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society any prisoner whom I think is deserving of help from the society, and at the end of the quarter that money is drawn in a lump from the Prison Commissioners, provided it does not exceed the quota dedicated to Leeds.

8250. You do not, then, certify for the particular sum in the case of each particular prisoner?—I have to certify to the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society that I recommend a certain amount or that certain help should be given.

8251. You, in fact, do certify a particular amount in the case of each particular prisoner?—Yes, I think that is certainly where the Visiting Committee would come in very helpful. At Gloucester the Visiting Committee and the Prisoners' Aid Society were the same.

8252. There was no grant at Gloucester?—Yes, that is so.

8253. You administered the charity fund?—Yes.

8254. At Leeds you administer the Government money?—Yes.

8255. And you certify in each case what you think is a fitting sum for the prisoners?—Yes, that is where I think the Visiting Committee could come in very well to help the governor as regards people who had more than six months, and who could earn more gratuity.

The witness withdrew.

Col. Barker (Salvation Army).

Colonel BARKER (Salvation Army), called and examined.

Major LAMB (Salvation Army), was asked to attend the Committee during the witness's examination.

8256. (Chairman.) Colonel Barker, you are an officer of the Salvation Army?—Yes.

8257. How long have you been so?—For 14 years.

8258. And Major Lamb is also an officer in the Salvation Army?—Yes.

8259. What is your official duty?—I act as secretary for the social operations of the Army in the Darkest England scheme.

8260. I think you did some work in Australia in connexion with prisons?—We commenced our prison gate work in 1883 in the Colony of Victoria. In our general Salvation Army work we found that men and women were discharged from prison without character, and by reason of their imprisonment had become estranged from their friends, and were unable to find work, so that they were driven back into crime, and in order to bridge the gulf made, we commenced to meet prisoners on their discharge at the gates of the prison and take them into a home. The work was most successful, and our results were most gratifying. We were compelled to extend this prison gate work to New South Wales, Queensland, South Australia, and New Zealand. I might say that I have letters from most Governments of the Southern Continent speaking of this branch of the Army's work. I think if you would not mind just looking through one, that it would be similar to the whole of them.

8261. I think I have seen the letters before, but no doubt the Committee will take it your work has been generally satisfactory?—In all these colonies the work is most satisfactory, indeed so satisfactory were the results that our influence amongst the discharged prisoners was considered so beneficial to the individual and helpful to the State that the Government of Victoria granted permission for us to hold meetings in the large prisons in the colony. Notices were posted in the various jails in the colony informing prisoners that if they desired it the Salvation Army officer could interview them previous to their discharge, and arrange to take them to a home on their release. A copy of the notice was hung in the Victoria gaols. The prisoners were informed that an officer of the prison gate branch had been authorised to see prisoners on the day before their discharge with a view to assisting them to improve their lives, and any prisoner desiring to see the brigade officer might give their names to the governor.

8262. Then the Government made you a grant, I think?—Yes, in the year 1887, in addition to giving us permission to interview prisoners and hold meetings once a week, the Government of Victoria made us a grant of 1,000*l.*

8263. 1,000*l.* per annum?—Yes.

8264. Do you still get that?—I believe we still receive 1,000*l.* for the Prison Gate Brigade. We have children under the "Neglected Children's Act." They are sent to us instead of being sent to a reformatory. They are placed under our care. This is what is known in section 28 in the "Neglected Children's Act" as "transfer of guardianship." For that the Government pay so much per head. Then the Corporation of the City of Melbourne pay 100*l.* a year for the Salvation Army officer to attend the lock-up, and interview people previous to their coming into court.

8265. May I ask if there are prisoners' aid societies in those colonies?—Yes.

8266. Did they have similar advantages?—No, we were the first, I believe, that were recognised in this particular way. After being met at the gaol gate a discharged prisoner is received into a home where a brief statement of his career is obtained from him and entered into the records of the home. He is seen by the officer in charge of the home and sent on to the workshop to such departments as he is most suited for. The intention of the home is to either get the discharged prisoner reconciled to his friends, or to obtain a situation for him, or to give him an opportunity of looking after a situation for himself. No wages are paid to the men, food and lodging being provided in return for willing labour, but small cash grants, say, from 6*d.* to 5*s.* per week, are given to worthy men to encourage them. Religious meetings are held in the homes every evening, and twice on Sunday. The idea is home life. Our experience proves that this is most efficacious. To prove this, I may say that the Queensland Government have just doubled their grant to the prison gate work by this last mail. I have had the privilege, I suppose, of meeting almost every leading Government official in the colonies; and being a representative of the Charity Organisation Society I suppose we have had thousands of this kind of men and women brought under our notice, and many are to-day respectable members of society.

8267. What is the size of these prisons in Australia?—Well, in the large stockade at Pentridge, near Melbourne, Victoria, it is 700 or 800, and they have, I believe, just built a new prison for juvenile offenders and a special prison for women.

8268. Then they are all rather large prisons?—We call them "stockades;" you call them "convict establishments" here. These men are sentenced to convict establishments or stockades on sentences of from three years and upwards. Before you go on to the juvenile offenders I would like to say that with regard to the criminals themselves the men in the prisons, from my own personal experience and the experience of the officers in the Salvation Army, is this—that if a man in Victoria receives a sentence of three years there is a month out of each year right straight off in what we call a model prison. Now I have known prisoners when they have been in the model prison who have been brought under religious influence by the chaplain and by other good people; and they have really felt their condition and their position; but when they have come out of the model prison and have been drafted into the labour yard or the factory, they have become associated with hardened criminals, and the result has been that the young men have been influenced by hardened criminals, and arrangements have been made by them to take messages (if not written) verbally, and they have got perhaps a young man who has received his first sentence of perhaps two or three years, as the case may be, and who comes out and takes a message to a low quarter of the city, so that he is at once known. Perhaps he has been followed by others, and thus he gets contaminated and finds his way back to prison.

8269. What is the nature of this model prison, is it specially organised?—Yes.

8270. It does not answer to the local prison?—No, it is different altogether.

8272. It is a mere solitary system?—They do not call it solitary. It is called a model prison. It is more severe. I have a letter from Chief Justice Higinbotham. Previous to leaving the colonies I had a long talk with him on this very point, because we felt that apart from our organisation for the moment we were grappling with a very important problem, and we wanted to do what was right for the man and right for society. That was his letter to me previous to my leaving. (Letter handed in. See Appendix V.)

8273. Were the prisoners who were sent to the model prison convicts?—They were all for over 12 months.

8274. Do you know Wandsworth?—I cannot say that I know it, but since I have been back I have wanted to thoroughly visit the prisons in England, because I wanted to have laid before you my own convictions upon them. I was deputed to visit the training ships and other institutions for juvenile offenders in New South Wales and report on them.

8275. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Do you know any of our prisons inside?—I have been in one or two, I was at Gloucester the other day and I have been in Pentonville and others.

8276. Is the model prison like Pentonville or Gloucester. Is it not more like Holloway where there are large sections and cells. There is section A., section B. and section C. and you go as the case may be into section A. and you are there for your three months. The treatment of the prisoners in there would would be much the same as in section B.?—Yes, what I maintain is this, would not it be possible for them to distribute the special treatment so as to have a month in the commencement and a month in the centre and a month in the last portion before their discharge.

8277. (Chairman.) Of course that is the Australian system and it is a little difficult to follow it?—Yes, I only give it to you as I knew it. I only wish I was better able to speak of the prisons in England.

8278. (Sir Algernon West.) How long have you been back?—About four years. There we adopted the system I have mentioned as I suppose you do the same here; the labour in the prisons is non-productive.

8279. (Chairman.) I will come to that presently, but I want to ask you first about communications with the prisoners before discharge. I understand from communications I have officially had from you that you would be very glad to get the same treatment in England that you got in Australia with regard to prisoners before their discharge?—Yes, I put that before the Commissioners and through Sir Henry Lock, who knew me personally, and offered to show the Prison Commissioners that we are not prompted by any pecuniary or sensational motive in our desire to visit the prisons, but that we had a desire to benefit them, and that we felt very keenly on not being allowed the same privileges as we enjoyed in Australia.

8280. What are your means of access now?—None whatever. We were recently allowed to go to the gate and just inside the gate, but that privilege has been withdrawn within the last fortnight, I am very sorry to say.

8281. Then you are not allowed to go inside the gate?—We had a letter from Mr. Asquith which placed us on an equality with other prison organisations and other agencies doing prison gate work. (Major Lamb.) That privilege has been withdrawn, but instead of levelling us up to the St. Giles Mission, the St. Giles Mission has been levelled down to where we were. (Colonel Barker.) There is another letter from Judge Molesworth and from the governor from a large stockade. That is from the Department of Justice of New South Wales. That is ocular demonstration that we have been recognised in the colonies, and if we could be recognised there as having done practical work we want the same chance of gaining recognition here.

8282. (Sir Algernon West.) Were you conducting the same work there as here?—I might say that I came home on the invitation of the General on purpose to inaugurate a similar work here to that which was started in Victoria, as I shall show you presently. I should also tell you that I believe the Indian Government wrote over to the Government of Victoria, the South African Government wrote also, the Canadian Government and other Governments have written to Victoria, and said, "Now give us the exact position "of the Salvation Army prison gate and social "operations." I am very glad to say that we have come up to their expectations, and that nearly all through the southern continent we have access to the prisons. Since I have been back here we have received 1,200 prisoners, and when I say "received them" it is not merely giving them a breakfast and just talking to them. I have here a man with 15 convictions. He is what we know as a local prison man. He came out of prison. What was before him? He attempted his own life in the prison; he came before the Recorder at Exeter and the Recorder said, "Now how "is it you are constantly in trouble; have you never "had a chance?" He said, "Well, if your honour "will believe a prisoner I have never had a square "chance." The Recorder said, "Then I will give "you a chance"; and he passed a nominal sentence upon him. We communicated with the Recorder and the late Home Secretary, Mr. Matthews, and the result was that the sentence was remitted, that the man was sent to us and he is now a most expert fellow at his business. He is here to-day. Now this happened over three years ago and he is here to-day for the Committee to see. He is well known and moves in good society.

8283. What does he work at?—He is now an officer holding a responsible position in the Salvation Army.

The proceedings were adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, 30th November, at 11.30 o'clock.

SIXTEENTH DAY.

Home Office, Whitehall.

Friday, 30th November 1894.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P. (CHAIRMAN).

The Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B.
Sir JOHN EDWARD DORINGTON, Bart., M.P.
JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, Esq., M.B., F.R.C.P.
ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Esq., M.P.
ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis; and
Miss ELIZA ORME.

JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Secretary.

Col. Barker (Salvation Army).

30 Nov. 1894.

Colonel BARKER (Salvation Army) re-called and further examined.

Major LAMB (Salvation Army) was again in attendance during the examination.

8284. (Chairman.) I understand that you do not wish to have any superior advantages as against other Prisoners' Aid Societies?—Certainly not, but we want to be placed on an equality with other agencies. We should very much like to feel that neither we nor other agencies that were doing prison work were handicapped in that respect.

8285. Do you think that there is much danger of doing harm to the prisoners from encouraging them to think that there is competition for them?—None whatever from my own personal experience. As you know, I have had some experience in and out of all the large prisons of the southern continent, and from that experience I am able to say there is none whatever. We deal practically with the men. It does not matter to us what agency does the work, but let it be done thoroughly and well.

8286. It would be necessary, you would probably agree, to take measures to prevent unscrupulous prisoners from taking advantage of different societies?—Clearly so.

8287. That would mean that there should be intercommunication between the different societies, so that they should know what prisoners had been assisted and in what way?—The Penal Department in Victoria supply us with a monthly list, that is to say, a list goes to the detective office, and a list of the long-sentenced men comes to us, and any of those men have the option of seeing us. In addition to seeing them at the gate long-sentence men are brought to the detective office, and we take them direct from there.

8288. Then I think you said there were other societies?—Yes.

8289. They have access to that list also?—Yes.

8290. Do they know of the action you, for instance, would have taken with respect to a particular prisoner?—I could not tell you that.

8291. Was there anything to prevent a prisoner that you had helped first and who had left you and gone back to crime, from going to another society?—We were in communication with each other.

8292. You think that really would be necessary?—Yes, I think so. For instance, the Royal Prisoners' Aid Society here in London have on several occasions sent to us men and we have dealt with the men. We have had the men through the Royal Prisoners' Aid Society. I think I am right in saying there are very few prisoners homes in England at the present moment. There are a number of agencies, but as I was speaking to a gentleman the other week whose name is well known in connexion with prisons, he said, "Where your institution is, if I might use that "word, superior to others, is because you take them "direct to the home and you do not leave them until "you feel satisfied that they are going to do right, "and you can put them into a situation." Supposing we have got 20 men in our home to-day and we had got situations we could send each of them to in various parts of the country we can have at our command 3,000 auxiliaries, that is right round Great Britain, and we can command our officers situated in the various parts of England. We can write to them and say, "John Jones is going to arrive by such a train. "He is going to be employed at the Barrow Iron "Works. We want you to look him up and show "him that you are his friends." Of course it is the same in meeting prisoners in various parts of the country.

8293. Do you feel that you have been placed at any disadvantage by the action of other societies?—Well, I think so. I felt this on my return, as my official connexion with the various Governments of the Australian Colonies is known to you, and I did feel this most keenly. I wanted to co-operate as it were, so that there should be no over-lapping. Having been a representative of the Charity Organization Society in Victoria, I knew that there was need of being in communication with others, and naturally I felt most keenly one or two things—one especially. I do not think it is right I should mention the names here, because we could have taken advantage of one individual, and one gentleman that I spoke to said, "If "that is the case I will withdraw my contribution "to-morrow." We do not want such things as that. We want to work and co-operate with each other. Now here I have a photograph of a man (handing a photograph to the Chairman). That is how the man came to us. This photograph (handing another photograph) is how he is to-day. That very man has done 40 years in prison, and he has had 400 lashes in all. That man went to a certain gaol gate and was ordered away by an individual who was there representing another society. This gentleman went to the sergeant of police and said, "Look, if this man comes "here again you arrest him." That was after three years good character of that man whose photograph you have there. The officer said to the old gentleman, "Look here, if he puts his hand upon you again "I shall arrest him, not you." He said, "We are "glad to see you here. It is a great deal better to "be here doing this work than to be in and out of "prison."

8294. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Do you mean he went to the prison gate?—Yes.

(Major Lamb.) The real difficulty we have here is that while other societies get inside the gate, and the prisoners who are most desirous of reclaiming themselves, avail themselves of the first hand that is held out to them, the result is that those that are indifferent come to us, that is to say, men who are not caring very much; and we have to use a certain amount of compulsion because a man on being discharged and who is desirous of retrieving his lost character, will seize hold of the first hand that is held out to him, not knowing that we are outside. That is the real disadvantage we are under.

8295. (Chairman.) Now, supposing a notice was handed to each prisoner before discharge, stating the names of societies willing and able in that locality to help prisoners, and also giving the name of a responsible accredited official of that society, would that meet your views.

(Colonel Barker.) That would materially help us. Then I should go a little further, and should ask, because the prisoners have an option, I believe, of being asked that by the chaplain as it at present stands in England. In Victoria or in the Colonies we have a notice board of the various societies, and the prisoners are acquainted with it. You have a copy of the notice with the statement. I think that representatives from special societies should be there, because I have found great benefit from my experience resulting from ladies of position such as magistrates wives who really were interested in the prisoners, and I think they should be allowed to visit on certain days during the week in addition to the ordinary Visiting Committee.

8296. Now I pass on to another point; that is the question of cumulative sentences. Does your experience enable you to form any opinion as to the practice of giving comparatively short sentences to hardened and habitual offenders?—I think short sentences do good as regards first offenders for certain crimes, but I would advise cumulative sentences in the case of habitual criminals.

8297. You think from your experience of these men that the short terms have little or no effect upon them?—Yes, very little.

8298. Do you think that they would be deterred by the knowledge that they might have three or four years' detention?—Yes, I think they would. That is my experience.

8299. Then I think we know your views or can anticipate your views on the question of juveniles. I do not think I need trouble you with any questions on that?—There is one point, and that is in reference to the inner working of the prisons. From my personal experience, I think if a man receives a sentence of five years, it should not afterwards affect him morally, so that he should be incapable of following his ordinary occupation when he came out; and a great number of the men that we are brought in contact with, really seem, as to some of them, to have lost their reason, and to be under-manned in every way.

8300. You are speaking now of the convicts?—Yes.

8301. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) And in England?—I thought you were speaking of the criminally sentenced men.

8302. (Chairman.) You are speaking of convicts in England?—Yes.

8303. Was it your experience in Australia that they came out in that condition?—Yes, more or less, but we have a little special treatment there. Ours is a short, sharp, and severe punishment.

8304. Do you imagine that this condition is produced by any special severity of prison discipline, or by the insufficient occupation?—Our experience goes to show that the present treatment of criminals is morally and physically weak, if not, indeed, a total failure. You ask us for our opinion: we put it plainly. The attendants do their best, but the system fails, because it is dealing with the men in the mass and not dealing with them as individuals. They want more discrimination. This applies to local prisons and to convict prisons. They are neither deterrent nor reformatory.

8305. With regard to prison labour, perhaps I might ask you now for information with regard to your prison home?—In our own home, not inside the prisons? We consider the labour in prison at the present time to be mostly degrading and non-productive.

8306. I should like in the first instance to hear now about the work that you are doing?—(Major Lamb.) With regard to the labour there the chief industry in which the men are engaged at present is the salvage,—collecting and sorting—it is mostly waste paper. We have also tailoring and boot and shoe-making, and mat-making from time to time as men come in. We have appliances there, and we can always go on making and mending shoes that we stock and sell at the first opportunity, and the same with mats and clothes. We can always get work from amongst our own people so as to utilize the ability that a man has, and may have gained in prison. Wood-chopping we engaged in for the first 2½ years of our work, but we abandoned it, because the class of men we were receiving into our home were not adapted for this class of work. They were a steadier class than the ordinary English criminal. Also we abandoned it because the work was non-productive. The loss sustained in chopping the wood arose because a certain amount of skill was required, otherwise it is chopped to waste, that is to say, a piece of wood if it is not carefully chopped, instead of producing a bundle will, perhaps, only produce half a bundle; but with the paper sorting every effort of the man improves it, that is to say, he takes out this class of paper, say the brown and the ordinary waste material, and separates them so that there is no lost labour in the paper sorting and it is not so hard either, and therefore, it is more helpful to the man. Cleaning by doing household work and cooking the meals is all done by ex-prisoners. There are three officers in charge. They are ordinary officers in the army.

8307. Then what class of men do you take into your home?—Well, they are the first sentence men and the long sentences.

8308. The convicts?—Yes, and first sentence men.

8309. Why do you take those two classes?—Well, because the convict is a long-sentence man. If he has done five or six years the associations that he formed before going into prison are pretty well changed; and we take the first sentences because they have not been contaminated with criminals before. The casual criminal is dealt with at temporary relief works, of which there are five in London where we have the out-of-works, the man who gets into a casual ward, and afterwards gets into prison for tearing up his clothes or being drunk. We do not take those at the prison gate home.

8310. Will you give us the figures and the results?—Yes. Since the opening of the home in February 1891, 1,197 discharged prisoners have been dealt with.

8312. Are those male prisoners?—They are all male prisoners.

8313. Then what are the general results?—The general results have been that 383 of these have been sent to situations in permanent employment, that is to say, they have either obtained situations or we have obtained situations for them. That is perhaps varying after from one to 18 months in the home. Of this number of 1,197, 383 went to permanent employment, seven have enlisted in the army, 376 have left after satisfactory conduct to look out for work for themselves, that is to say, they have had their resting place. They have used the home for a month or two and have worked well and given satisfaction, and then they have gone out with a fair idea of getting work.

8314. Of the 1,197 383 have gone to actual situations?—Yes, perhaps we have paid the train fare to send them to a situation, that is to definite situations, the names and addresses of which we have before the man leaves the home.

8315. But with regard to the 376, have you any authentic, definite information that they have actually gone to situations and that they have not relapsed into crime?—(Colonel Barker.) Yes. (Major Lamb.) The man gives notice before he leaves. He says, "I "have nowhere to turn. I have," perhaps, "been "reconciled to my friends, but I know that if I go "back now, having been working here and not going "direct from prison, it would be all right." A man will not go to his friends direct from prison, whereas, if he uses the home for a month or six weeks he then goes out. He gives notice and if he has done his work well to begin with, he leaves by saying, "I "propose going next week or to-morrow," and he says where he intends going.

8316. I quite understand that no doubt a large number of those would go to work, but have you actually proved to your own satisfaction that they have actually returned to honest work?—No. There is one point in connexion with this, and that is, that we rather encourage the feeling of a man to get away from the past, and, to some extent, to lose us, as well as everybody else that knows the past.

8318. With a large number of these men you cannot go further. You have given them a chance, and let them have a trial?—Yes; and, naturally, they want to be free from restraint. They do not want any connexion with the past. They want it cut away from them. We have sent to the farm, the colony, and other departments of our own work, 264 of them. This we regard as not so very satisfactory, that is to say, they have been in the Home for a short period. They have been met at the gates and received into the Home, but they have been of a lower class, and we have dropped them into these other workshops that we have, and we have passed them on to the farm, where, perhaps, they have been more suited for work. They are dealt with in our general figures. The number that we have had to discharge (and this is particularly worth noticing) as being unsatisfactory and unwilling to work, has been a total of 128 out of 1,197 dealt with. Those men who have refused to work, or who have been unsatisfactory have, perhaps, been taking up with undesirable associations, or they have got drunk, although we have not had much difficulty in that respect. We have had to send 39 to the infirmary. Then following on the satisfactory cases, that is to say, those that were followed, there were 383 that were sent to situations. Of these, including seven in the army, 390, after they had left the home for 12 months, were followed by us. This is, of course, dealing with the figures of 12 months ago, nearly; that is to say, the men who passed out of the home during 1893 we made recent inquiries about, after they had been out 12 months, and we found that there were 86 per cent. out of the 383 doing well, and that we knew we could lay our hands on those—names and addresses we had got—and that we could find them when we wanted them. Ten per cent. we lost sight of. Then there are doubtfuls, though not lost sight of, we were not just satisfied that they were all right. Then we know that two per cent. had returned to crime, and there was 10 per cent. we had lost sight of altogether.

8319. Do you find that the men you have taken in have learnt any trade in the prison which qualifies them for work outside?—Yes, we have a man now who learnt bootmaking in prison.

8320. Of course, there may be exceptional cases, but do you find any considerable number who by prison labour have been taught to earn their own livelihood?—No, very few. That is evidenced by the fact that while we have tailoring and bootmaking we have not had it continuously. Mat-making we find many work at now, but I may say we have a shoemaker occasionally, and we have a tailor occasionally, who have learnt it in prison.

8321. Do the prisoners you come across attach much importance to the prison labour?—The casuals do not as a matter of fact.

8323. Are they fond, do you think, of what is called unproductive labour, such as working the crank and the treadmill?—No, taking the convicts where they have had to do certain work they have had to do it in a fixed way; in fact, there are two or three instances which have been mentioned personally, where men have said they had done it in a way different from what the warders wanted it, and the warder had called their attention to it, and the man has said, "Well, I "have thought it better to do it in this way," and he has been told his business is not to think. His business is to do it in the way he is told.

8324. You can understand it is necessary in convict prisons to have strict discipline?—Yes, I quite appreciate that.

8325. But apart from convict prisons, dealing with local prisons, where you have people of varying terms of sentences, do not you think that those prisoners would feel that it was preferable to work at some profitable and more or less distinct kind of employment rather than being left by themselves in their cells?—Yes, that is so, but that is out of the fear that labour being non-productive is demoralising.

8326. Then you are strongly against what we call unproductive labour in prison?—Yes.

8327. Would you prefer that the work should be work of a productive kind?—Yes, absolutely.

8328. Such as would train prisoners in useful habits and give them good moral discipline?—Yes, as to the loafers particularly if I could just convey to the Committee the feeling that the loafing class have when they get into prison. If they do non-productive labour it is a source of real satisfaction to them to know that they are doing nothing and that they are being kept by the State. If they were put to productive labour the very fact of having to support themselves would deter them from going in. That is the loafing prisoner who is in and out.

8329. You actually think they have that feeling of satisfaction that they are swindling the State?—They say so. They say, "We will not work; we never did "work, and we don't intend to work, and if we are not "in prison we will be in the workhouse." It is a sort of satisfaction to them to know that their work is producing nothing.

8330. Do you think that they would draw a distinction between a treadmill which grinds corn and the purely unproductive crank in a cell?—Yes.

8331. And they would prefer to work the unproductive crank in a cell because that was still less profitable?—Yes, if they had a choice I have no doubt they would, but if they were told to do the other they would not be ready to come back because they would know that they produced something towards their own cost.

8332. We have it in evidence that though you may teach trades to prisoners in prison yet it continually happens that for one reason or another when men get out they will not take to this particular trade which is associated with prison and they want to turn their backs upon it?—I would say that that is because they had no opportunity of pursuing it. Supposing a man learnt shoe-making or tailoring in prison and he goes to look for work—he may be a very good man—but the question the employer puts to him is, "Where did you work last; why did you leave?" He says, "Well, in prison." Then there is a shrug of the shoulders, and no more is said to the man.

8333. That would be the main reason why they do not pursue the trade?—Yes, I should say it is. We have just started a man in business at bootmaking. I have asked him to come here this afternoon. He has had a large convict experience. He has been in our Home about 18 months. He learnt boot-making in prison. He qualified himself a little more with us, and now he is in business again. He has had 25 years penal servitude, and he felt there was no chance for him. His last sentence was ten years, and seven years' police supervision, for being in a place with intent to commit a felony. I have asked him to come here this afternoon. (Colonel Barker.) As to convicts on discharge, I would like to say that we find a great number of them incapable of pursuing any ordinary occupation. They are mentally weak and wasted, requiring careful treatment for months, after they have been received by us. In several cases they are men who are only fit to be sent off home, as feeble minded or to a hospital. We also find a considerable number who are colour blind. This we have found out in our paper sorting where cuttings are tinted, and where the tint requires to be sorted out. Ticket-of-leave men should be allowed to report through recognised institutions, or through the clergyman of the parish in which they reside to whom they would report themselves, instead of to the police. This man we have just referred to had some difficulty in reporting himself on one occasion. He went to the police station to report himself, and the superintendent said, "Get out of it; what do you want here?" He said, "I have come to report myself, sir, if you please, I am so and so." He said, "You are not; now go on." He said, "Very likely one of your men will arrest me, and I shall have to go back, and do my sentence." He argued the question for some little time, when he took the pedigree, and said, "Do you mean to say that is you? He said, "Yes, it is." He saw he was a man who had one of those hard faces, and he said, "But I am in the Salvation Army Prison Gate Home." The superintendent said, "Why did you not tell me that before?" That is an instance of it. Now through the Home Secretary that man is reporting himself by letter. This photograph, which I have here, is the photograph of a woman who was sentenced to death for murder, which afterwards was commuted to penal servitude, and then she was released and sent to the Salvation Army.

8334. There is one point on what you have said. You say these convicts come out physically weak?—Yes, a number of them do.

8335. It is generally supposed that men improve in health in a convict prison, and come out heavier than they go in?—That may be, but that does not say they are physically strong. A man may make mats in a small cell with a mat-machine, and his lungs may be clogged up with all kinds of dust, and the food being of such a peculiar nature the result is that the man is more corpulent, and looking stronger than when he came in, but when he comes under other treatment he falls off. (Major Lamb.) The routine work of prison is not such a strain upon a man physically; he is all right in prison, and does his work, and may be very well behaved, but when he comes out of prison he is at a disadvantage.

8336. Do you find there is a considerable amount of lung disease among prisoners?—(Colonel Barker.) I cannot say a considerable amount, but we have found it.

8337. You do not consider there is anything special about it?—Not a great deal, we have plenty of cases. (Major Lamb.) Of course there is an average number of people who are always afflicted.

8338. (Sir Algernon West.) When you say that these men that come out of convict prisons are not fitted at all for ordinary work, what do you mean?—(Colonel Barker.) I said "some"; I did not say "all."

8339. I went down to Aylesbury where they are building a new convict prison for women, I think there were 300 men odd who were employed on it, dnd there was nothing different in their appearance from that of men ordinarily engaged in building a house so far as I can see?—They get better food for that, and it is outdoor work.

8340. Therefore would you be strougly in favour of outdoor work?—Certainly; that is what we laid before the governments in Australia, that if they gave them outside work, and allowed the convicts to think, it would be better because some of these men have got a mind, and instead of their being crushed, and their brain suppressed (God knows it is enough to think of the bitter past), if a gentleman fails, and you put him in a place to break stones, or to turn a crank, he has got sufficient weight upon him already. I know one gentleman, a bank manager, who used to be in charge of a prison quarry, and the result was that he came out a stronger man than he went in, because he took an interest in the work, and because he was allowed to think.

8341. That is just what I want to get your views upon. May I ask you a question which I do not understand, about the religious part that you play in your visits to prisoners?—Yes.

8342. Is any particular religion an essential element in it?—Just the ordinary Christian religion, just reading the Bible to them. I will give an outline of my meetings. In the prisons in Australia, we receive them just as a chaplain would, and we read the Bible and give a short address; that is all.

8343. But when a man comes out and you receive him at the gate and take him to your Home, do you insist on any particular religion?—None whatever.

8344. It is not necessary that he should be a member of the Salvation Army in any way?—No.

8345. It is a mere question of charity and nothing more?—(Major Lamb.) Yes, the services really partake of the nature of family worship as much as anything.

8346. But when he comes to his employment do you treat one man exactly as you would another, quite apart from religion?—(Colonel Barker.) Yes, quite apart.

8347. Is colour blindness a thing that occurs frequently with a man in mid life?—Well, I am not a scientific man, but my friend, Major Lamb, might know something being a man of scientific knowledge. (Major Lamb.) We came face to face with the fact a short time ago.

8348. (Mr. De Rutzen.) Over what area does the district extend? I see here the figures 1,197. Is that for London alone?—(Colonel Barker.) Yes, for London alone. For the simple reason that we could not get the advantage of visiting the prisons. It was only when a prison chaplain or some magistrate would ask us to interest ourselves on behalf of some prisoner in some local prison that we could do anything. Otherwise we are completely shut out from it. (Major Lamb.) We have received a few from the provinces. (Colonel Barker.) That is why, from my past experience, I was glad when I knew this Prison Commission was about to be instituted. I think that if we could have been permitted to have visited thoroughly some of your large prisons and then given our report of our experience it might have been of service to the Commission, and I asked for a general "permit," some little time ago, thinking perhaps we might have been of some little service to the State, but we had a reply that a "permit" would be given when we wanted it, and I know what that means. It is just to meet the governor and go straight through, but I have been through so many prisons that that is not what I wanted. I just throw it out that even at this late hour we should be only too glad to visit any prison you may suggest.

8349. This number applies to London only?—Yes.

8350. 1,197 is a large nnmber. In your homes have you any besides discharged prisoners?—None whatever, not in the Prison Gate Home.

8351. Then that is entirely apart from any other homes or shelters?—Entirely. (Major Lamb.) It is situate in Argyle Street, King's Cross.

8352. You have a great many shelters?—Yes, we have 1,000 every day in our workshops, and a great number of them are casual prisoners.

8353. I suppose some of those may be included amongst those who have passed through prison?—Yes. a great many of them.

Col. Barker (Salvation Army).

30 Nov. 1894.

8354. A great many of them are known to you, I suppose?—Yes; but they do not own up to having been in prison.

8355. But you know they have?—Yes. We usually ask them the question when they come.

8356. A great many of them find their way in?—I think about 20 per cent. of those who come to us.

8357. I understood you to say the prison treatment is neither deterrent nor reformatory?—(Colonel Barker.) Well, generally speaking.

8358. With your large experience of prisons, what would you consider would have the most deterrent effect on an habitual criminal?—What would you mean by that?

8359. I do not take the first offenders, but I take one who has been in perhaps three or four times?—That is a very important question and one which perhaps wants a little consideration; but we shall be only too glad to give you our experience on that very important question in this way; that we believe that this class of men who are on short sentences would be deterred by solitary confinement. I refer more especially to the short-sentence prisoners, because I am sorry that through not being allowed to visit the prisons here as we did in Australia, we cannot judge of it so well; but in Australia I have known that the solitary confinement has had a wonderful effect upon these men. I have heard of them begging upon their knees to be excused when the day has come round for the special treatment, some of these men would go to the lash rather than go into solitary confinement.

8360. With that class would you suggest that solitary confinement would be useful?—For short sentences, to make them understand that when they go to prison they go to prison, and to make them understand that their labour is going to help to support them.

8361. Have you ever heard in your long experience that they spoke of any discomfort arising from the plank bed?—Well, we have; but I have known this, that you have to take what prisoners say with a grain of salt in it. I know they come to us with so many tales; but we do not give you that from them.

8362. In your opinion would that have some deterrent effect?—Most decidedly.

8363. Are you of opinion that that would have a deterrent effect?—Certainly. There should be careful classification. That is very important. Young men are influenced by hardened criminals.

8364. I gather from what you said just now that you do not take a certain class of cases; for instance, you do not take drunken cases?—We take any cases, but in the Prison Gate Brigade Home we take special cases; but we take any prisoner into our labour yards.

8365. You do not take these drunken cases and vagrant cases?—We pass them on to the Elevator.

8366. You do not keep any account of them?—No.

8367. You pass them on somewhere else?—Yes. We take them into our own place, and not into the Prison Gate Home. (Major Lamb.) It is into a Home, the difference being this between the two homes (and this is where our discrimination comes in, I think), that in the Prison Gate Home at first the man's food does not depend upon his labour, that is to say, we find that the prisoners are better cared for than the average homeless poor. Therefore we treat them better in the Prison Gate Home than we do in our other unemployed labour homes. There a man is more on task work, that is to say, he must do a certain amount of work to earn a certain quantity of food.

8368. 1,197 represents the number that is in your Home in Argyle Square?—That have passed through the Home since 1891.

8369. Then you say that you do not take the drunken cases into the Prison Gate Home nor the people who have been refractory and torn up their clothes in workhouses, and that sort of thing. You do not take them into your Home?—No.

8370. What number of these cases do you take, because that would be apart from the 1,197 you received at the Home?—Well, this is the figure; 264 were sent to the other departments of the scheme. Of that number of 1,197 we have 264 who were sent to the farm colony and other departments of the scheme.

8371. But they come out of the 1,197?—They would be there a day or two; perhaps they would not give us a true statement of their character, and perhaps our supervisor in going from one place to another would see a man and say, "Look here, I have seen you before," and then perhaps we would get the true history of the man, in which case we would pass him on to the lower grade of the workshop.

8373. And the 264 comes out of that number?—Yes.

8374. But I am now asking a question with reference to those whom you receive at the Prison Gate on coming out of prison, but who are not included in the 1,197?—They would not be very many.

8375. Have you any idea of the number?—Perhaps some weeks we get as many as ten, because we give them this assistance and they come to us afterwards.

8376. We will say it is ten weekly?—Yes.

8377. That will be somewhere about 500 people who have passed through the prison?—Yes.

8378. And those are not dealt with?—That is so—not in the Home.

8380. Have you any kind of idea what becomes of them and what their future is?—Well; I can get a return on that. I have no information before me now, but the course that they go through is that we take a brief statement from them and set them to work under supervision immediately.

8381. Do you know that many of them go back to their old course of life and find their way back into prison again?—No, we do not find very much of that.

8382. You have not the means of knowing?—Only casually. Only if it came to us. That is all.

8383. (Miss Orme.) Have you a separate Prison Gate Home for women?—No, not a separate one, although we receive a certain number.

8384. For these first offenders and convicts where would you send them if they were women?—(Colonel Barker.) We should send them to our special home in Mare Street. Mrs. Bramwell Booth, who has had a great experience in connection with rescue work, would be glad to come and give her evidence before the Committee should you desire it. Quite recently I got a note from her to say that she has had 700 women who have been imprisoned who have been received by her, and of that 700 395 have been sentenced for criminal offences. (Major Lamb.) And passed through her homes.

8385. In that number that you gave of prisoners who are now in permanent employment, 380 odd, do you include those who are now holding positions in the Salvation Army, like that officer who visited the Prison Gate, dressed in uniform?—No, he is attached at present to the home. He is still an inmate to some extent.

8386. In which of your figures does he appear?—He does not appear in that 1,197 at all. If I had included the number now in, it is over 1,200.

8387. Of those who are in the permanent situations you mentioned are any of them in the Salvation Army?—I could not say at the moment. (Colonel Barker.) No, they are outside, mostly.

8388. With strangers?—I think so. We did prepare quite recently a list of the addresses of the men that had passed through, where they were, when they came out, the sentence that they had done, their previous records, where they went, and where they are to-day. The per-centage that have passed into the Army is very small.

8389. (Dr. Bridges.) The table that you have drawn out here showing 1,197 consists of all who have passed through the Home since February 1891?—(Major Lamb.) That is so.

8390. Then you gave one number as a number sent to permanent employment, which is 383?—Yes.

8391. Then you gave another number of those who enlisted in the army, which is seven?—Yes.

8392. The number leaving under satisfactory conduct of work is 376?—Yes.

8393. Those two items happen to come exactly to 383?—Yes, but I did not notice that before.

8394. That is purely casual?—Yes.

8395. The same persons do not appear in both these lists?—No, quite so. I never noticed that until now.

8396. I understand that you admit into the Home two quite distinct classes of persons; the first offenders and the discharged convicts?—That is so.

8397. Can you say at all how many of each you have admitted. How many of the 1,197 would be first offenders, and how many would be discharged convicts?—I would not like to hazard a guess. (Colonel Barker.) You could get that, because you could also get the numbers you have had through the Royal Prisoners' Aid Society.

8398. But about a quarter of them would be discharged convicts?—(Major Lamb.) That is my impression.

8399. And the other three-fourths, as far as you remember, would be first offenders?—Yes, that is my feeling.

8400. In determining whether they would be first offenders you take, I presume, the report of the authorities of the prison?—That is so, where we can get it. We cannot always get that. We have to take the word of the men, and we sometimes find what I have explained, that in going round we see a man who may have been in with us before, or is known to have been in prison. Then he is dealt with in the lower number of 264. He is sent into the lower class of workshop.

8401. You observed, I think, that a great number of the men received into your Home are weak and wasted?—Yes, that is so. The food is insufficient, I believe.

8402. At any rate they come to you weak and wasted from whatever cause?—Yes. Of course, we cannot speak to the cause, but we speak from what we do know.

8403. Are you quite sure that you are distinguishing them, and that when you see persons come to you weak and wasted you have made a clear distinction between those of your admissions who are from the convict prison and those who are first offenders?—In saying that they are weak?

8404. Yes. In saying the persons admitted to your homes are weak and wasted, are you able to say that the persons who are weak and wasted are persons who have been in convict prisons or persons who have been in the local prisons?—I should say as much the one as the other, although more of the local prisons.

8405. Of the weak and wasted the larger proportion would be persons who have come to you from the local prisons?—Yes.

8406. You are aware of the nature of the work done in convict prisons?—Yes, to some extent.

8407. From hearsay at all events: for instance, that a large number of them are employed at Dartmoor upon the land?—Yes.

8408. And that at Portland they are employed in the quarries?—Yes.

8409. Would you say that kind of work was work calculated to make them weak and wasted?—I do not think so if the food was sufficient.

8410. The remaining three-fourths that have not been in convict prisons have been in prison for the most part for a short time?—Yes.

8411. Would not it appear to you likely that the weakness of which you speak belonged to them before they went into prison?—No. I have a man in my mind now who came to us about 18 months ago, he had been in prison for six months; he came out; he was naturally a big, strong fellow, and when he came out of prison he was over 10 stone in weight. After he had been with us 10 months he weighed 17 stone, and he had only been six months in the prison. I could not say exactly what he was when he went in, but I know he was not 11 stone when he came to us, and that after he had been with us about 10 months he weighed 17 stone.

8412. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) May we have the name of that man?—Yes, his name his J. B. R.

8413. That case could be traced?—Yes. (See Appendix VII.)

8414. (Mr. O'Connor.) Do you mean that he put on half a pound a day in weight?—That is what his weight was. (Colonel Barker.) You can have the pedigree of the man, his father held a most responsible position.

8415. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) When did he come out of prison?—(Major Lamb.) Nearly two years ago.

8416. In January 1892?—The early part of the year.

8417. What I wanted is to identify this particular prisoner, and to see the prison record. Do you know what prison it was?—Pentonville.

8418. (Dr. Bridges.) And he was discharged about what date?—In the early part of 1892. There were two warrants out for him in E—— at the same time.

8419. And he was only in prison six months, you say?—Of course I am only speaking from memory. I would like that to be clearly understood.

8420. And his statement to you was that he lost weight in prison?—Yes, very much.

8421. To the extent of some stone?—Yes.

8422. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Do you think he was in prison under the name you have given us?—Yes, here is his photograph.

8423. "J. B. R., discharged February 1892." Perhaps you will let the secretary know the date of his discharge from prison?—Yes.

8424. (Dr. Bridges.) You say that in the course of a certain number of months he was with you?—He is with us now.

8425. When you weighed him you found him 17 stone; that would be how long after he came out of prison?—It would be 10 months, probably.

8426. What was his diet during that time?—Perhaps it was 10*d.* a day for food, and we reckon to make the food pay; that is to say, in our food depôt we have a profit. He has 3*d.* for breakfast, 4*d.* for dinner, and 3*d.* for tea; that is, he has three meals a day, and paying all working expenses out of that.

8427. You spoke of many of those who come into your home as being very feeble-minded?—That applies more to the convicts.

8428. Do you find that of the convicts many are feeble-minded?—Yes, that is so.

8430. You spoke of colour blindness; have you any record of colour blindness that you have seen?—No; I just mentioned that because it was a real difficulty that I was brought face to face within the working of our Home, that when the foreman went round and examined the work, he found tints that should have been separated; and not only tints, but distinct colours. It was not merely a matter of tinting, but it was a matter of distinct colouring, and on protesting to the man he said, "It is that colour."

Col. Barker (Salvation Army).

8431. You have applied extremely good tests to distinguish colour blindness, perhaps?—Yes.

8432. Are you aware that taking 100 men haphazard anywhere, you will find a certain per-centage who are colour-blind?—I believe that is so; but at the same time we have two places where this particular class of work is done. We had the shavings or trimmings of waste paper at two of our depôts, and we have had more difficulty in the Prison Gate Home than we have at our workshops. (Colonel Barker.) It would cost half-a-crown a week, including the officer's salary, to keep the girls in Mrs. Bramwell Booth's Home. They earn the other half of their keep.

8433. (Miss Orme.) I will visit the Home and report to the Chairman, and we will consider whether we can take the evidence?—Yes, I will arrange for Mrs. Bramwell Booth to be there to meet you.

8434. (Mr. O'Connor.) I see you once went in for wood-chopping?—(Major Lamb.) Yes.

8435. You have abandoned it because it did not pay?—Yes, and because the work was too severe for the men we were getting. That is to say, we were getting a number of clerks and men not used to manual labour.

8436. And also because there was a loss sustained?—Yes.

8437. Salvage collecting and sorting does not involve a loss?—I have the exact figures for last year.

8438. Does it or not involve a loss? Is there an absolute loss on it?—Yes.

8439. Then it does involve it?—But it can be made to pay, that is to say, we have just started and we have got to learn it. We have got a certain amount of initial cost that we are not spreading over any number of years, and our loss this year is less than it was last year, and in certain other departments where we are doing waste paper it does pay, and we have the hope that it will pay also at the Prison Gate Home. There is no reason why it should not.

8440. The labour of the men connected with that salvage collecting and sorting pays for their keep?—It simply pays their keep, and it pays something towards rent, rates, taxes, and general management.

8441. For administration?—Yes.

8442. What is salvage collecting and sorting precisely. Is it a rubbish heap distribution?—No, it is mostly waste paper, although we take other things that may be worth our while, that is to say, we have men going to firms in the city saying that we collect waste paper, and they leave a card intimating that we will supply sacks and collect the paper when necessary. Then we employ the better class of men to go, perhaps, with one reliable man, who can represent us to the firm and another man with a barrow who does the collecting.

8443. Do you know what is the average weekly wage of the men or women employed in distributing the matters in rubbish heaps?—I do not quite catch the point of your question.

8444. There are large rubbish heaps in the neighbourhood of London which are rummaged and the materials of which are distributed. I do not know what the professional name of that industry is, but at any rate the people employed under him receive a certain weekly wage. Can you tell me what it is?—Of course we do not do it, but my impression is that it is about 8*s*.

8445. What do you say is the cost of maintaining one of the people employed under you in salvage collecting?—Are you talking of ex-prisoners?

8446. Whatever their antecedents are, what is the expense of their weekly keep?—The expense of their weekly keep is 7*s*. per week.

8447. Then the people with you get a shilling a week less than they get at the ordinary rubbish heaps?—It is like this; we do not pay them wages, I was going to explain that; and 7*s*. a week is what it costs us whether the man has earned it or not.

8448. That is why I asked you whether upon the whole the salvage collecting paid; but the point I want to ask you is this—how do you account for the fact that people of this description come to you when the consideration received from you if it were measured in money is less than, or at any rate does not exceed, the market value of their services elsewhere?—If you will allow me to finish I will explain that the cost to us of a man whether he works or whether he does not is 7*s*. per week. If he earns more (and in this lower class of labour yards the work is task work after the first few days) the men are then paid according to the value of their work.

8449. What is the highest rate of wage you have ever paid in connection with that work?—Well, we have kept a man in food giving him three meals a day and his lodging and 5*s*. a week.

8450. That would represent about 12*s*.?—That is so.

8451. Then he has the advantage of certainty of employment?—No. The next step would be we make him foreman and probably pay him 2*s*. or 2*s*. 6*d*. a day.

8452. But he is sure of employment; you will not turn him away?—Not until he betters himself.

8453. Whereas in the open market, I suppose, it would be perhaps a little fluctuating and uncertain?—That is so.

8454. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) What advantage do you consider you have over other Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies in dealing with men?—The advantage is that we can receive a man and give him the chance at once to work and to tide him over the difficulties that present themselves to the man immediately on his discharge.

8455. In fact you have got better appliances, and more agents?—We think we have better appliances and more agents generally speaking.

8456. In fact you have agents all over England?—Yes.

8458. Do you think you gain any special advantage from your agents being rather more of the social class of the prisoners?—Yes, and our people are of course in close touch, by visiting every day the people as they leave. Another advantage is that when our people go in uniform they are easily seen; and if it is a particular case our agent has to see—for instance, if we send for a clerk or any one like that who might not care for uniform, we send a man in private clothes. For instance, this week we met a man at the gate by arrangement. Our officer met him in private clothes; although our man in uniform was there waiting for the ordinary rank and file of the prisoners.

8459. How did you get to know that man was coming out; how did you make your arrangements, because I understand you are excluded from the prisons at the present moment?—That was by a police court arrangement; he was sentenced to two months' imprisonment, and immediately after his conviction he was seen, and arrangements made to meet him at the prison gate when he came out.

8460. Would it satisfy your purpose if in the prison a prisoner could put himself down as being desirous of meeting your agent at the gate on coming out?—No, I want to see him before he comes out, because we may want to communicate with his friends beforehand and get to know his antecedents, because with some people it makes all the difference how you begin, because you want to begin with a man as you propose to finish. His friends may help him.

8461. You want previous communication in the prison with the prisoner?—Yes, I think it is very desirable. (Colonel Barker.) It has been a great help to us abroad.

8462. In some prisons I think communication is allowed to Prisoners' Aid Societies in the prisons, and in other prisons, it is not?—I believe that is so, and some Prisoners' Aid Societies are allowed to communicate with the prisoner. If we had a similar privilege to what we enjoyed in the southern continent, we might be placed on the same basis as other societies.

My experience goes to show me that if you can get hold of a man previously, and talk to him and know something about him, you can better help him.

8463. We had a governor yesterday who apparently makes himself the medium of communication between a prisoner and the Prisoners' Aid Societies, and who makes the arrangements under which they are to receive them outside?—(Major Lamb.) Yes, Mr. Manning has done that with us several times.

8464. Does that answer your purpose?—It is better than nothing; it is better than being simply outside the gate, but still it is a long way from what we should desire.

8465. You understand there are certain difficulties in the prison organisation as regards the admission of outsiders into the prison?—Yes.

8466. That it requires the attendance of a warder, that it takes people off their duty, and to some extent makes difficulties in the prison?—I may just say that it was mentioned yesterday that the South African Government wrote to Australia with respect to the work there. I was stationed in Kimberley and Cape Town three years ago, and we had permission to go into the prisons there. Our officers had two hours visiting the prisons on Saturday afternoon when there was no work done, in addition to conducting a service on Sunday morning.

8467. Did any other Prisoners' Aid Society go in besides yours?—No, I do not think there was.

8468. How many people did you send into the prison—one?—No, two.

8469. I suppose a warder always accompanied each of them?—No, they visited together, and I do not think there was a warder with them.

8470. Then the prisoners were brought to them?—I could not speak definitely on that point.

8471. You mean two persons going into a prison could not see any prisoner unless they were in possession of the key. Of course a warder must go with the key to each prisoner?—Yes, and there would be so long allowed for each. I know the warder was not in the cell when the visit was going on.

8472. But he was standing close by?—Yes, outside.

8473. I do not suggest for a moment that the warder is wanted for personal observation, but he is wanted for the purpose of getting the prisoner into the cell and locking the door again?—Yes.

8474. Then you would ask that you should have permission to have access to all prisoners who desire your aid?—Yes.

8475. And if you could not get that you would like then to have an arrangement by which prisoners could put their names down to be met by you at the prison gate and that that should be communicated to you?—Yes, that is the next best thing.

8476. I put it in two methods in order to get quite clearly what you desire. I quite understand your desire is also to be placed on an equality with every other society?—Yes.

8477. That is reasonable enough?—I think so.

8478. (Mr. O'Connor.) How far will you go with me in this proposition? The chances of a man getting into prison a second time may depend a great deal upon his getting employment when he comes out?—Yes.

8479. The prisoners are so keenly alive to that fact that they will often prefer to take even a lower wage or a poorer consideration than the ordinary market payment for the certainty of immediate and continued employment?—Yes.

8480. And that therefore it is advisable that every facility should be afforded for the securing work for men who come out of prison?—Yes, that is so; they are most grateful for it. Just to confirm the very point you have raised, I may say that I was talking to a man and his own statement to me was, that he knew he could command more money outside, but he said, "I have scarcely been with you six months and I "have no character," because with a character while the actual value of a man's work to an employer may be equal only to that of another man, yet the market value of the man with the character is more than that of a man without a character.

8481. (Sir Algernon West.) You are asking permission to see the prisoners in the prison. I suppose you would limit it to those prisoners who are shortly about to obtain their release?—(Colonel Barker.) To any prisoner, because in Australia any prisoner can communicate with the officer of the Salvation Army by permission of the governor at any time.

8482. If he asks?—Yes.

8483. But I mean to say if you were to go into a prison you would be satisfied by seeing this man who solicited to come to you?—Yes, on Saturday afternoons we used to have a meeting of perhaps 80 or 90 of the various classes of prisoners, and then afterwards we could go to their cells. I had made some important notes with regard to juvenile offenders, and I would like to say that the Salvation Army were the first to be recognised under the "Neglected Children's Act" for the transfer of guardianship. I have explained it fully to the chairman of this Committee. When I mention that, I think it will be sufficient to tell the Committee that we thought we were doing some little practical work for the purpose of benefiting the State. I would like to press on you again with regard to the prisons in England, that if you as a Committee were desirous that some one of us should visit the prisons and give you our opinion we should be glad to do so. As I told you we visited one Colony and reported in regard to juvenile offenders, and we should be glad to do the same for you. We came here feeling that we were not acquainted sufficiently with the English prisons for the simple reason that we could never get that access to them that we required. Mr. Gladstone has seen all my credentials in regard to the Australian Governments and for some years we received 1,000*l.* for the prison gate work there. Previous to that we had 1,000*l.* for rescue work. I hold credentials from most leading members, I suppose, of the last few Australian Governments, in regard to this special work. I have here the form which the magistrates fill up.

8484. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You will send us the particulars of this man J. B. R.?—Yes. (See Appendix VII.).

The witness withdrew.

Mr. D.—— called and examined.

Mr. D——.

8485. (Chairman.) You are now in the Salvation Army Home?—Yes.

8486. How long have you been there?—In my present employment I have been there for nine months, but as an officer I have held an appointment for just over two years.

8487. I understand you have had some experience of prison life which you wish to lay before the Committee?—Previous to my coming to the Army I was sent by the Home Secretary, Mr. Matthews, to the Salvation Army. It was through Mr. Bucknill who had me interviewed previous to my conviction, and he asked me the reason of my being continually in prison. I explained to him the reason. I told him it was simply because when I came out of prison I had really no other resources open to me but to go back to the same life again, because I was really friendless.

8488. I do not want to press you to say anything you do not wish to say freely, but perhaps you will tell the Committee what imprisonment you have had?—Well, I have been in Reading, Gloucester, Exeter, Bodmin, and St. Albans. I believe the whole time comes to a little over seven years. But it must be remembered that whatever I say relates solely to local or county, and not to convict prisons.

8489. You have had seven years' imprisonment?—Yes. That is putting the whole amounts together, including waiting for trial. Sometimes I have been waiting for trial for two months; it was 12 weeks on one occasion.

30 Nov. 1894.

8490. Are you an Englishman?—Yes.

8491. Of what part?—Devonshire.

8492. Did you find when you came out of prison that your old associates were looking out for you?—Well, once or twice I have met prisoners that I have made appointments with inside the prison.

8493. You had no difficulty in making communications?—No. In my experience (and I look back on it now after being out for four years) I feel that no matter how stringent the rules may be in prison, it would be utterly impossible to keep prisoners from communicating in some way or other, if it is only with the fingers. I can give you an instance of it. If a new man enters the prison, it might be only in the exercise yard, but if that man has 12 months, he would simply put his finger to his ear. If he has six months he would clench his hand. It is a sort of alphabet that seems to get known. I have seen even little boys when we have had to exercise in the yard, and perhaps for the first day they have been really broken down; but after a day or two exercising with the men they have been able to make us understand how long they have come in for.

8494. You mean little boys in the sense of 16 or 17?—No, boys of 11 or 12 years of age I have seen do that, or boys of about 12 years of age, but they would be quite boys in their appearance. I should judge some of them to be about 12 years of age. Perhaps they have been sent there previous to their going away to schools.

8495. And they were exercised with the older male prisoners?—Yes. They have exercised with us.

8496. In what prisons?—I have seen them at Readidg and in different prisons I have been in. I believe there used to be an exception made to their being in chapel. I know that then they would be fixed more like being in the front.

8497. And these boys have been communicated with by prisoners?—Well, in the way that prisoners have they would in some way communicate with them. Even if a fresh man enters a cell if he sees there is a man in the next cell to him, perhaps this man will give a rat-tat on the wall, and he will let him know now long he has got. The other man, perhaps, will answer on the wall by so many knocks; if it is days he will go through the whole of the days; if it is months he will knock the number of the months, but if it were seven days he would knock seven days on the wall. I have often thought of this since I have been out of prison. I have felt that no matter how stringent the rules are that may be adopted, that even if they were only in sight of one another, there would be some means of communicating.

8498. Then you think from your experience that this power of communication, which is evidently of a very limited kind, is an evil?—Yes, I do. I can give you an instance in this way: I got to know things at once at Reading; I used to assist in the washhouse there, the females were having the first three days for their washing, and the last three days, or the latter part of the week we men used to do our washing. Still, I found out through other prisoners being down there that even at that time they were communicating and leaving written papers from one to the other. I remember a man named Rose that I became acquainted with in Reading Gaol that knew several prostitutes that were in there, and I know one girl in particular who was convicted at Newbury, was really making appointments on those notes to meet him outside. Of course, we got to know these things, and it would be utterly impossible, no matter what the vigilance of the officers may be in any way to counteract this, because they would not have any idea in any way of what was going on.

8499. I think you said the women were three days at washing?—Yes.

8500. And subsequently, not on the same days, you would be washing?—Yes, we should use the same wash-house, I have done that both at Gloucester and at Reading.

8501. Would those notes be put in any particular place?—Yes.

8502. Did you know that to happen anywhere else?—The only other place where I have seen the notes was at Reading; I saw them there; I was there at the time that Captain Blyth was in charge as Governor.

8503. What year was that?—It was about 1883, I think.

8504. Do you think that of recent years the discipline with regard to these points has become more stringent?—Well, I believe it has. In my last term I found there were far more strict rules.

8505. In any prison where you were was there associated labour?—In working at Reading we were all congregated together in the stoneyard with, perhaps, the distance that there is now between myself and the Chairman. We were there stonebreaking and sometimes two or three men, perhaps, would be taken away to carry coke to ship or anything like that; but we always had an officer with us.

8506. Was there talking there?—Well, there would generally be one officer at Reading who would be in charge of us, and considering the quantity of men he would have to spread over the distance he could not see everything; some men, perhaps, were good practised telegraph men, and you would see the working of their mouth and yet they would not be talking.

8507. Do you attach much importance to the isolated work in the cell?—I have suffered from the seclusion of cell work, and I believe it would tend to make men better with a certain amount of strict surveillance over them, but the association of seeing other men would be better than being so much confined in cells. I know sometimes I have not seen the outside of my cell from after chapel time for the whole of the day, or perhaps two days, as if it should happen to be a wet day we would get no exercise. Some days, of course, it would be continually raining, and then we would have to exercise in the corridors inside, and I know how depressing it is even when working in the cells. I have been mat-making and I have been in some of my cells where I have had frames so large that I have not had more than three or four feet of my cell to walk about or move about in, in fact when the bed has been down to lay the board on there has been scarcely room to pass the board by.

8508. Were they in the cell or not?—Yes.

8509. In the cell you slept in?—Yes.

8510. The frame was left in all night?—Yes. With the Synnot mats I have made mats with boards as large as this table. The trestles would have to be kept in the cells, and the borders we were working had a certain amount of the stuff that could not be detached. In some prisons they would take out the work, but in different prisons I have found they did not always take it out. In some prisons they take out your clothes; in other prisons they leave you your clothes in.

8511. Did you suffer at all from dust?—Yes, particularly in winding for the mat-making and also in oakum-picking. Of course, in picking oakum, we have to beat the oakum, because of course we get it very hard. We have to beat it with our feet, I have often had to take my shoe off, and to hammer it in that way, although we are not allowed to do it; and really sometimes the dust is suffocating. In mat-making I have been fairly choked with the dust penetrating my lungs.

8512. You think that sort of employment ought not to be carried on in the cells where you sleep?—No, it ought not, and in working all day I know the cells have got really foul even with the ventilators open, and especially in the summer time.

8513. I suppose in the course of the time you worked, you had a good deal of time upon the mill?—No, I did not work on the mill, I was never passed for first class labour. My principal work was either oakum-picking or mat-making. At Reading I had to go on the pumping of water, but the doctor after a time exempted me, because I happened to be suffering from rupture, and he took me off.

8514. Do you think prisoners prefer productive work?—Yes, I have felt (and I can say it more plainly now after this time), that if something was done for prisoners, so that, for instance, after I came out of prison after doing my 12 months (if during that time I had been learnt a trade, or could have gone to something to improve myself), when I came outside I need not have gone and committed another theft. But I simply was kept at oakum-picking and stone-breaking, and having no trade previous to my conviction, I was simply thrown right back on my own resources again. I feel as to the Prisoners' Aid Societies that they help you with money; but that in my experience is more injurious than anything to a prisoner. It helps him for the time being to go off, and when the money is gone he is just in the same position as when he first came out.

8515. Still you think the money is, as a matter of fact, helpful?—It is helpful if a man has got means, but every man has not that ability to lay it out.

8516. It gives him time to turn round and get employment?—Yes, but how is a man placed when he comes out? You dare not tell an employer you are just out of prison. They tried to get me on at Palmer's place at Reading, but there was no chance. Some prisoners had gone there and they had turned out badly, and consequently it made it bad for everybody else.

8517. You think it of great importance to teach prisoners trades?—Yes, something that will answer outside as well as in. Something they could fall back upon, that would be every day work outside.

8518. Do you think that the majority of prisoners would prefer associated labour to working in their cells?—Yes. They would prefer association, I believe.

8519. But your opinion would be that it would be better for them?—Yes, my opinion is, according to my own suffering, that the solitary system tends in every way to bring out that which is devilish and bad in a man, because from the morning service you have right on till the next morning to dwell upon your faults. The picking of oakum does not require much extension of thought to think about what you have to do, nor does mat-making after you once know the way, because I could almost do it with my eyes closed. Consequently, your mind being occupied you are continually dwelling on how you will get on when you go outside. I remember thinking that I would do so-and-so. I remembered some houses that I knew at my own home in Devonshire, and I really formed plots in my head how I would go to those houses and commit a burglary in those houses, because I knew them so well. If I had had associations round me I could not have thought of those things, and then I would go to sleep. I have in my cell, perhaps, completed my task by dinner-time, and then I have had the whole afternoon to sleep or to dwell upon anything that I thought of, simply having only one library book a week, and sometimes we did not get one a week.

8520. Did you find that was not enough?—No, you would get one small book, and, perhaps, nothing in that book to improve a man's mind. A man would require literature to draw his mind off from trouble. He does not want altogether a religious book.

8521. Was there a rule there that only one book a week should be given?—Yes. Only one book a week besides your Bible. Sometimes I have had a very small book and have got through it between dinner-time and the time of lights, which would be put out at 8 o'clock, and the remainder of the week after I have had nothing to read.

8522. If you had made a personal appeal to the chaplain would not you have had another?—No. You are only granted one book a week. I have asked for large ones, but you have to take whatever they choose to give you.

8523. Did you find there was a rigid rule in all those prisons where you have had experience that only one book, and sometimes a very small one, was allowed in a week?—Yes, I have never known more in my experience although I have said I wished I had something to read, because in my prison experience I think I got on very well. I think I was only reported in the whole of my time but twice in the seven odd years. I believe my first report was for laughing in chapel, but it was rather comical and I could not help it. It was this: when the prisoners were repeating the Belief a prisoner at the back of me began to talk, and when they said, "I believe in God the "Father Almighty," instead of repeating it, he said, "A good beef steak, a bottle of ale, and a long pipe," and being fresh in prison I began to laugh, and I was brought before the governor and was admonished. As to the chaplain, I think that if we had those prisoners dealt with differently instead of having the same thing every morning—because the Church service, beautiful as it is, becomes rather monotonous—and I think if we had a service twice a week the prisoners would look forward to it and appreciate it really far more than they do.

8524. Do you think they would appreciate sermons now and again from other people than the regular chaplain?—It was our greatest treat at Exeter, and I believe at Gloucester and other places where we had a fresh clergyman in from the outside.

8525. May I ask what education you had before you went to prison?—Pretty fair. I was educated at the west end schools in Devonshire at my home.

8526. So that you had more education than the average prisoner?—Yes.

8527. You would feel, naturally, the want of books?—Yes, I did. On one occasion I did say I wanted something good, and I asked if they had Gibbon's "Roman Empire." At Reading I felt there were different books I would really like, and I would have liked to have taken notes about them and carried them on from one book to another, but we were only allowed one book at a time, and I thought that it would not have hurt us if we could have had a chance of making notes of what we had been reading.

8529. Do you think that the worst men really corrupted the less bad?—There I feel, of course, that there were those I got to know in my first imprisonment. I speak as a prisoner, and I think that there ought to be a certain amount of division and separation by keeping the old offenders from the men who are going to prison for the first time. I can give you an instance. I got acquainted with a gang of smashers in my first conviction in Reading Gaol and was asked to meet them when I came out; and I should have done so if I had not been apprehended at the gate the second time. When I came out there had been a warrant issued, which was waiting against me at the gate; so that I was apprehended. Well, I felt then, although perhaps it saved me from that which was a great deal worse, that if I had not had another warrant out against me I should have gone right into this gang of coiners and entered into a thing I knew nothing about. Of course, these men were old offenders and I have often wondered whether it was possible that first offenders could be entirely separated from the others. Again, the different class of prisoners that there are strikes one. I know how repugnant it must be for a man who was a gentleman, if he made a slip and had to exercise and sit in chapel with one of the greatest criminals, perhaps a man who has done penal servitude and everything like that.

8530. Do you think that the dietary is too trying?—Yes. Of course in my work I have had to deliver the food and carry it round the different corridors. I have had to collect the tins afterwards, and from my own experience the sameness of the food has a tendency to injure you, although it is good gruel and the soup is good; but, of course, you find a different quality in some prisons, from what you do in others. In some prisons it is much better than in others. Reading was a splendid prison for food. It was better than any other prison.

30 Nov. 1894.

8531. How do you account for that?—I do not know. We had far superior bread at Reading to what we had anywhere else.

8532. Is there much difference in the actual cooking?—The soup would come out better in some prisons, the bread would be better in some prisons, and you would get your food much warmer. Sometimes on pudding days I have turned away with disgust because it would simply come up very cold. Then, sometimes, you have pudding made with mutton suet. No matter how hungry a man might be, his stomach would naturally turn from it. Again, there is the sameness in the food, and I feel that for our first nine months we have not a single drop of thin food. It is nothing but gruel for supper and breakfast until the nine months is completed. For the first four months we have porridge that is really quite thick. In fact, it is thick enough to stand a spoon in, and a man taking that day after day really turns from it by the very thickness of the stuff. We have no change to cocoa until after nine months and I know I used to hail the day that would first bring me cocoa as really a feast day.

8533. Did you feel that physically you were lowered by the want of sufficient food?—Yes. When I had it first I was brought very low. Of course the food was different to what I had been used to when I first entered the prison, and I became very weak through it. In fact I think it affected me mentally for the time being. I got weak in the head, and often I have taken my bread when I could not eat it to the w.c. and thrown it away there. We were not allowed to leave it in our cells, but we could put it outside in the trays if we were not able to eat it; but a man who has a "fourth class" diet (which is really the best class diet), if he is an ordinary man, can do very well on it. My Friday's dinner or Monday's dinner I could not usually eat the whole of.

8534. Of course it is not the object to make food particularly pleasant?—No.

8535. That is admitted?—Yes.

8536. Do you think it was unduly and unfairly weakening to prisoners?—No, I do not think it would be.

8537. You do not think that there is any special hardship arising from it?—No, not in my experience. Of course it would greatly depend on a man's constitution when he entered whether he would feel the effects of it. If a man was very strong before he went in, it perhaps would tend to weaken that man much quicker than when he was living hard outside, because he would not feel the difference so much in that case.

8538. Do you think the attention of the medical officer was adequate?—Yes. I myself received the greatest assistance from him. When I first complained about my food at Reading the doctor ordered me beef tea, and I was allowed beef as well with milk at different times of the day.

8539. Your pretty wide experience makes you form a favourable experience of the work of the medical officer?—Yes, my opinion of the doctors is that where a prisoner needs better treatment they give it.

8540. Do you think that is the general opinion of prisoners?—Yes, I know there would be men who would try to shirk or to sham illness, but I have always been attended to kindly if I have applied to the doctor, even with an attack of bile. Of course in Exeter I suffered very much from that. I had every care I could possibly have in food and in treatment. Of course I was taken and put away in association in the hospital with two other prisoners besides.

8541. Do you think that the warders, speaking generally, do their duty well and efficiently?—Well there is a certain amount of harshness about them. I suppose those I have come in contact with myself have been military men or army men and have some of them a certain amount of style about them, I believe it is more with the manner than with the heart, and they have a firmness in treating men, but my experience is that as I have been civil to my officer and did as they wished me I have always had good treatment from them.

8542. You never came across a man who was unfitted from his temper or other circumstances for the post?—Well, I had one at Gloucester who was very much down on me at first when I first went there, for what cause I do not know; but I threatened him at the last that if he treated me so and spoke to me in the way in which he did, more as if I was a brute, that I should report him to the inspector when he came round at the end of the month or to the visiting justices. From that time that man altered very much to me, but I have seen it in the case of other prisoners where without a moment's thought they have turned round and answered the officer back again and that officer has shown them a certain amount of resentment.

8543. You do not naturally expect perfection from anybody even from warders, but having regard to their rank of life and their qualifications, do you think that as a whole they are well selected men?—Yes, I have not the least doubt of that; that is, of those I have come in contact with.

8544. Were you in any prison where convicts were undergoing their first nine months?—Yes, both at Exeter and Reading.

8545. Do you think their presence in the local prison is desirable?—I do not fancy so, because I believe (in fact, I know from experience) that some of those who were undergoing imprisonment in the local prison knew some of these convicts. Of course we dare not turn our heads, but still there would be times when they were coming out of chapel perhaps, and there would be certain parts of the prison, where it would be utterly impossible but what their eyes and faces were bound to meet. I believe I was at Exeter the first time they were drafted there from the convict prison to do their nine months' confinement.

8546. You have not any very strong opinion about it?—I do not think it ought to be, because we as prisoners could very soon tell whether a man had been used to prison or not; by the way even that a man would behave in the exercise yard, so also in chapel; but even as to the younger prisoner, you could meet a man well enough to know whether he had been in prison, or not; though it is quite possible to deceive, because I have myself deceived in prison where they had not the least suspicion that I had been in prison before. When I was sentenced at Bodmin, I passed through there as for my first conviction, and I think I went nearly through half my sentence before they found it out; and they did not find me out until, by the police reports, they had me photographed, and found I was wanted on another charge, but up to that time I passed right through as a first offender.

8548. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) What was your longest time in prison?—When I was in Reading I had nine months, and I was apprehended on another charge, and taken back again.

8549. To Reading?—Yes, to Reading Gaol; and I think Captain Blyth told the magistrate, when I was at quarter sessions, that I had been in the prison just two years.

8550. Then you got 15 months the next time?—No, they were different cases. I was tried at Reading, and I was tried at Newbury.

8551. Altogether you spent two years practically continuously in prison?—Yes, waiting trial and with my sentence.

8552. How long were you at Bodmin?—I think it was four months.

8553. And at Gloucester?—I had two nine months, and awaiting trial as well.

8554. You had nine months twice over?—Yes, Major Knox was there when I was there.

8555. In Exeter?—Yes.

8556. How long?—Twelve months. I was at Exeter twice. My last sentence there was 12 months, and then six weeks. That was when I had my release. I was sentenced to six weeks, but I did not certainly complete the six weeks, as the Home Secretary released me.

8557. And in St. Alban's?—I was two months awaiting trial, and I had two months' imprisonment.

8558. Did you gain or lose weight in prison, generally?—Well, I came out weaker.

8559. Lighter?—Rather lighter. Sometimes I would gain. I believe that at Reading I had gained rather more when I came out after my first nine months. I believe in that first nine months I gained something, because I had different food allowed me.

8560. You had two sentences at Gloucester?—Yes.

8561. When you went to gaol for the first time at Gloucester, did the Prisoners' Aid Society do anything for you?—No. I appealed to them, but there was nothing for me.

8562. Had you gained a gratuity?—Yes, ten shillings.

8563. Where did you go to when you left the gaol, were you taken to the railway station?—No, I had to find my way anywhere, because I gave in as having no home and no friends.

8564. And you were left absolutely alone?—I was left absolutely alone to go my own way. I feel that a man after being incarcerated is dazed for days after coming out.

8565. Did not Major Knox try to do something for you?—No.

8566. What did you do in the washhouse in Gloucester?—We were washing, we had to wash our own clothes. When they would be short of female prisoners we had to do our own washing.

8567. Do you remember the form of the washhouse there?—Yes, it is a circle.

8568. Did you leave notes there for the women?—No, not there, that is what I saw when I was first at Reading. I never saw it in other prisons except at Reading.

8569. Leaving notes?—Well, of course, that was being carried on. Jack Rose I know had been doing 12 months because he was going to meet me when I was coming out of the gaol if I had not been apprehended again.

8570. Was there any intermediate sentence between your two sentences at Gloucester?—Yes.

8571. You went somewhere else?—Yes.

8572. And came back again to Gloucester?—Yes, after 12 months I got to Gloucester again.

8573. You got into trouble again?—Yes.

8574. Was that at Bristol?—My first sentence was at Bristol, and from Bristol I was transferred to Gloucester to complete my sentence. I stayed in Bristol about a fortnight, and then 26 of us were transferred.

8575. Your second sentence was in the county of Gloucester?—Yes.

8576. Where from?—From Gloucester Town, from the city of Gloucester.

8577. Was anything done for you by the Prisoners' Aid Society when you came out?—No.

8578. You applied to them?—I said something about getting work, but I believe I was told there was no chance of any work there, or something like that; and on my second sentence I was apprehended when I came out of Gloucester again and taken back to Exeter. That is where my second sentence was.

8579. What were you brought up to?—My people were publicans in London. I was brought up as barman, but I fell through the drink. In Reading I assisted in making the uniform of the officers. If I had any chance of improving myself there I could have come on and got my living at tailoring.

8580. Were not you long enough at Reading to learn the business?—No, besides there was no one there to show us.

8581. You wanted a better instructor?—I felt that if I had had a thoroughly good practical man to show me the work, to take it right through and how to do it properly as it should be done in a workmanlike way, that I would have had a chance on coming out, after a time, of being sure of being able to work at the trade my own self.

8582. How did you get your chance of turning over a new leaf; from what gaol was it?—From Exeter Gaol.

8583. What happened that led to that?—Well, I dreaded the existence that I had to go back to; and when I was in the cell at Exeter I found in the lock-up a piece of cord with which I tried to strangle myself. Of course, I knew the life I was leading and that there was no other chance for me, because I had tried it. I remember I walked from Bristol to Exeter and I had nothing inside my lips on the road except a drink of water, because I did not like to beg. I went to Mr. Pitcairn, the chaplain; and I told him that I was going on to Plymouth to see a lady, and would he help me. Whether he had had a lot call on him I do not know, but he gave me sixpence, that was to help me on my road to Plymouth.

8584. In Exeter Gaol you attempted to strangle yourself?—Yes; this was previous to my conviction. I called on the chaplain once I was free from prison, and wrote a letter to a lady in Plymouth who was interested in prisoners, asking if she could do anything for me. I went to her house. She lives at Muckley. She professed wonderful interest in prisoners at Exeter, and she wrote a letter to me to say that anything she could do for me when I came out she would be glad to do. I came really with the expectation that she would do something for me. I wrote to her, but I did not get a letter, and consequently I walked from there on to my place at Plymouth. I went to her house at Muckley and she simply gave me a piece of dry bread; she told me she was very sorry, but she had so many that she could not help me. I felt thoroughly indignant. I felt like insulting her for building me up with hopes and telling me she would do something to assist me, and if I wanted a friend she would help me. I felt thoroughly insulted and indignant.

8585. Then where did you go to?—I walked from there into Cornwall, where I committed a felony, for which I was apprehended and taken to Bodmin.

8586. How did you get your start from Bodmin Prison?—From Bodmin, of course, there was another conviction against me, and I was caught there to await trial at Exeter, and was tried at the Somerset Assizes.

8587. Then you were imprisoned at Exeter?—Yes, and after that I was apprehended again. After being apprehended and taken to Exeter I attempted suicide in my cell. That was previous to my last conviction; that was before I was tried and whilst I was waiting in the police station.

8588. Then you were convicted, and then you served your imprisonment?—Mr. Bucknill, the Recorder of Exeter, sent down a solicitor to ask me if I had any friends, or why I was there and was going on with the life I did. I simply told him just how I was placed—that I had not a friend anywhere to help me; that I had no other means of living; that if it were possible to earn an honest living I was only too willing to do it; but I had no friends to help me, and I felt my life was simply a burden to me, and that is why I attempted to take my life.

8589. Mr. Bucknill took you in hand after you came out of prison, did he?—He interceded for me; he said he intended giving me penal servitude, but he would just try me and see if I were willing to turn over a new leaf; and instead of giving me penal servitude he gave me six weeks. I believe he asked the governor to give me as lenient treatment in prison as he possibly could, and the consequence was that I was put in association for the time being up to within a week of the time before I came out of prison.

8590. Then you went straight to the Salvation Army?—I completed three weeks of my sentence and then the governor sent for me and told me that the Home Secretary had given me a reprieve and respited my sentence on condition that I went to the Salvation Army; but before that the Salvation Army had written to me to say they would provide me with a home and help me. Therefore their officer fetched me straight from inside the prison and took me away to London to their Home.

8591. And then they gave you work for a bit?—Yes, I worked at mat-making there, the same as I did when I was in prison. I was rather clever at that, and then I went up to their other place as cook. I kept myself straight and worked my position up. Then I was put as second in charge of one of their shelters, and now I am in charge of one of their largest food depôts and shelters for the homeless. I have hundreds of pounds passing through my hands in the year, and I believe my superior officers can bear me out that I have not given them one single cause for complaint.

8592. Do you think any large number of prisoners if they had the same chance would go into the Salvation Army home?—I am sure they would. If I had a fortune to-morrow I would not give a prisoner a single penny on coming out of prison in the way of money, but I would provide every prisoner with a home.

8593. But a great many of these Prisoners' Aid Societies do provide places for men?—I will give you an instance. Once in coming from Reading Gaol I applied to Mr. Wheatley at Brook Street. I told him I had come out of Reading. I gave him the name I was convicted in, and said, Could he help me. He gave me three shillings worth of india-rubber tickets. At that time I was walking the streets. I passed the word to him and said, "How am I to do?" He said "that would get me some food. There "was no work there, I could look for some work." How was I to do it when I had to walk the streets the whole of the nights as well as the days? This 3*s.* I spent in food at one of Mr. Lockhart's places.

8594. You think they do not provide sufficient help?—They do not provide it in the right way; and what we as discharged prisoners want is, not money or to be left to our own resources, but we want to be taken into a home where there are home ties. My experience of men has been that as to most men the home ties will touch them when nothing else will. It need not be a religious institution altogether, but it should be a home where a man can have everything that is good to help him to face this world. Money should be kept from them. If I had had money I know it would have been a temptation to me.

8595. Supposing the gratuity was turned over to one of these homes?—It would be far better.

8596. A man would go there and stay there?——Well they would have the chance. I said if I had a chance I would improve by it, and I believe that 8 out of every 10 prisoners would avail themselves of a chance.

8597. (Mr. O'Connor.) Would you mind telling me how old you were when you were first charged?—I did not give my right age.

8598. But how old were you?—I was about 30.

8599. What date was that?—I believe it was about 1883; I seem to forget the different dates now exactly.

8600. What was the date of your last discharge?—Four years come this April. It was on the 27th of April, that I was discharged from Exeter.

8601. It was in 1890?—Yes.

8602. Then were you pretty continuously in prison between 1883 and 1890?—Yes, off and on.

8603. What is the longest period you were out of prison during that period?—Some months.

8604. Was that in London or in Devonshire?—In London; I was at all parts of the country.

8605. And I suppose you managed to get a living by taking what you could get?—I tried my hardest, but I simply had to live on the public.

8606. Now, when you were first committed for trial, or while you were a remand prisoner, did you find the diet exceptionally bad?—It was very low.

8607. Worse than the other diets?—Yes, I suffered more in waiting trial, than what I did afterwards. The food was a greater punishment to me in waiting trial, than what it was after I had my sentence. I had less food. For instance, one day you have 6 ozs. of potatoes, and I think it is 4 ozs. of pudding.

8608. At any rate it is not so good a diet?—No, it is very poor diet. Of course it is very much the same kind.

8609. What was your first sentence?—Nine months.

8610. Then when you were convicted again, it was known you had been previously convicted?—Yes, because I was apprehended at the gate of the gaol.

8611. But that was for an offence which was committed before your first imprisonment?—Yes.

8612. Then as on subsequent conviction, were any previous ones proved against you?—Yes.

8613. Sometimes you escaped without detection?—Yes.

8614. What was the sentence you got on the occasion when previous convictions had been proved against you? Was it longer than the previous one?—Not always. Owing to my being at previous times apprehended as I came out. Because many times I have been apprehended at the gate; on one occasion, when I was tried at Taunton Assizes, I had been apprehended at the gate, and Mr. Justice Cave discharged me with one day's imprisonment, because he considered that in my previous conviction I had suffered for the whole of my offences.

8615. What was the sentence you got when a previous conviction was proved against you?—From Newbury I was sentenced to three months, after doing my nine months in Reading Gaol.

8616. Was that nine months proved?—Yes.

8617. On the subsequent occasions when previous convictions were proved, what were you sentenced to after that three months?—Two months, after waiting two months for trial. He gave me four months, but that included two months waiting for trial. That was at St. Albans.

8618. What was the longest sentence you ever received?—Twelve months.

8619. On that occasion had a previous conviction been proved against you?—Yes.

8620. Do you think that if you had received a sentence 50 per cent. longer than the first sentence on your second conviction and that on your third conviction you had received a sentence of 50 per cent. longer than your second and so on, the punishments themselves would have been more deterrent, or would they have had no effect on you at all?—They would have had this deterrent effect on me; judging by experience when I knew I was apprehended at the gate. I had a feeling that I did not care. It simply hardened me to go through my next conviction.

8621. That was by reason of your being taken immediately?—Yes, it hardened me instead of breaking me down.

8622. But apart from taking a man up immediately without giving him a chance at all, supposing you had gone on for some time and then again were convicted; if on that further conviction you had received a sentence substantially longer on account of the first sentence, do you think such an increase would have been beneficial or the reverse?—The reverse, because as a man who had several imprisonments I should have felt I had suffered according to the law and I should take it that I was being punished twice over for doing one act.

8623. You told us about a man in Reading making an appointment by writing on the wall with someone else in the same prison as to a meeting afterwards outside; but I suppose that meeting might have taken place without the appointment and it probably would have taken place when they were both discharged?—If they were discharged both at once of course it would; but when a man is going out three months before another prisoner's time is up it is different.

8624. Still I suppose probably these men had some common house of call or some link by which they would have come into each other's presence?—I do not think so.

8625. What is the particular harm in one prisoner making an appointment with another prisoner to meet him after they are both outside?—None whatever if it is towards anything that is good, but where it was as in the case of my own self—and I said I would meet prisoners to join a gang of "smashers" or counterfeit coiners—it is different. I knew nothing of them, but under the circumstances if I had had my liberty I should have gone and got into that and entered into that concern with them.

8626. You might have made the same appointment with them outside?—Yes, possibly I might, or it is quite possible, of course, for a man to go through life and know nothing about it.

8627. About the convicts in the same prison, seeing local prisoners and recognising them by their eyes or faces, what harm is there in that?—Well, I do not think there is any harm in it.

8628. Supposing even they had shaken hands what harm is there in that?—None whatever; in fact, I believe that to a certain extent the regimen of the prison might be even lessened a little. It would not tend to harden a man so much, because where everything is so hard he would continually be hardening day after day. I take it that naturally that hardens a man.

8629. And your food you rejected when you went into prison on one occasion?—Yes.

8630. You have said you were in the infirmary; you were sick?—Yes, I was taken sick.

8631. Did you have any contraction or drawing up of the hands or arms at all on that occasion?—I do not exactly remember that.

8632. Did you have a headache?—I suffered terribly from headache.

8633. Was that the same occasion as you used the cord?—No. I used to suffer when I was mat-making. I used to suffer greatly from indigestion.

8634. Was it when you rejected your food that you attempted to take your life?—Well, I did not take my food at that time. I can tell you how that was. Of course, I felt very low, and being in chapel I had recollections of my home. I had a Christian training, and it seemed to come over me, and of course, not being strong, I could not control my feelings, and I burst into tears.

8635. You were hysterical?—Yes, and feeling the dread that I would be punished for it when I came out of the chapel, as the governor stood at the top, of course, I made a rush to throw myself over the railings. I had that feeling on me that I did not care. There seemed to be no hope whatever for me.

8636. With regard to the warders, I suppose some prisoners can get on a great deal better with them than others?—Yes.

8637. Men who have been in several times who are self-possessed and accustomed to the place?—Yes.

8638. And who know how to keep their tempers with the warders?—Yes, they know their work.

8639. Some men of less experience would with even less provocation manifest resentment at the harshness of the warders?—Yes.

8640. Have you ever in your experience known of harshness by warders to other prisoners besides yourself, to provoke insolence or violence or anything of that kind, or resentment in any form?—I have never seen it; I have heard officers speak roughly. Well, I suppose they would have their likes and dislikes. There were officers I know I preferred to be under much better than being under others.

8641. Officers are not free from weaknesses?—No.

8642. You have known a good many prisoners in your time and a good many prisons?—Yes.

8643. Would you agree with me in saying that there is more of weakness than of malice in most prisoners?—Yes.

8644. And that if they were treated accordingly the prison system would be more successful than it is in training them?—Yes; my experience is that everything in prison pretty well tends to harden a man.

8645. I forget what it was you said about the nine months passed by convicts in the local prisons; did you approve of that or not?—Well, it was according, perhaps, to how a man would feel. I know we seemed to say, "Oh! they have brought convicts here," and there seemed to be a sort of feeling of resentment running through the other prisoners against their being brought there.

8646. (Miss Orme.) When you say these coiners made an appointment with you, I suppose they were convicts doing their first nine months?—No, they were local prisoners who had got two years. They were tried at Windsor, and were doing two years.

8647. You said you would approve of the gratuity being given to a Prisoners' Aid Society?—Yes.

8648. Do you think it would be any use giving a prisoner a choice before his discharge whether it should be paid to him, or to the Prisoners' Aid Society?—No; a great many men would take them; in fact, as a rule, the word is passed, "We will have a booze when we get out."

8649. So that you would have to do it without giving them a choice?—Yes.

8650. (Mr. De Rutzen.) Do you attribute your drifting into crime as arising from drinking?—Yes.

8651. And you gave way to it?—Yes.

8652. And that you say was the starting point of your career?—Yes, of course. Through drinking and having no work, I committed a felony.

8653. Were you ever a strong man, physically?—Yes, I enjoyed good health.

8654. You did not ail anything?—I had no serious illness whatever.

8655. Were you excused hard labour?—The only thing I suffer from is hernia, and of course I was exempted from hard labour in this sense, that I was not put on a wheel.

8656. You might have been put down as a "non-effective" in prison discipline?—The only thing I was ever exempted from was the wheel. I broke stone and that sort of thing. All other labour I was passed through.

8657. Of course, I suppose you would agree that one of the objects is to make the prison not a desirable place for a man to go?—Certainly. I felt that as regards punishment and the labour, as far as I have had labour, my tasks have been perfectly easy. I could always manage to get through my task every day in far less time than was allowed me.

8658. For any person sent to gaol for the first time, would you advocate that he should be kept there in such a way as to deter him from coming there again?—Yes; and I feel that perhaps there should be a certain amount of treatment shown him, that if he came back he would have it worse the second time than he did on the first occasion.

8659. You never had what I call a short sentence to start with?—No; still I feel sometimes that men could be dealt with. I do not know whether it is that the chaplain's time is taken up, or whether it is a matter of indifference with him, but you know there is really no personal dealing, or very little personal dealing, with prisoners in prison by the chaplain. I have, perhaps, just had a visit, and the chaplain has come in and said, "Good morning, have you anything "to say?" and then he has gone out of my cell again.

8661. In what respect?—Well, I feel that I do not think that any man that is in his right senses, if he has a chance when he leaves the prison of doing better, would wish to go back again. I passed the same remark to Mr. Bucknill. I said, "Do you think, Sir, "that, man as I am, I desire to go back to be incar- "cerated for the best part of my life in prison? Do "you think I wish it, or that there is anything "enticing to draw me there, if I can do anything to "prevent my going back?" I do not suppose, taking men right away round, you would find one who was desirous of going back of his own choice, if he had the opportunity of doing better, or means provided for him to do better. I believe there are cases of men where crime becomes a sort of mania with them. I feel that for these habitual criminals, to a certain extent, they should not be allowed their liberty; that they should not be kept in a prison, but should be more confined to a home, or an establishment, or a colony, or something of that sort.

8662. That they should be deprived of their liberty?—Deprived of their liberty so that they should not mix with the public. I think after a man has had a certain number of convictions so that you would take it that a man is continually in and out of prison that he is bound to steal. It is the same as it is with a man who has given way to drink and is powerless from that, so that it becomes a sort of mania with him. I think it is as much a madness in regard to that man as it is with a man who continually drinks. He has no control over himself.

8663. What you would like would be that they should find some home to go to when they come out?—Yes.

8664. Which they might avail themselves of or not as they please?—Yes.

8665. But you do not find any fault with the prison treatment?—No, but I have been exceptionally fortunate. I have gone through seven years of it, and I think it is only two reports that I had brought against me. They were very simple; they were just for laughing or talking; otherwise my treatment has been really as good as I could expect.

8666. At all events as good as you could reasonably expect?—Yes, as I tell you, taking it right through.

8667. But assuming that there was some little change of diet you really would find no fault at all, would you?—No; well you would find fault in this way; you would miss your liberty and certain privileges, but nothing that would really tend to lower a man and make him worse. Now as regards the books or visits——

8668. I will not ask you anything about that. You have explained that fully?—Yes.

8669. (Chairman.) In answer to Mr. O'Connor, you said that you thought it would be an injustice to a man to have a longer sentence passed upon him upon his third conviction?—Yes.

8670. I think you said he would be then punished twice for the first offence?—Yes, of course he would take it to be so.

8671. But of course, as you know, there are a large class of habitual prisoners?—Yes.

8672. There are a large number of men in prison who belong to what are called the habitual class of criminals?—Yes.

8673. And these men carry on criminal work which does not expose them as a rule, to very long sentences?—Yes.

8674. And they come in continually under short sentences?—Yes.

8675. Now my question is as to that class of criminals who are distinctly from calculating motives going in for a class of crime which only exposes them now and again, when they are caught, to short terms of imprisonment, do you think that class of criminals would be deterred by the knowledge, that when they had been convicted a third and fourth time, they would be subjected not necessarily to imprisonment for an additional time, but to considerable periods of detention?—Yes, I think they would; that would bring out my meaning, that where a man is in prison continually like that, he is not responsible for his actions. It is a sort of mania with him, and that man ought to be confined.

8676. You would hold the same view with regard to drunkards?—Yes, that they are not responsible for their actions.

8677. You think it is very little good to send a drunkard to prison for three days or a week continually time after time?—No, it is very little good.

8678. He requires different treatment?—Yes, different treatment altogether.

8679. I think you said you described yourself as a first offender without its being discovered that you were not during the first three months of your sentence?—No, when I passed as a first offender I was in Bodmin Gaol. That was the one previous to my last conviction. I passed through there as being a first offender, and was tried by the magistrates as a first offender.

8680. And on other occasions you passed as a first offender?—No.

8681. Only once?—Only once.

8682. Of course on your original conviction you were actually a first offender?—Yes.

8683. And on the last conviction but one you again passed yourself off as a first offender?—Yes.

8684. Do you think that many prisoners successfully pass themselves off as first offenders?—Well, they might perhaps if they got into a different county, because there seems no manner of knowing a man unless he is known by the police reports. I do not see that the warders could tell a man, because, as an instance of it, when I was at Bodmin none of the officers knew me and I had never been there before, and the police did not know me there, and they had no means of knowing that I had been in prison, nor could they prove it.

8685. Do you think that the present prison system affords any reformatory influence on the prisoners?—That it tends to reform the men, do you mean?

8686. Yes?—No, I do not.

8687. Would you say that without any qualification?—Yes, I do, because I feel somehow that the surroundings and the isolation tends every way towards developing all that is evil in a man.

8688. And if you hold that view would you then consider that the prison system as it exists is seriously defective?—Yes, it is not a deterrent to crime, I take it, owing to there being so much seclusion for the prisoners.

8689. You think it is an admirable machine and fairly conducted as such?—Yes.

8690. And fairly administered?—Yes, as regards rules and cleanliness and everything that way, but the system for reforming, I think, is very defective, because if the chaplain would go round where he could have personal dealings with a man and reason with him (as I feel men ought to be reasoned with to show them the errors of their ways, apart from what they hear from the pulpit), and I believe if philanthropic gentlemen were allowed to go in and mix with the prisoners, and visit them on a different footing from what the visiting justices do, and really become acquainted with the prisoner and his friends in that way, it would have a wonderful effect on the prisoners. I believe if it were possible for other denominations, or for Congregational ministers to take the pulpit for a change occasionally, it would do the prisoners good, and to visit them as well. Many a man, perhaps, would say, "I am not a Wesleyan, and I do not belong "to the Church of England," and therefore he takes no notice of them. If a man is a Roman Catholic he has the opportunity of having his own priest to visit him, but if he says he is a Protestant, then whether he is a chapel man, or a Church of England man, or anything else, he is compelled to listen to the Church of England clergyman. I myself was always brought up as a Wesleyan, and I felt often that if I could have applied to some Wesleyan ministers and told them what I thought, and placed my view before a minister of that church, that possibly their influence would have been greater on me, and there might have been a great deal more done for me than there was. I could have felt more friendly towards them.

30 Nov. 1894.

The witness withdrew.

The proceedings were adjourned for a short time

Captain Frank Johnson called and examined.

Capt. F. Johnson.

8691. (Chairman.) You are the governor of Dartmoor convict prison?—I am.

8692. How long have you held the post?—Two years and nine months.

8693. What posts have you held in the prison service before that?—I joined it at Dartmoor as deputy-governor in September 1877, and I remained there until February 1880, when I went to Portland. I remained there until November 1886 as deputy-governor; then I was promoted to be governor of Dover prison where I remained until March 1889 when I was promoted to be governor of Parkhurst, and I remained there until February 1892, when I went to Dartmoor.

8694. What is Parkhurst now?—Parkhurst is a convict prison.

8695. For men?—Yes.

8696. Have you any opinion upon the practice of sending convicts for nine months to local prisons?—On the advantage of it?

8697. Upon the existing practice. Do you think it works well?—I think it used to work better when they went to Pentonville.

8698. For what reason?—I think the discipline of the men that came from Pentonville was better on the whole than it is with the prisoners that now come from the local prisons.

8699. Do you find that there is evidence of different treatment and different kinds of discipline now in the various local prisons which act deleteriously on the men?—I do not know whether it is the different system of discipline, but I think at Pentonville the discipline was more consistent; it was all under one man, and it was all carried out on one system, and I think it is better than where you have a variety of governors. Some are more strict than others, so that you get variety in that way.

8700. They were all disciplined under one distinct plan at Pentonville?—Yes.

8701. Should you be in favour of going back to that now?—Well, I do not think really that it makes any very material difference.

8702. Should you be opposed to the prisoners coming direct after conviction to the convict prisons?—No, I should not, because I get them now almost direct. I get them as separate confinement prisoners very often at Dartmoor. I keep them there the first nine months. I have got about 40 at this moment who are doing their first nine months separate confinement.

8703. Where do they come from?—They come mostly from Wormwood Scrubs Prison when it is a little overcrowded.

8704. They had been in Wormwood Scrubs for some little time?—Only for a month or two.

8706. With regard to classification, what prisoners compose the star class?—Well, the first offenders.

8707. Are they all first offenders in the star class?—Yes, they are all first offenders in the star class.

8708. Have you any power to put other prisoners in the star class?—None at all.

8709. Do you keep these apart?—Those are kept apart.

8710. They are associated together in labour?—Yes, but not with the other convicts.

8711. Do you keep them apart in chapel?—Yes, they sit distinct from the others. Of course, I have no star class at Dartmoor.

8712. Why not?—All the star class are kept at two prisons now; the bulk of them are at Portland, but some few of them are at Parkhurst. I have no star class whatever at Dartmoor.

8713. You have no first offenders?—No; if I get a first offender I submit his name for Portland or Parkhurst.

8714. Then have you any particular classification that you carry out at Dartmoor?—No, none at all, except that as far as I can, I always put the young convicts to work at trades as much as I possibly can. I would rather give them the preference to work at a trade than I should an habitual criminal.

8715. Do you think there is not as much danger from the point of contamination from young prisoners as from old?—Well, I do not think there is much either one way or the other. Some of the young prisoners are some of the worst I have got. I do not think they would be contaminated by the older men. I think in many cases there would be a tendency for the younger ones to lead away the older.

8716. Have you formed any opinion as to the condition of prisoners when they are discharged. Are they generally speaking healthier than when they go in?—Considerably, I think. I think there is no doubt about it.

8717. You think that both physically and mentally they are better?—Yes, decidedly.

8718. You are quite satisfied about that?—Yes, quite satisfied. I know that when a man has done his first nine months separate confinement (of course, he has been shut up all that time working in his cell) he looks pale and somewhat sickly; he has not been exercising his muscles in any shape or form; but directly he gets out upon the works he is sunburnt, strong and healthy. No doubt there is a vast improvement in physique during the time they are in prison.

8719. It is suggested that the eyesight deteriorates, and that sometimes colour blindness is produced?—Well, I have never come across a case of that kind.

8720. The convicts are not allowed to talk?—No.

8721. But I suppose as there is so much associated labour there would be more opportunities of talking in convict prisons than in local prisons?—Yes.

8722. And they do talk?—They talk whenever they get an opportunity, I mean to say we are constantly getting prisoners reported for talking. It is kept down as much as possible, but it is absolutely impossible to stop it altogether.

8723. It would not be true to say of the convicts that when they go to convict prisons they are condemned to continued silence?—No, practically it is not so; besides, they must talk about their labour; they must necessarily talk to the officers or instructors about their work.

8724. You have of course a great deal of associated labour?—It is practically all associated labour with the exception of those few separate confinement convicts that I have got.

8725. How many of your men work on the farm?—Of course the numbers vary according to the able-bodied men we have, but I should say that taking an average there are about 300 on the farm itself; but the numbers vary according to the numbers in the prison, and if I get an increase in the number in prison I put them to work on the farm.

8726. That is 300 out of about 1,100?—At the present time I have got 1,030 of whom about 300 are on the farm.

8727. How much land do you cultivate?—The amount of land under cultivation is, I think, about

Capt. F. Johnson.
30 Nov. 1894.

1,050 acres, and I have got about 950 acres to bring under cultivation—to reclaim.

8729. The rest would be on the farm?—Yes, the rest would be on the farm proper; working the cultivation of the land.

8730. You could put on almost an indefinite number for the purpose of reclaiming the land, I suppose?—Yes, there is no limit to that except the limit of the staff to look after them.

8731. What class of men do you put on that work?—Able-bodied men; men who are passed by the doctor for first-class labour.

8732. Do your men prefer farming?—That depends on what they were when they were outside. The agricultural labourer does prefer it, other men who were not accustomed to digging would prefer the lighter work.

8733. It is severe labour?—No, I do not call it severe labour, but every man has his task to do, and he cannot shirk it. I do not call it hard work.

8734. Would you say it is one of the best forms of prison labour you could have?—Yes, it is a very good form of prison labour.

8735. In the case of mechanics and artisans, do you try to make them, as far as you can, follow their previous avocation?—Yes, we are only too anxious to get them.

8736. And a man likes his own occupation?—Yes.

8737. He prefers it?—Yes, as a rule he certainly prefers it.

8738. You would not then send a man to a farm whom you could employ as a fitter or a plumber?—Certainly not; but they themselves would be very apt to want to go to the farm. That is one of the difficulties I have. I put a man to his trade, but after a time he will ask me to put him on to the farm or to one of those small parties which are called privileged, where there is more scope for freedom, and easier work, they are not so much looked at. Then I will say to him, "You are a good plumber" or "a good "carpenter, and I cannot allow you to go there;" and he imagines he has a sort of grievance; so that the consequence of that is that although you may yourself think you are doing your best for the prisoner, (you would really be doing so by teaching him a trade and keeping him to it) he thinks it is a grievance, because he is thereby prevented from going with a privileged party, that is, with a party where he does not have very much work, or where he has easier work.

8739. Sometimes the artisans prefer to go to the farms?—Yes, they will come up and ask for it. They cannot go to the farm to look after the cattle, &c. until the last 12 months of their sentence or thereabouts.

8740. Have you any unproductive labour?—None at all, except as a punishment. We have the crank.

8741. That is just a crank in the cell?—Yes, that is the only form of unproductive labour, I think. That is simply a punishment for breach of prison discipline.

8742. Do you think that better distribution of labour could be made as between convict and local prisons?—I do not know exactly what the system of local prisons is.

8743. I mean the difficulty of providing labour in local prisons is chiefly due to the fact that so many men are in for very short sentences?—Yes.

8744. And that prevents the authorities from training the man to do anything like skilled work?—Yes.

8745. But there are certain articles which require a certain amount of skill which also can be made with a comparatively short period of training and consequently those particular occupations are very well suited to local prisons?—Exactly.

8746. It was represented to us the other day that at Lewes they had been until recently making large quantities of coal sacks for the Navy, but that it had been taken away from them altogether and transferred to convict prisons. I think you make coal sacks?—Yes.

8747. It does not require a high degree of skill?—No, a man within a fortnight will be able to make a coal sack and to make pretty well one a day.

8748. You would agree, then, generally, that it would be desirable to give to the local prisons that class of work that would be most suited for them?—Yes, coal sacks, hammocks, mail bags, or things of that sort; any convict ought to be able to make one of those after about a fortnight's practice.

8749. Who settles what particular kind of work shall be done?—At the convict prisons the directors do. They send me down certain articles to make and then, of course, I dispose of the labour to the best advantage.

8750. You have just to make them?—Yes, I make them.

8751. Did you ever find it difficult to make them on account of the want of skilled warders?—No, in fact the difficulty I find is in getting sufficient work. I can do more work than I can get given me to do. Of course, in certain trades I have a difficulty in working up to the time, such as, of course, basket-making and boot-making. I must of necessity have sufficient time to make the number of articles that are required, but I have never had any difficulty in turning out all that has been required, though, of course, there is a limit to my production.

8752. Do you supply Government departments direct?—Yes.

8753. When you get an order you consign the articles direct to the Government department?—Yes, to the dockyards or to the War Department or General Post Offices.

8754. Do you find a difficulty sometimes in being punctual with your deliveries?—No, not at all. I am working very well up to date, but there have been times when I have been behindhand, but not at the present time.

8755. Do they complain of the quality of the work?—No, I have had no complaint. Of course a few articles are condemned, but then they are sent back to me and I replace them, but the articles which are condemned are very few.

8756. Do you have any work in the cells which produces a good deal of dust?—No, none at all.

8757. You avoid giving work to be done in the cells if you can?—Yes, the only men that work in the cells are those separate confinement convicts. At the present moment they are mostly doing tailoring. Of course they have worked at hammocks and coal sacks that I had to supply, but I am putting them now to tailoring.

8758. You have regular workshops so that they do no work in the cells?—Yes, I have regular workshops.

8759. Are you satisfied with the size of your cells?—I am not. Of course the old corrugated iron cells are too small, they are 7 by 7 by 4. They are too small and personally I should like to see them abolished.

8760. How many cells of that class have you?—586, and I think about 730 large cells.

8761. When the convicts are sent to you from Wormwood Scrubs do you put them in the larger cells or in the smaller cells?—The convicts from Wormwood Scrubs are in the large cells, all the separate confinement convicts are in the large cells.

8762. Do your convicts complain of want of ventilation?—Some few do. There is a good deal of difference of opinion on the point; some convicts prefer the smaller cells, some prefer the larger.

8763. You do not like them yourself?—I do not.

8764. From your own personal observation, do you think they are close?—Yes, you really cannot get sufficiently good ventilation in so small a cubic space. Not only that, but I think it is bad for discipline. If I had all large cells the number of reports would be very considerably reduced, because they cannot talk together in the large cells, but in the small corrugated iron cells they can.

8765. Freely?—It is very difficult to detect them with only one officer on patrol. We do detect them, but a good deal of conversation can go on before they are detected.

8766. What is the thickness of the partition?—Certainly not one-eighth of an inch. It is merely corrugated iron.

8767. And a whisper could be heard through it?—Perhaps it would be a little above a whisper. Some of them try to make holes through, and that sort of thing, by which they can communicate a little more freely. It gives a deal of trouble.

8768. Have you made any representations to the Commissioners on the subject?—Of the iron cells?

8769. Yes?—No, I have not, because I think it is so very well known that I do not think that it needs any representation. It is a thing the evils of which are very well known.

8770. Are you satisfied with the regulations which govern visits to prisoners and communications which they may make to the outside?—Yes, I think so. The only thing I think is this (I do not know whether it would be against the law or not): They get so many visits according to their class. Now, assuming that a man was due for a visit to-day and he sent a visiting order to his friends, and his friends could not come to visit him at that time, then in a short time that man might commit himself and get under punishment, by which he would be reduced in his class and would not be entitled to a visit. Thus if a man was in the third class and due for a visit and committed himself before the visit took place, he would be reduced to the probation class, and in that class he would not be entitled to a visit. Well, at that particular time, his friends might wish to visit him, but by the rules he would not be allowed the visit. I am inclined to think that if a man were due for a visit at any time, that a subsequent offence should not prevent him from having that particular visit that he had earned at the time it became due. That is the only thing which I think is rather hard upon him.*

8771. You think that some further discretion should be given to governors in such cases?—Yes. If a man had once earned his visit he should have it, although he was reduced in class after the visit had become due.

8772. Would you increase the discretion of governors with regard to letters?—Yes, I would, in the same way. Of course, a man can write a letter when he likes. When his letter is due he has only to apply for power to write his letter; but the visit, of course, depends upon the man's friends and not on himself.

8773. Are you satisfied with the regulations as to prison offences?—Yes.

8774. You have no suggestion to make on that?—None at all.

8775. Do you often have to have recourse to flogging?—Very seldom. I have had very few cases.

8776. Do the warders complain to you at all about their hours of labour?—They have not done so recently, because, I think, they are all fairly well satisfied. I think one thing would be a great boon to them, and that is, if some scheme could be adopted by which they would not have to turn out so early in the morning.

8777. That is a question of strength, is it not?—No, I think it is more a question of arrangement. I think some arrangement could be made by which they could come in at 6 o'clock in the morning instead of a little after 5 without interfering with the hours of labour.

8778. Why do they come in so early?—Well, they have to come in early. In the first place they have to unlock, and empty all the slops, and things of that sort, and then to give all the prisoners their breakfast, and serve the breakfasts out; then they have to go to their own breakfasts and come back again in time to take the prisoners to chapel and go out to labour; so that they have got their own breakfasts to get and to perform the duties of the ward.

8779. Do they come in at the same hour both in winter and summer?—No, they are later in winter than in summer.

8780. How much later?—About half-an-hour later.

8781. Do they complain of that?—They have not made any actual complaint, but they have spoken about it. They think that getting up at 10 minutes past five every morning in the winter in a climate like Dartmoor is very trying.

8782. Are you satisfied with the class of men you get as warders?—Yes; as a whole they are very good. Of course, we get some who are very indifferent and some who are very good.

8783. Have you ever known of a case of bad ill-treatment of a prisoner by a warder?—Very rarely.

8784. But it has been so?—Of course, we have known of cases where a warder has ill-treated a prisoner and has been dismissed for it; but I have never known of anything very serious.

8785. Are the warders in charge of the small local prisons generally taken from the convict prisons?—I cannot call to mind one, with the exception of a principal warder at Portland. When I was there he was employed as a clerk, and I think he got some appointment at a local prison; but otherwise I do not know of any from my experience.

8786. Are you satisfied with the work of the Prisoners' Aid Societies in respect of convict prisons?—Well, the prisoners very often complain that they do do not get anything done for them. I have known that, of course; but whether it is the fault of the prisoner himself I do not know. I rather think it must be.

8787. I see that the chaplain at Dartmoor reports that unless something more is done a great number must relapse into crime?—Well, I quite agree with that.

8788. Is it not desirable to put the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies into more direct communication with prisoners before discharge?—As to what they will do for them.

8789. Yes?—Well, before we send a prisoner's name up to the Aid Society we ask the prisoner what he wants to do, what class of labour he wants, and what he wishes done for him; and we state that on the report we send to the society. We say whether he wants to go to sea or what he wants.

8790. Does not that leave the initiative rather too much to the prisoner?—It is a guide to the Aid Society as to what the man wants to do.

8791. I quite agree it is good as far as it goes; but my point is this, would not it be desirable to give opportunities to the accredited officials of the bonâ fide societies to see the prisoners before discharge if the prisoners wish it?—I do not see that there is any objection to it at all. I should think it might work very well.

8792. Would you agree that when a prisoner is discharged there may be a rush made for him on the one side by the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies and, on the other, by his old criminal associates; and it is rather a chance which side gets hold of him. If you enable the Prisoners' Aid Societies to see him, would not it be putting them at an advantage as against the criminal associates?—I do not see much practical advantage in it, because now they go to the Aid Society before they are discharged from Pentonville Prison. For instance, if a man is discharged for London he is discharged from Pentonville, and he goes to the Aid Society before he is seen by his own friends. I can see no objection to it. It might do good in some instances.

8795. Would you agree generally that anything that would give the societies a better grip of a prisoner ought to be encouraged?—Yes, it could do no harm, and I think it would probably do good.

* For Col. Garsia's evidence on this point, see 11,727–9.

Capt. F. Johnson.

30 Nov. 1894.

8794. I see the chaplain expresses a desire to have an assistant?—Yes.

8795. How many Protestants have you?—We have about 650 at the present time, I think, but we have had about 720, and I daresay we shall again.

8796. The remainder are Roman Catholics?—Yes.

8797. You have a Roman Catholic priest?—Yes.

8798. (Mr. O'Connor.) As chaplain?—As priest. He is the Roman Catholic priest.

8799. But is he the chaplain?—Yes, he is the priest of the prison.

8800. (Chairman.) Six hundred and fifty is a very large number for a chaplain to have to look after?—Yes.

8802. What time do you lock up?—Well, the prisoners are all locked up by a quarter to seven.

8803. What is the rule of the prison about books?—Every man can have a library book and change it every week.

8804. Do you think that is enough?—I think so. There is a certain amount of elasticity about it. In fact, the system is this: Every man has the opportunity of getting a fresh volume every week; then the following day the schoolmaster goes round and sees any convict that wishes to complain that he has had the book before, and if so he changes it for him; but all educated men who are anxious to have an additional volume get it on application to the schoolmaster. They are allowed an extra volume of a higher class.

8805. And if an uneducated man, let us say, a man who can read but not do very much else, asked for another book, would not he get it?—Not as a rule, because I think as a matter of fact the book which is given to him is quite enough to last that class of man for a week if he is not a quick reader.

8806. You do not see any objection to giving prisoners books as quickly as they desire, provided you have got a staff to distribute the books?—Not at all, but I think the present system works very well.

8807. Have you formed any opinion as to the comparative advantage of long and short sentences on habitual prisoners?—Well, I am more in favour of long sentences, because I do not believe in the advantage of a short sentence on an habitual criminal. I do not believe in the reclamation of an habitual criminal.

8808. You do not think a short sentence would deter him?—No, I do not.

8810. Still going by statistics, there is a distinct proportion, even of the habitual criminals who had been in four, five, six, or seven times, who seemed at that stage for some reason or another to leave a career of crime?—But what becomes of them? Do they die off, or do they turn over a new leaf? They disappear from the scene it is true; but what becomes of them? Do the statistics show that they have turned over a new leaf, or that they have died off?

8811. Well, we had one before us this morning who had been in prison five or six times. He was not a convict; he was only in the local prisons?—Of course I have got convicts who have been in four or five times who have been in penal servitude for 20 years of their lives.

8812. But I gather you do not think, as far as reformation is concerned, that the fear of getting a long sentence would induce an habitual criminal to change his mode of life?—I do not suppose it would make the slightest difference.

8813. (Mr. O'Connor.) Who inspects your prison?—Mr. Ruggles-Brise is the director at the present time.

8814. How often has he visited it during the last year?—Well, I get a visit once a month from the director always.

8815. And Mr. Ruggles-Brise visits once a month?—No, he has been about four times.

8816. But a director inspects or comes down to the prison once a month?—Yes.

8817. How long does he stay there?—Some hours; they generally arrive about from half-past 10 to 11 o'clock, and generally leave somewhere about 3 or 4.

8818. What other inspection is there except that by a director?—Only by the visitors who are appointed.

8819. How many visitors are there appointed?—About five at my prison.

8820. And how many of those have met in the month?—They do not come in that way; they have to come so many times a year.

8821. And in the present year how many visits from these visitors have you had?—I have had four or five visits this year; I think that is more than usual.

8822. Besides those, is there any independent inspection of the prison?—No, not at all.

8823. The visitors are appointed by the Secretary of State?—Yes.

8824. There was a Commission on the working of the Penal Servitude Acts in the year 1879; I would like to ask you whether you agree with that Commission that the inspection by directors or visitors is not enough, and that there should be inspection by other persons independent of any Government department, such as the chairman of quarter sessions or the magistrates?—Well, I do not see the necessity for such inspection myself, neither do I see the advantage of it.

8825. Have you read the report I refer to?—I am not sure that I have, but I think I have.

8826. They recommended "That some gentleman "of authority and experience should be requested to "undertake the duty of visiting the convict establish-"ments, and reporting to the Home Secretary any "matters which appear to them to require attention. "They should, of course, have free access to the "convicts and to every part of the prisons, but they "should have no power to give any order, or to "interfere in any way in the discipline or manage-"ment"?—That is done now. They are the independent visitors from the Secretary of State as the outcome of that report. Mr. Seale-Hayne is one, and Sir Matthew Lopes is another. They have nothing to do with the prison itself, but are merely visitors to inquire into it.

8827. You are aware that in connexion with the local prisons there are visiting committees, and the local justices at any time have power to inspect?—Yes.

8828. And all the convict prisons in England are down in the south?—Yes.

8829. I suppose you have a good many prisoners from the North of England?—Yes.

8830. Have you ever had anything to lead you to suppose that in individual cases there has been hardship upon a convict or upon his relatives by reason of the distance they are removed and the expense of the journey their friends would have to make to see them?—Yes; of course in many cases the friends cannot afford to come and see the convict on account of the distance.

8831. Have you any idea of the proportion of the men who come from the Midlands, or from the North of England?—No.

8832. Would it be half and half, should you think?—Yes, I should think so.

8833. You have a good many from Lancashire and Yorkshire perhaps?—Yes; from Manchester and Liverpool, &c.

8834. Of course a large number of the relatives of prisoners would not have the means to come?—That applies also to a great extent to men who come from London.

8835. But there is a substantial hardship in that?—Yes.

8836. When the men are to be discharged do you send them from Dartmoor to the local prisons to be discharged?—No; men that are to be discharged are discharged direct from Dartmoor. We put them into the train and give them their warrant and they are free.

8837. To the place from which they are sentenced?—Yes, or to the place to which they wish to go.

8838. That is to say if it is not further than the place of commitment?—No, if it is further than that they are informed that they have to pay the difference in the fares.

8839. Do you think that the severance of home ties is not attended with disadvantage to the convicts?—No, I do not think so; we get individual cases that might be benefited according to certain influences of that description, but I think in the majority of instances they are far better separate.

8840. I suppose in any case a certain amount of discretion would be exercised in admitting friends or relatives to see convicts?—Yes.

8841. Then would you go so far as to say that the majority of people who happen to be under sentence of penal servitude have no relatives whom it would be advantageous for them to keep touch with?—I should say in many cases there is absolutely none.

8842. You do not take a very hopeful view of what is called the criminal class?—I do not.

8843. I notice that in the report on the working of the Penal Servitude Acts it is said that "After the "first nine months convicts are removed to a public "works prison, and there enter upon the second and "longest stage of penal discipline. Excepting some "invalid and aged convicts at Parkhurst and Woking "who live entirely in association, convicts on public "works sleep and have their meals in separate cells, "but labour in association, all communication, "however, being prohibited beyond what is indis-"pensable for their work." That is as far as possible rigidly carried out?—Yes.

8844. The reason of it being the risk of contamination?—Yes.

8845. You told us, I think, how far your experience went back?—It goes back to 1877.

8846. That was before this Commission. Can you say whether any new regulations were made in consequence of this report with regard to isolation or the prevention of contamination?—I think the star class of convicts have been formed since, and first offenders have been kept distinct.

8847. At any rate all communication was prohibited?—Yes.

8848. But do you think that that system under the new regulations has been successful?—Yes, I think so, certainly.

8849. Then how would you account for the fact that the number of re-convictions has risen according to the returns from 18 per cent. in 1879 to 29 per cent. in 1893?—Well, I suppose in the first place in giving shorter sentences you have more men sent out; and that that would increase the re-committals to a certain extent.

8850. I am speaking of a per-centage, so that the number of prisoners would not affect it, and the per-centage is 18 in 1879, whilst for 1893 it is 29. Take another feature of it: how do you account for the fact that the number of revocations of licenses has increased from 11 per cent. in 1879 to 13 per cent. in 1893?—I should account for it by saying that the system is not so deterrent as it used to be. I think the tendency of the age is to make a prisoner more comfortable.

8851. We started with a new regulation which enforced more rigidly the system of isolation and made the punishment more severe with the results as shown in these statistics. Would not you say that those statistics would suggest to you the suspicion that possibly the increased severity has missed its mark?—No, of course I cannot say whether there is any increase in severity. That Commission was held since I joined the service, but I can see no increase of severity. There was no talking allowed when I entered the service first, and there was just the same regulation in force that there is now.

8852. I thought you said there was some new regulation?—Yes, the star class, but talking was prohibited before I got into the service.

8853. I suppose you would agree that sentencing a man for punishment is a delicate matter, requiring training and experience?—Do you mean to prison punishment?

8854. Yes?—Yes, I think it is. It requires judgment, no doubt.

8855. It is a power that should not be placed in the hands of an untrained man?—I do not think it should.

8856. You do not think that the power of ordering flogging should be placed with such men?—No; I think it would be a very excellent thing in certain cases that the governor should have power to order a flogging; but, taking it as a general rule, I should say not.

8857. Who has the power to order the flogging now?—Only the directors at the Home Office.

8858. Has the director who visits Dartmoor had any practical prison experience himself?—I do not think so; he has only just recently come into the service.

8859. And he has the power to order flogging?—Yes.

8860. Is Dartmoor a very healthy place?—Very healthy. I think, if you can stand the climate at all, it is a very healthy place.

8861. Your annual average was 1,077?—Yes, that was about the average last year.

8862. And your deaths were 17?—Yes.

8863. That is 15 per 1,000?—Yes.

8864. Do you know what the death-rate is in the Irish prisons?—No, I do not.

8865. At any rate it is 15 per 1,000 at Dartmoor?—That was for last year.

8866. And for the same period in Irish prisons it was 5·33?—Of course it depends a good deal upon the age of the convicts who come in.

8867. I am taking them all round and taking all the convicts. Do you know what the death-rate in local prisons in England is?—No, I do not know anything about it.

8868. It is 7·6 per 1,000, whereas it is 15 per 1,000 for Dartmoor. The total general average of convicts in all the convict prisons is 14·1; local prisons are 7·6; the Irish prisons are 5·33. The average for Irish convict prisons altogether is 6. Have you had an exceptional mortality during the last 12 months?—Yes, I think they were rather heavy. We had an attack of influenza.

8869. Can you say from memory what proportion of your comparatively very heavy death-rate arose from that?—I fancy at least half of it arose from that. Of course I could not say for certain, but I know there was a considerable proportion from influenza or the result of it.

8870. I see that for the five years ending 1894 the death-rate with you has been 7·7 per 1,000, and it has been 3·9 in Ireland; so that you appear to be constantly twice as high as the death-rate in Irish prisons?—Yes.

Capt. F. Johnson.

30 Nov. 1894.

8871. Do you consider your rate of punishment is high?—No, it is very low.

8872. You have flogging?—Yes.

8873. Do you think you could do without it?—No.

8874. How is it they do without flogging, or have done without flogging, in the Irish prisons for the 12 months?—I do not know. I have known a convict prison go on for pretty near 12 months without a flogging; but I would not do away with it if occasion should arise. They are very few floggings at Dartmoor at present I am happy to say.

8875. I suppose you would not say that the Irish prisoners are more amenable to discipline than the English prisoners?—Not in the least.

8876. Or that the Irish warders are better tempered than the English warders?—Certainly not.

8877. Then how do you account for the very great difference there is in the punishment records of the Irish prisons and of the English prisons?—I do not know exactly what the proportion of punishments in an Irish prison is.

8878. And it is the same in the local prisons too?—Of course you cannot compare the local prisons with the convict prisons.

8879. But is there any reason why there should be a very much lower rate of punishment in the Irish convict prisons than in the English convict prisons or than in Dartmoor?—I do not know what the state of discipline in the Irish prisons is.

8880. I have cut out of an Irish paper to-day a paragraph about the sudden death of a man. The medical man being away there was nobody on the premises who was qualified to administer anything to him in the absence of the doctor. Have you a compounder of medicines at Dartmoor?—Yes.

8881. Is he a man who holds a certificate from the Pharmaceutical Society?—I think he does.

8882. When did he get it?—He has had it for some years.

8883. You are sure of that?—Yes, I am nearly sure of that. He is a qualified compounder. I remember certainly that he has a certificate from some Society.

8884. If you find that he has not will you write to the Secretary and say so?—Yes, I will; I should like to be quite sure of that of course.*

8885. (Dr. Bridges.) I understand the death-rate at Dartmoor was heavier in the last recorded year than in the preceding year?—Yes, I believe it was.

8886. Your ordinary annual death-rate would not be represented by 15 per 1,000?—No, certainly not.

8887. But considerably less than that?—Yes, considerably less than that.

8888. I think you spoke of an attack of influenza that you had had?—Yes.

8889. May I take it that that attack disabled a great number of the staff as well as the prisoners?—Yes, several of them.

8890. And put you to considerable inconvenience, I suppose?—Yes, it did.

8891. Coming to the question of the nine months' system of which you have personal experience at Dartmoor, and having seen some of your prisoners under the nine months' treatment, what is your opinion as to the effect of that upon their health?—I think they get rather debilitated from being shut up so long.

8892. What amount of exercise do they have per day?—An hour per day.

8893. Do they have any exercise on Sunday?—Yes, on Sunday they have rather more than an hour, but they have an hour every day.

8894. Let me ask you one question as to agricultural labour; does the labour on a farm require a larger staff to supervise it than your other forms of labour?—Yes, it does to a certain extent, because there are so many of those small parties that require an officer, and perhaps eight or nine men would require an officer and a guard; whereas in a shop I can work 25 men with one officer; so that the staff must be proportionate; but I do not think it requires a greater staff than any other kind of outdoor labour.

8895. You have experience, I think, of Portland?—Yes.

8896. Comparing the work itself at Portland, would the farm work at Dartmoor require about the same staff as the quarry work at Portland?—Yes, about the same staff as the quarry work at Portland.

8897. You were asked a question by the Chairman about the cells in which the day workers are kept. You think them too small. Those cells open into a large hall, as they do at Portland?—Yes; I do not say those cells are too small.

8898. I am speaking now of these corrugated iron cells?—The corrugated iron cells are too small, but they do not work in those. The separate confinement men, during the first nine months, work in large cells.

8899. But these corrugated iron cells are used for the people who have passed their nine months and who are employed at out-door work or associated work?—Yes.

8900. My point is this: do these corrugated iron cells open into a hall?—Yes; and they have no direct light from the outside.

8901. How is that hall warmed?—By the hot air playing down the corridor.

8902. Is it not warmed by any gas jet?—No, the cells have no gas jet at all; we have the gas jet in the passages but not in the cells. The cells are lighted by candles.

8903. (Miss Orme.) In the suggestion you made about altering the rule for a visit, did you mean that you would like to have a fixed rule made that in a case of that sort the prisoners should not lose his visit, or that you, as governor, should have discretion?—I meant that I should have discretion.

8904. You do not propose that a fixed rule should be made that in a case like that he should lose his visit?—I think it would be as well to have the power to prevent it if the man's conduct was very outrageous; but otherwise, I think, as a rule, if a man has earned his privilege, he ought to get it, if it is through no fault of his own.

8905. (Mr. De Rutzen.) A great number of the convicts, I understand, are employed on the farm?—Practically, about 300 are employed on the farm itself.

8906. As you have said just now, digging is a most salutary form of work for them?—Yes.

8907. But there must be considerable breaks, I suppose, owing to the weather—the frost and the snow?—Yes, very considerable.

8908. During which time that form of labour cannot be pursued?—That is so.

8909. And it may be for three weeks or a month at a time?—Well, it sometimes goes on for weeks.

8910. But at all events, with long breaks owing to the weather?—Yes.

8911. How are those men employed then?—We employ them in breaking stones principally, or failing that by picking oakum, or any work that we can do inside the prison. We have not only wet weather, but we have fog, which prevents them from working. They can work in fog inside the prison walls, but they cannot work outside.

8912. And, of course, the same difficulty would apply with reference to any other scheme arising out of the land?—Yes, to any other scheme; in fact, to any out-door labour.

8913. Any out-door labour must be interfered with?—Yes, you cannot help it.

8914. I suppose, the smaller the area the greater the difficulty?—Yes, exactly.

8915. You have a great plot of land to fall back upon?—Yes; practically we can employ in fine weather any number of them. There is only occupation for a limited number at certain seasons of the year.

8916. Who is your chaplain?—Mr. Rickard.

* Captain Johnson subsequently informed the Secretary that the compounder does hold a certificate.

8917. What is about the age of your youngest prisoner?—I fancy now it is about 20 or 21.

8918. And ranging up to what age?—I have got some of over 70, and even up to 75 and 76 I think I have got them.

8919. Are there any considerable number about that age?—I think there are not so very many over 70, but I have got several of 60.

8920. Who, when discharged, you would not expect to see again in the ordinary course of things?—Well, a good many of these old men do come back.

8921. Even at that age?—Yes, perhaps not at 75; but many of the older men do come back.

8922. What is the Princetown School? Is that in any way connected with the prison?—Yes, it is a school for the warders. It is managed by a school board, of which I as governor am chairman and correspondent.

8923. Then it is not in any way connected with the prison?—Yes; it has not anything to do with the instruction of prisoners, but it is for the instruction of the officers' children. Of course we admit those who are not connected with the officers' children; that is, we admit the children in the neighbourhood.

8924. In answer to the chairman you said, with reference to the Prisoners' Aid Society, that something more might and ought to be done with reference to the aid given them?—Yes, I think so.

8925. Now, in what direction would you say that that something more should be done, what form do you say that should assume?—Well, I think certainly the form that it ought to assume is in getting them work if it is possible to do so. Of course, I should not think that giving them much more money would be of any real advantage unless that money was the means of obtaining them employment, such as getting them tools or anything of that sort.

8926. You mean that the something more which should be done would be that the only good which was likely to arise to the prisoner would be getting him work to do?—Yes.

8928. That is nothing as compared with the good of getting him work, you think?—Yes, the gratuity is not sufficient to keep him unless he can get work; and it is not sufficient to buy him any tools: and I think the assistance should be in giving him work and even in a little gratuity to assist in starting him.

8929. What would be your view, supposing there was a home where you could shelter him just long enough for him to turn round and settle down?—Well, instead of drawing their little gratuity all at once, I would like to see the gratuity increased to a certain extent and given at the discretion of the Aid Society to a man if he deserved it. I mean to say, supposing a man has a 6*l*. gratuity like a man gets with a six-years' sentence (who can get 6*l*.) then he can go out with his gratuity and he spends it. But then he has nothing left; and if an agent of the Aid Society could see that that man was really deserving of assistance, and was striving to do well, I think it would be a great advantage to be able to increase that gratuity for the man's benefit, but with power to withhold it if it was shown that he was making a bad use of it.

8930. But assuming that he obtains that gratuity, what is your opinion on this: would it be better bestowed if he also had the advantage of a home of some sort?—Yes, I think so, certainly; if he had the advantage of a home where he could go to he would be far less likely to fall into crime than if he goes to his own friends, who are often a great deal worse than he is himself. If you keep a man away from evil associates, he has a much better chance of getting on in the future.

8931. We have heard, and we know, that prisoners who have been sentenced to three years' penal servitude are able by good conduct to obtain a remission and go out on ticket-of-leave?—Yes.

8932. They obtain a remission of nine months?—Yes.

8933. Does that act as a great inducement to them?—Very great.

8934. You find that it acts well?—It does certainly.

8935. And of course they naturally value that remission of sentence, but do you think that it has a very marked effect upon the conduct of the prisoners?—Very great. I think you will find that out of every 1,000 prisoners practically about 700 of them hardly ever get reported at all and will earn nearly the whole of their gratuity.

8936. And you think that that is the natural outcome of the system?—Yes, I think it is. I think the system tends to give them habits of discipline and good order, and I have no doubt whatever that the fact that they can earn that gratuity has a great influence upon them, and also the earning of privileges received from good conduct. I believe the whole thing tends to promote good conduct in prison.

8937. It has a marked effect upon them?—There is no doubt at all about it.

8938. Assuming that to have a very marked effect upon them, is there any kind of reason why that should not have a similar marked effect upon prisoners sentenced in local prisons to a term of two years?—I can see no objection to a man sentenced to two years earning a certain remission, but I suppose the difficulty is in making one law for the whole of them, because some of them are only a few days in prison.

8939. We can pass over these very short sentences and come to those who have a long sentence, and you think the marked effect you have discovered in convict prisons would have a like effect upon them?—Yes, I think it would have a very good effect upon the local prisoners.

8940. May I take it that that would be your opinion—that the remission, however short, would be something to look forward to?—I think it would act well in promoting good conduct in prison. No doubt there are many prisoners who would work better and be more contented in every way if they knew they were earning something in the way of remission, because often when I have got a convict who by misconduct has lost his remission, he would say, "I have "got nothing to gain," and would behave badly, but if they have got a little remission left they will go on straight in order to obtain it.

8941. (Mr. O'Connor.) Has your attention been called to this, that there are prisoners who go from one end of a year to another without a visit from the chaplain at all?—He has often spoken to me upon the subject, and said that he has not time.

8942. There were prisoners who passed from one end of the year to another without seeing the chaplain?—Yes, I have no doubt that is the case.

8943. And you think there ought to be an assistant chaplain?—Yes, I certainly think it is advisable.

8944. Will you look at this book, which is the 16th Report of the Irish Prison Commissioners, at page 60 first of all, where you will see the heading "Corporal Punishment." How many cases of corporal punishment do you find inflicted in the local prisons in Ireland in that year?—I do not find any.

8945. Will you kindly turn to page 120, "Convict Prisons." How many cases of corporal punishment in the year were there in Ireland?—I do not see any there.

8946. Can you suggest how they manage to carry on the convict system without corporal punishment in Ireland if it is necessary here?—Well, of course I cannot say what the nature of the 54 cases of violence which are put down here are.

Capt. F. Johnson.

8947. I thought you gave us to understand that the Irish prisoners were not more amenable to discipline than the English?—I do not say they are, but there are here 54 cases of violence, and the question is if some of those cases of violence had been treated with corporal punishment whether the number of cases would not have been diminished.

8948. And how do you account for the fact that there is a smaller proportion of offences to the average number of prisoners in Ireland as compared with England?—Do they keep up as strict a discipline in Ireland as we do?

8949. You think the relaxation of discipline might possibly result in a smaller number of offences, and that therefore there would be a diminution in the records of punishments?—Yes, you may by laxity of discipline reduce punishment, but you will not increase the discipline of a prison. You may nominally show a low per-centage of punishment and yet not have your prison in the same state of discipline and good order as it ought to be.

8950. (Chairman.) Does the chaplain still continue to give weekly instruction in religious knowledge?—He does.

8951. How long a day would that take him?—He generally takes a class in the evening.

8952. But how long would it take him?—That would be about an hour.

8953. That is a considerable demand upon his time?—Well, I do not think there is any very considerable demand upon his time, because you see his work commences in the morning. He comes into the chapel and reads prayers the first thing in the morning at 7 o'clock, and then he goes out generally about half-past 12 or 1. Then he would have nothing to do until the evening. They are not very long hours of work, but the prisoners are all out at work and he has not the opportunity of seeing them.

8954. You think it is a change, perhaps, for him?—Yes.

8955. Is there anything else you wish to state to the Committee bearing upon the reference?—No, I do not think so with regard to the treatment of prisoners.

The witness withdrew.

Col. Plummer.

Colonel PLUMMER called and examined.

8956. (Chairman.) You are the governor of Borstal Convict Prison?—Yes.

8957. How long have you held that post?—For two years and four months.

8958. What other posts have you held in the service?—I was first deputy governor of Borstal for seven years; then I was deputy governor of Dartmoor Prison for seven years; then I came back to Borstal as governor, and I have been there for two years and four months.

8959. You have plenty of accommodation now at Borstal?—Yes, we are only using two halls out of four.

8960. Are the cells large?—They are corrugated iron cells.

8961. Like those at Dartmoor?—Yes, only larger; they are a better class of cell than the corrugated iron ones at Dartmoor.

8962. Do you think they are adequate?—I think so. The men are very healthy.

8963. But they can communicate through the partitions?—Yes, that is a difficulty; but there is just this to be said, that the communication is almost as easily heard by the officers outside as by the prisoner in the next cell. It is heard in the hall, so that attention is very quickly drawn to it.

8964. Are you in favour of sending convicts for the first nine months to local prisons?—I should like to shorten the time myself.

8965. Do you see any advantage in the practice?—No, I do not.

8966. None at all?—Well, I think that probably three months would be very much more satisfactory; that is my opinion.

8967. What would be the advantage of three months?—Simply that the men who were really very backward in education, and who were also, perhaps, suffering a good deal in health from leading evil lives, would have an opportunity, I think, of settling down before they came to the convict prison.

8968. I suppose, if that is so, the local prisons would really be glad to pass them on to you at once?—I am sure they would.

8969. But, as a matter of discipline, you do not see any advantage in sending them to the local prisons previously?—No, I do not at all.

8970. Have you any star class men?—No, we have none at Borstal.

8971. Have you any view to represent to the Committee upon the subject of classification other than the star class in convict prisons?—I think, of course, the star class works admirably. I have not had them under me, but from all I can gather from those who have worked them, I think it works remarkably well. On the other side, I cannot quite formulate anything that is really practicable, but what I should very much like is that men of long service, when finishing that service, should have some relaxation of prison discipline for the last year before they come out. It seems to me that men of long sentences go back to the world totally unfitted to be outside; they have been for so long mere machines in prison that I do not think they really are fit to take care of themselves for the first week or two after they go out of prison, and I think many of them get into trouble before they have found their legs again.

8972. The contrast is too great, you think?—Yes. We have done everything for them, we have treated them like babies, we have nursed them, we have changed their clothes when they are wet, we have really taken such care of them as nobody else in the English kingdom is taken care of; certainly not soldiers. Then suddenly the man is shot out into the world with nobody to do anything for him, and I think the transition is too great for him in many instances.

8973. In what direction do you think it should go?—It seems to me that in order to do it successfully, you would have to have a small prison entirely for them, and to give up one prison entirely to them because you could not mix the disciplines, but if you had a prison where all prisoners with long sentences of over seven years, or, say, of over five years, did their last year under relaxed discipline where there would be more talking, and a great deal more visiting allowed by outsiders, I think the men would go out in a much better position to start the battle of life.

8974. In the case of a three years' man, would you treat him the same in point of time as you would treat a 10 or 15 years' man?—No, I do not think he needs it; you see after all he has no longer than the ordinary local prison man, so I should class him with the local prison man. I do not think he is so long in our hands as to get into what I call a comparatively helpless state with regard to the world, but I have often noticed men who have had, say, sentence after sentence of seven years, winding up with a 10 years' sentence, who have spent, you may say, 20 years in prison, and really when they come to go out they seem to me to be most unfitted to go out.

getting letters from other aid societies telling me of a man who could be got work if only a little money could be given. I would, of, course, willingly give it myself if I had it, but I have not. I think that those are cases in which, if each aid society had a small capitation grant, not to be used for each prisoner, not to be counted as his in any way, but as a general fund which the Aid Society might use in furthering the interest of any special man, it would be an enormous help.

8976. Who would settle which aid society should have it?—I would give it to them all. It would not be any very great sum, but it would just put such a sum in their hand as would enable them to push on special cases which could be helped if the money were really in hand. I was trying to adapt that so as to make it fair all round to everybody, because I think if only the London societies got it the country societies would feel they were not being fairly treated.

8977. Do you think it is advisable to give the Prisoners' Aid Societies better opportunities of seeing the prisoners before discharge?—Yes; I am sure it would.

8979. If a prisoner wishes to see a representative of the society, can he see him?—Yes; we should admit him without hesitation.

8980. Does he often express such a wish?—No; because being away from London he would not think it possible. Of course I may say our chaplain is unwearied on the subject of doing all he can for them in the time previous to going out, by learning their wishes, &c. He comes to me and we communicate together, in many cases with the Aid Society. I myself take the opportunity of asking every prisoner before he goes what he wishes to do. There is not a single man leaving that I do not have a private interview with, and I am very happy to say I have often had very happy results from it.

8981. Do you think many of your criminals originally offended through drink?—I should put drink down as a secondary cause, not as a primary cause; I mean he begins to go downhill before he takes to drinking. With the young men you may consider that there is one history for most of them; that is to say, a young man becomes very independent, he sets his parents at defiance, he is too proud to go to Sunday School, he gives up going to church, he simply acts on his own will and takes to spending his Saturday evenings at the music hall or at the public-house, and he gradually slides down the hill; but it is the one simple thing in all cases, it is the throwing off of all the good that a man has ever had; and this leads to the second step, which is drink. They all seem to me to be very like each other in these young men's cases. I hear a great many of their histories. In your private interviews with them you hear their whole life from each of them, step by step, I should say that godlessness was the first step and drink the second.

8982. Have you plenty of opportunities of giving labour in the prison?—In the prison itself do you mean?

8983. Yes; in and about the prison?—Do you mean the actual convicts?

8984. Yes?—Yes. Of course we exist simply to make the fortifications for Chatham.

8985. That is your general work?—Yes. Besides that we have only the shops that are really needed to carry on our own prison work, such as a little tailoring which is chiefly mending, a little carpentering, and then the blacksmiths to mend the tools for the War Office.

8986. What is your number?—275 is our strength. We have 270 to-day.

8987. Have you any farm?—Yes.

8988. How many men work on that?—We only use 15 men on the farm, but now and again at harvest time I increase them by a few; but that is about our strength.

8989. What amount of land have you?—About 70 acres.

8990. Do you find it is satisfactory work for the prisoners?—Very satisfactory.

8992. You have no unproductive work?—No.

8993. Except as punishment?—Yes, our great drawback is that in a small prison like that we have no provision for trades; and that I look upon as a serious weakness.

8994. Does your experience lead you to think that a trade taught in prison is followed outside?—I think so in many instances, especially where a man is really changed, and many of them do really go out changed men. I think if they go out with a trade, they do not come back again. I think also there has been a great improvement of late years with regard to the feelings of the prisoners with regard to their sentences.

8995. Are you satisfied with the working of the mark system?—Yes, very much so.

8996. You have no suggestion to make?—No, of course it must greatly depend on the human instruments that administer them; but I really think, by the constant supervision we have, everything is very fair, and there is a very marked difference to-day from what it was five or six years ago. In the old days if a man was stopped a mark or many marks by the governor he took not the slightest notice of it; now a man counts every mark he gets, and if an officer stops a mark the prisoner is down to see the governor the next day. There is not a single mark stopped that is not brought before me. There is quite a change brought about in their spirits in that way. Every man is trying to see how soon he can get out of prison, and that he earns everything that he possibly can.

8997. What proportion of them lose marks?—We had 220 last year without a single punishment.

8998. That is during the year?—Yes.

8999. And a great many who were in through the whole period of their sentence, I suppose?—Yes, a very large number; in fact, you may say that crime is in this state that if I could send away 30 men I should have no crime.

9000. Have you any suggestion to make with regard to the regulations governing visits to prisoners and communication with them?—Well, the visits I think are sufficiently often. I do not know that I should interfere much with that. Of course I think you want possibly a little bit more to break off the monotony of the life. I should be glad to see a little more visiting from either inside or outside, it is a little difficult to fit in with a due regard to the fact that the man is doing penal servitude and therefore that you must not unduly relax his punishment, but I think either by an increase in the Scripture readers, or if gentlemen from the outside who are really suitable could visit a man and see him once a fortnight it would have a very happy result. The chaplain with his best efforts cannot visit every man much oftener than once a month, and I think that is not enough.

9001. Do you think it is desirable to give the governor greater discretionary power as to that?—Yes, I think so, certainly.

9002. Then with regard to punishments and prison offences, have you any suggestion to make to the Committee?—Well, I am thankful to say that I notice a wonderful change in the last ten years. When I joined the service the punishments were very severe for all offences in prison. It seemed to be the rule that everything should be punished with severity. I am glad to say those days are gone, and I think that is one main cause why our prisons to-day are so exceedingly well conducted—(I do not know about other prisons so much as my own, but I can honestly say that it is so)—is because now their offences are reasonably treated. They are not unduly punished for what outside you would call trivial offences and which ought to be called trivial offences.

9003. From your personal knowledge you can say that the proportion of punishments to the population in prisons has materially gone down within the last ten years?—Very much and in Borstal marvellously so.

9004. Do you keep your younger prisoners apart from the older men?—No.

9005. You make no distinction?—No, we are rather peculiarly situated in that way. No prisoner comes to us who has more than five years of his sentence to do. We are supposed to be situated in a peculiarly insecure position, and we are therefore granted an extra guard. We work right out in the open and have to go to and fro between the forts. The men are never sent to us if they are long-sentence men unless they have got within five years of their time. You may say the generality of men who come to us have only three years to do, so that we have no opportunity of classing them in ages. We have no very great opportunity of seeing really aged men.

9006. From your experience do you believe in long sentences?—No, certainly not. I do not see how in some cases it is to be avoided. There is no doubt the professional criminal, who is a very hard person to deal with, who comes in with the intention of using the whole of his time in prison in making fresh plans, and he really does not seem to be able to see that his course is wrong. He looks upon it as being quite like a trade. He is a very difficult person to deal with, and I do not know what you are to do with him except to shut him up.

9007. For such a man as one who regulates his crime so as not to be exposed as a rule to long sentences but who is continually getting his six months, should you be in favour of a cumulative sentence?—Up to a certain point—not above two years. I think if the men had two years' rigorous imprisonment that is what the extent should be in that way. Of course there are crimes for which you must go beyond it, I mean crimes of violence, crimes of manslaughter, abominable outrages and things of that sort. Of course there is no help for it, and for crimes of that sort a long sentence is the only possible punishment; but what I am thankful to see is altering to-day is the enormous cumulation of punishment a man used to draw down on himself by simply a continuation of petty larcenies, where the whole amount that he might have really stolen during that time might be even less than 1*l.*, and yet he may have had to be imprisoned 15 or 20 years for it.

9008. Do you think that the warders' hours are not too long?—Not now, certainly.

9010. Would you limit it to the old warders?—No, I would simply make 26 years the time. You see a warder cannot retire until he is 60, so that I would say after 26 years' service the conditions of pension should be as follows. I take the police as the model which suits the conditions, only I remember that the prison pensions would have to be reduced, because the police have been contributing all through their service to their own pensions.

9011. Have you any views to express to the Committee on any point that has not yet been raised?—I noticed in reading over what has gone before, that there seemed to be an opinion generally adverse to the use of the crank.

9012. You only use the crank for punishment?—Only as a punishment, but it is very valuable as a punishment. I should be very sorry to see it done away with. There are particular cases of idleness, and, strange to say, some cases of lightheartedness, where the crank acts admirably.

9013. I think the crank has been used rather as a form of labour than as a punishment?—That is quite a different thing. Then there is one thing I might mention, and that is the rules with regard to the special class. A man is allowed to have a special class, that is a seven years' man, if he has passed through the first class with exemplary conduct. That sounds very well, but it does not work well, in my opinion. A prisoner may behave most abominably all through his sentence down to the day on which he reaches this point. He enters his first class, and he then behaves admirably, and he gets into the special class and gets 6*l.* on discharge. Another prisoner has been, perhaps, the whole of his sentence until within a short time of the period, when he would come within the rules, admirably well behaved. He gets into a little trouble and falls under two or three minor reports, and it just prevents the certificate of his first class being exemplary, so that he loses the blue dress. He certainly ought to have it, and the other man ought not, in my opinion. I think if it were a reward simply for general exemplary conduct during his service it would be much fairer, and would enable the governor to bring to the director just the very man who ought to receive it, but instead of that there are many men who ought to have it who do not get it now by the present rule.*

9014. (Mr. O'Connor.) I notice that out of 382 prisoners there were 220 who were not punished at all?—Yes.

9015. Of the remaining 162 some got loss of privilege or class, some suffered dietary punishment, and one had the punishment cells. Are those all punishments which you can inflict?—Yes.

9016. I notice that they do not bear a very high proportion as compared with similar punishments in other prisons?—The only punishment that I cannot inflict is corporal punishment.

9017. Who is the inspector that visits your prison?—Mr. Mitford.

9018. Has he ever had any practical prison experience?—Not before he came as director.

9019. I notice that whereas you have a comparatively small number of other punishments which you inflict, yet under the head of "Corporal punishment" I find you have as many as seven against 382 prisoners; that is to say, it is the highest number in the whole of the service, except at Portland and Dartmoor, where they have 1,400 or 1,500 prisoners?—That would show that the director listened very much to the governor's view of such matters.

9020. Who will order the punishment?—I bring the case before the director; I put them back for trial, and the director tries them, and very naturally learns privately from the governor the general circumstances and what the governor's view on the subject is before he gives his decision. These were mostly cases of a bad habit that began to get into the prison of men losing their tempers with each other, and not being simply content with giving the other a blow with the fist, hit them on the head with a shovel or a pickaxe; and I thought the best way to stop it was corporal punishment, and it has stopped it.

9021. Is there anything in the system of administration which led to these violent assaults of prisoners which could be remedied?—No, I think not. We have three or four men that really I do not know how you would keep from periodically breaking out. They seem to be men of ungovernable temper. They go for three or four months, and then they break out one day, and the first man or officer who speaks to them they go at like a wolf.

9022. Would you say that possibly such men might be suffering from mental or nervous disease?—It is very hard to say, because after they are punished they go on for five, six, or seven months without another attack, and it certainly does repress an attack; which is very remarkable, and I have thought over it a great deal. They are nearly always men of a very low type and men who have had no advantages.

9023. Do you think you find in this country men of a lower type than are to be found in Ireland at all?—No, I do not think so.

9024. You have no reason to suppose that Irish prisoners are more amenable to discipline than English prisoners?—It certainly was not my experience at Dartmoor.

9025. The Dartmoor system, I suppose, was very much on all fours with the system at Borstal?—Yes; it was a large prison, and from its situation there was a larger proportion of desperate men sent there.

9026. Can you account for the fact that the Irish convict prisons and all the Irish local prisons have been conducted for a whole year without a single case of corporal punishment?—No. That is very striking indeed.

9027. You would not put it down to the difference in the character or the class of prisoners?—I do not think so, because I think, from my recollection of Dartmoor, that a very large proportion of assault cases came from the Irish prisoners.

9028. Would you put it down, then, to any difference between the subordinate officers in the English prisons and those in the Irish prisons?—I think that might possibly be so; I think the simple fact possibly of English officers not understanding the Irish character might make it quite likely.

9029. But they do not seem to understand the English character either, if you are to judge by the number of corporal punishments?—Well, it is a curious thing. I think it would be very hard to give you an estimate in that way; these things come on in the prison, I may say, like a wave over which you have apparently no control, nor can you tell where it comes from.

9030. Have you ever known the wave recede so as to disappear completely and leave the column for "Corporal punishment" empty altogether?—Yes, I think Borstal has been without it for a year.

9031. I am speaking of all the convict prisons?—I am not well enough up in statistics for that.

At this stage of the proceedings Sir ALGERNON WEST took the Chair.

9032. (Mr. De Rutzen.) I understand one of your suggestions to be in favour of removing the long-sentence prisoners for the first year before their sentence has expired and to remove them so as to give them a gradual slope down into the world?—Yes, into a natural life again.

9033. Would you send them to prisons?—Yes, if they had an entirely separate prison.

9034. I think you referred to relaxed discipline; that would mean a freer intercourse between one and another?—Yes, and while they were at their work allowing them to talk.

9035. Do not you think that object would be gained by allowing them to go to any Aid Society which would provide them with a home? Would it not have the same effect?—Yes, it would, but you see that Aid Societies cannot start to do it now.

9036. I am assuming that there were such places as an Aid Society which had a home?—Yes.

9037. And which was endeavouring to make itself self-supporting?—The only difficulty would be that there would be a certain number who would not go to it.

9038. Who would not go from choice?—That is so.

9039. Then they must have had some other view in their mind?—No; there is a certain class of men, and some of them are the better class of men, who look upon it as a question of receiving charity, and even prisoners are proud sometimes, and they really do not like it. If you point out the advantage to them, they say: "Oh, no; I should be very glad of "the extra 3*l.*, but I cannot go to the Aid Society; "I would rather not."

9040. Those would be few, I suppose?—Those would be comparatively few.

9041. But for the majority, a home, if there was such a place to be found, would be a great boon?—It would.

9042. And would be of the same good, useful, and beneficial character as the prison you suggest?—Yes, certainly, and you might make it a little more tempting to them. You might during the time a man was in the home, knock off so much of his police supervision, which would make him all the more desirous to stop there. I do not think you would lose much by it.

9043. Do you think that of itself, in addition to the ticket-of-leave and remission of sentence, would also act as an incentive to good character and behaviour?—I am sure it would.

9044. And in that sense have a beneficial effect upon him?—You see there is another point to look at it from, which is, that it would then enable you to do what I regard as a very needful point, that is, the teaching of trades. It is very difficult to teach a man a trade when you want him for other work, but during that year, if he could simply be run through the shops with nothing to do but to learn a trade, we could send them out as first-class tradesmen; men who had got their hands in pretty well beforehand, would be turned out fit for work. Many of them, when I asked them what they were going to do, said: "Well, I would go back to my trade, but what "can I do." See, I have been on the barrow run "for the last three years. I am a tailor by trade, "and it will take me weeks before my hands are fit "for tailoring." So with the finer trades such as watch making.

9045. That would be an additional advantage of having 12 months to clear off the outward and visible signs of it?—Yes.

9046. Of course you know the outline of the chaplain's duties?—Yes.

9047. Do you notice that the class of men who come from your prison are men of a very low standard of education?—They were; they are getting better, but we have still got a sprinkling of those with very poor education.

9048. There is a table showing the educational status of 197 prisoners on conviction. Now on conviction I notice that there were 12 who could not pass any standard, and there were eight who could only pass Standard I.; 20 who could only pass Standard II. That is the educational standard?—Yes.

9049. And 23 who could only pass the third standard?—Yes.

9050. That is on conviction?—Yes.

9051. Have you found of late years that the standard of education, considering all the facilities given at the present time for education, is very low amongst those who come to you?—No, I should hardly say so. It varies very much, but the system pursued now with those men is to give them just double the amount of school we do the others.

Col. Plummer.
30 Nov. 1894.

9052. That may be, but on reception what would your answer be?—It is higher than it was 10 years ago.

9053. But it is still very low?—It is still low.

9054. Now in writing. I see there are 16 on conviction; that seems that there were 16 who could not write at all?—Yes.

9055. On conviction in arithmetic there were 33 who could not pass the standard, and so forth?—Yes.

9056. I only wanted to know what the effect of education might have been. Do you find that a great many and a large proportion are of very low educational power?—No doubt there are a large number on what you would call the very lowest rung of the ladder. They can just read and they can just write, and they can do no more.

9057. And are what, I may say, is more or less entirely uneducated?—Yes, they are.

9058. And have missed the meshes of the school board?—Yes, entirely.

9059. (Sir Algernon West.) I wanted to ask you one question. You have advocated there being something between a prison and a home for prisoners leaving. Would you suggest that those people should earn wages during that time?—Well, I do not think it is necessary. I do not think it is needful. Of course I think myself that the incentive would be sufficiently great to have the prison discipline relaxed and to be simply placed under instructors in various trades. I think that would be an ample incentive without anything else.

9060. What should you say as to your own convicts earning very small wages which they could spend either by sending it to their friends or on luxuries for themselves?—I do not think it would do.

9061. You know it is the practice in some other countries?—Yes.

9062. Have you any further suggestion on any point you would like to make before leaving?—No; well, I am afraid it would be out of your province, but I should like to suggest that there is one very discontented person in the prison, and that is the governor. However, my grievance is not against the Directors but has reference to a decision in respect of my salary.

9063. (Mr. O'Connor.) Have you any suggestion to make with regard to the discretion the governor has as to the treatment of prisoners? Would you enlarge his discretion in any way?—No, I think I have quite ample powers.

9064. And sufficient staff?—Yes, and I am sure you will be pleased to hear that the support that is now given by the directors as far as I am concerned (and I believe it is the same everywhere by the new directors), has been found a great comfort and a help to us all. We have great sympathy shown to us and great help in our work by the recent changes in the Board of Directors.

The witness withdrew.

The proceedings were adjourned to Thursday next, 6th December, at 12 o'clock.

SEVENTEENTH DAY.

Home Office, Whitehall.

Thursday, 6th December 1894.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P. (CHAIRMAN).

The Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B.
Sir JOHN EDWARD DORINGTON, Bart., M.P.
JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, Esq., M.B., F.R.C.P.
ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Esq., M.P.
ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis; and
Miss ELIZA ORME.

JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Secretary.

Dr. Bevan Lewis.
6 Dec. 1894.

Dr. BEVAN LEWIS called and examined.

9065. (Dr. Bridges.) I think you are medical superintendent at the Wakefield Asylum?—Yes.

9066. You have held that position for how long?—For over 20 years.

9067. As assistant medical superintendent?—Yes, assistant medical officer and superintendent.

9068. I think I am right in saying that the Wakefield Asylum has been practically for some time a sort of school for research into medical psychology?—We have endeavoured to make it so to the fullest possible extent. We admit there not only clinical assistants, who go in for psychological study, but also assistants from other asylums, who are allowed to come down and spend a month or two in our pathological laboratory.

9069. The medical staff at Wakefield Asylum has, for many years, issued an important series of medical reports?—The West Riding Asylum Medical Reports have been issued for several years.

9070. They are especially directed to the physiology of the brain, and to what may be called mental psychology?—Yes.

9071. And you have contributed a very large number of papers to that, I think?—I have written chiefly in the records of the Royal Society, and also other societies; not so largely for the work you are now alluding to. I have also contributed papers to that work, of course, but not so largely as to the others.

9072. I think you are also the author of a text book?—Yes, a text book on mental diseases.

9073. You have had, I presume, in the Wakefield Asylum, a certain number of patients who have committed crimes, or what are supposed to be crimes?

—Yes, that is so; we draw, of course, from the neighbouring prisons—from Her Majesty's prison at Wakefield, and also at Leeds—criminal lunatics who are sent to us for the ordinary association with the insane community there.

9074. Have you any account of the number of those that have come under your observation?—Yes, I can give you the figures. The criminal lunatics received during the last 10 years amount to 126; there are still remaining as criminals 3, and still remaining as pauper lunatics, transferred from the criminal to the pauper class, 23. On the other hand, I should mention a class, that is the pauper patients received from the prisons who are not admitted as criminals, but whose sentence has been allowed to expire in prison, and who are then transferred to us at the asylum. Those amount to 40 during the same period. Altogether we may say the class of lunatics with a criminal history will amount to 166 during the past 10 years, so that it is not a large per-centage, of course, to the total inmates.

9075. The criminal lunatics, I suppose, are not those who have been charged with the gravest of crimes?—No, certainly not; they are more or less for minor offences.

9076. Because we understand that the gravest charges are sent to Broadmoor?—That is so.

9077. The criminal lunatics which you admit, then, are cases of what kinds principally?—Thefts, larceny, and other petty offences. In many cases they are simply for drunkenness and disorderliness, frequently repeated. These cases frequently embrace the ordinary pauper patients suffering from mental disease before they have got into prison, mental disease of ordinary pauper patients existing before they have got into prison.

9078. There are many cases you have received as ordinary lunatics in your asylum who have been discharged as apparently well, and who have then committed some offence?—I should scarcely go so far as that. The larger proportion of patients received in that category would embrace those who were discharged on trial to their friends, and who have subsequently got into prison and not recovered; perhaps I may be allowed to add that they are mostly feeble minded.

9080. Do you take precautions as to reports being sent from their friends? Have you any reports sent to you?—We have really no authority to demand any such report; it might be impossible; but we uniformly communicate with the friends, and obtain from them a statement that they will be responsible for the care of their relative, and so far as possible prevent his being admitted upon the rates of the union in future.

9081. And notwithstanding that care, a certain number of those that you discharge fall through and commit some kind of offence?—Yes; I am very much surprised we do not get them all back through the prisons, because they are just that class who are epileptic, epileptoid, and paralytic, showing the early stage of some physical weakness which renders further detention necessary. They often come back to us as confirmed paralytics to die in the institution. A large proportion of cases of general paralysis come to us from prison after having, of course, served a certain period there, when a little further examination, if it were possible and practicable on the part of the medical authorities, might prove them to have been from the first more or less devoid of intelligence from the act which they have committed, and such as would in every way justify their detention in an asylum.

9082. Do you agree with those medical authorities who hold that crime is always, or very nearly always, connected with mental unsoundness?—Well, I go very far in that view, I would not emphasize it so strongly as Lombroso, Krafft-Ebing, and others have done, but they have all some kind of physico-psychical basis.

9083. Do you go so far as to say that you regard the committal of a crime as in itself evidence of mental unsoundness?—Certainly not, but the habitual criminal I regard as simply a degenerate offspring of a very degenerate stock; and if I may be allowed to express my opinion more freely, I would say that both insanity and crime are simply morbid branches of the same stock. Given a certain environment you will have crime; given a more favourable environment, and you will have simply insanity.

9085. But you feel that there is a point of borderland where it is extremely difficult to tell whether an act has been committed with full mental faculties or with degenerate mental faculties?—Yes, I am very painfully impressed with the fact that there is a borderland where the difficulty is extreme; but they so dovetail into each other, conditions of mental enfeeblement, insanity, and crime, that it becomes a great question how far the medical authorities ought to dictate. That I quite allow. I myself believe that on the border line between insanity and crime a very large proportion of the criminal class stand. By the criminal community I do not alone mean those who are officially recognised as criminals, but those who are at large and unrecognised, who come to us as pauper lunatics, and who may not go to prison at all.

9086. Coming back, then, to the 166 persons in the last 10 years of whom you have spoken to us, what proportion of those would be connected with drink?—I can quote more satisfactorily the figures which were given some years since by Dr. Clarke, of Her Majesty's prison at Wakefield. I myself saw the way in which those statistics were drawn out. I felt satisfied that they were accurate throughout. Of course it is a question which is open to numerous fallacies, but I feel altogether quite persuaded of the accuracy of these figures. I can quote them as cases of ancestral intemperance. In cases of ancestral intemperance, the whole criminal community gives 43·5 per cent. of drunken fathers. I am not taking parents, but limiting it to drunken fathers. This is an important point, because we want to get at the ancestral intemperance on the father's side. Then 43·5 was the figure given to us. When he restricted his examination to epileptic criminals ancestral intemperance was much higher with those prisoners who presented epileptic or epileptoid symptoms more especially; it runs up to 49·5. There was a border class of 18·2 almost certainly cases connected with ancestral intemperance, and which figures must be added on to the 49·5, which brings out about 67 per cent. who are supposed to be of drunken parentage.

9087. (Mr. O'Connor.) Have you any idea of what proportion the 43 per cent. and the 49 per cent. represent the same cases; that is to say, what proportion would the cases be in which there were epileptic tendencies, and in which at the same time there was inherited intemperance. Would they go closely together?—I think they would, but I do not think I could answer that question.

9088. But the proportion would be considerable?—The proportion would certainly be considerable.

9089. (Dr. Bridges.) Do you distinguish as an inciting cause ancestral intemperance. I think you mentioned that?—Yes, I did.

9090. Do you distinguish the cases in which the intemperance was not inherited or acquired in a particular case of an individual?—I refer the ancestral intemperance entirely to the father's drunken habits, and the evolution of crime in the offspring.

9091. The offspring being also intemperate?—Sometimes, but that comes out in a proportion of 66 per cent. of all criminals, and 73·7 per cent. of epileptic criminals. Perhaps, with that I might bracket this, that a striking contrast can here be drawn out between crime and insanity. In the examination of the statistics of our asylum at Wakefield, I find that amongst 4,000 of our pauper patients who were admitted during the past 10 years, ancestral intemperance comes out in a very small proportion of cases, in spite of every inquiry made from friends. Out of 4,125 insane admissions at Wakefield Asylum during the past 10 years, 6·6 have to be referred simply to an antecedent history, showing ancestral intemperance. Out of 2,311 males, the proportion runs up to 9·39, and a priori the difficulty of eliciting intemperate habits in the family is of course very great.

9092. When you speak of intemperance, do you include other toxite agents besides alcohol?—No, it is entirely alcoholic intemperance I refer to here.

9093. Have you been able to distinguish insanity which is due to morphia?—It is very rare that we meet with a case in our institution, but we get them occasionally.

9094. Do you attribute a large quantity—I am rather confining my attention now to the 166 cases you have brought before us, and I am dealing with those who committed crime, because that is, of course, our immediate purpose—do you connect very much of it with sexual excess?—I am afraid I must very largely, as regards criminals.

9095. Then, coming to the question of these criminal lunatics, and keeping to that still, have you made any observations as to congenital malformation?—To a certain extent; but I have not carried that out to the extent of putting it through the improved methods now being adopted in prisons. I refer, of course, to the Bertillon measurements, and to the cranio-metrical instruments, which will be used both in prisons and asylums, I have no doubt.

9096. You have paid considerable attention to the subject of lunacy statistics generally?—I have to a certain extent, so far as they are embraced in my special domain.

9098. In a town of 10,000 inhabitants, you think it a natural thing that some 30 cases of lunacy, all told, should occur?—Yes, that is so.

9099. If you found such a proportion as 50 occur in such a population, you would think that a good deal above the average?—It would certainly surprise me.

9100. Have you had any experience of prisons at all?—My experience so far has been limited. I have endeavoured to visit the community, both at Wakefield and Leeds. I have had frequent interviews there both with the medical staff and the prisoners. Perhaps I may say I have had an experience amongst the prison communities there, and especially at Wakefield.

9101. With regard to the treatment of prisoners who are kept under observation in prison, you are aware that where there is any suspicion of insanity, the rules are that a prisoner should be kept under careful observation on the part of the medical officer?—Yes.

9102. The doctor of course having every discretion with regard to his dietary and so on?—Yes.

9103. Do you think that the life in prison during that period of observation is at all calculated to prejudice the mental health of the prisoner?—I fear so very largely; if you refer to solitary confinement I must emphasise my statement very much indeed, but if you refer to what I should call "separate confinement." that is free admixture, not with the criminal community at large, but association with the warder, chaplain, and medical officer, and every other association apart from that of the criminal community, I should say not so much, but certainly solitary confinement very strongly predisposes to the elaboration of insane conditions.

9104. You are aware that the prisoners who are kept under this kind of observation are not in solitary confinement, nor are they even in separate confinement?—The class you allude to would occasionally be subject to solitary confinement, I understand.

9105. For a very short period?—The convicts who come to Wakefield Prison would be there for nine months at the very outside, and they are then drafted in to their convict prisons, but during that nine months of course we are dealing with an extremely degenerate class, and the effect upon their mental constitution I should not think ought to be taken so much notice of as in the cases of those who are not convicts or habitual criminals, but those who commit offences of minor degree and nevertheless manifest neurotic tendencies. Their confinement, even of a separate description such as I have alluded to, I think may be attended with a serious risk, more particularly in the evolution of hallucinatory conditions. My feeling is, that in all degenerate cases, just as with all weaklings, there is a tendency to dominant ideas, the mind has a very narrow circle of range, and if any special morbid idea comes up, it will be dwelt upon, and its elaboration would result. This state is frequently associated with hallucinations and delusion based thereon, and very frequently re-acts in some morbid conduct. I have had it stated to me on several occasions that the legal period of confinement of two years (which is the maximum) frequently results in these forms of disease, and that after 12 months of confinement the medical staff must look out anxiously for evidence of insanity in these criminals. It is just possible that a man may seem queer and eccentric, and that is almost invariably confirmed in every case upon examination by finding some morbid condition which dominates him after 12 months' confinement.

9106. If you had to deal with prisoners with regard to whom you had any suspicion, I take it you would prefer that they should be in association?—Distinctly so, but certainly not in association with the habitual criminal.

9107. Not in association with one another?—I should prefer a segregation so complete as to classify those prisoners who were habitual criminals, and separate them altogether from those who were not criminal by neurotic inheritance, but by simple admixture, and who had committed crimes for the first time. The simple mentally enfeebled should be segregated entirely apart from the criminal classes.

9108. With regard to this mentally enfeebled class, do you think it very important to keep them employed?—Certainly, I do. I look upon it as an all-important factor in their treatment, not only as regards their employment and the elaboration of the motor centres of the brain as associated with evolution very largely indeed, but also by giving them calisthenics, gymnasia, and exercises of that sort; I believe there is a tendency on the part of the mind to evolve under such circumstances, and if this be associated only with very thoughtful culture and training on the part of those who are specially chosen, I think in the case of these mental degenerates we may get very good results. We are looking to this in our asylums, and I see no reason why parallel cases in prisons should not be treated in the same way.

9109. Would your prefer that they should be out of doors?—I should, certainly, and that they should be trained in various occupations, employments, and trades.

9110. I think I may take it from what you have said that you would consider that the medical officer of a prison should be a man who has paid some attention to mental disease?—Yes, I should say so; but I would guard that observation with the remark that I do not for a moment insinuate that such a man should be chosen from the ranks of the asylum body, because it is a fact that we have in our asylums a very large body of men who take up the employment tentatively, who are not quite convinced that private practice will suit them better than a county lunatic asylum, and who leave it for private practice. Such men as have not special psychological knowledge or training are not the men for the prison service, and there are a large number of prison officers who, if they were permitted to spend six months in a large county asylum, would turn out a very important body of men for the purpose in question. The difficulties of diagnosis are very great, and it is requisite that they should have very fair training in insanity.

9111. You have, I suppose, sometimes been consulted as to a criminal who pretends to be insane?—Certainly; and frequently. In fact the object of my visits to Wakefield Prison generally is the elucidation of the morbid factor, if there be one, or the proof of the malingering.

9112. And you sometimes come to the conclusion that the man is malingering?—Certainly.

9113. And to detect malingering requires very considerable skill and experience in the state of mental disease?—I should certainly say it does require a large experience in the study of mental disease.

9114. (Chairman.) Do you pass any criminals on to Broadmoor?—No, unless accidents demand it, as in the case of a murder committed at the asylum, which has been the case occasionally. There have been one or two cases I may say.

9115. Do you consider that the cases that you take from the prisons are among the worst cases of insanity, or are they about on an average with the others?—They embrace a large per-centage of general paralytics, and general paralysis is invariably a fatal disease, and one for which no cure has ever yet been obtained. These general paralytics on an average die within three years of the commencement of their symptoms, and the prison population shows many of these cases whose condition is simply one of morbid habits in early stages of the disease; but their friends do not appreciate its meaning, and they get abroad and commit thefts. The act is utterly illogical in its nature, yet they are not recognised even then as being mentally incapable. They are sent on to prison, and serve certain sentences there, and are eventually brought to us at the asylum.

9117. Then with regard to the remainder of the patients that you take from the prisons, do you find that these cases are very serious, and generally permanent?—I do find it so. We always look upon a case as a case of mental enfeeblement if we detect a very strongly inherited condition; if there is a strong neurotic heritage, and if we can look back far enough into the history of the case we usually find epilepsy or drinking habits in the ancestry, and chorea and other nervous affections. We generally find the subject is so degenerate that he remains a marked subject for lifetime; mentally enfeebled, and either a recurrent case of insanity or else a case of recurrent crime.

9118. What is your per-centage of recoveries?—At the Wakefield Asylum it would average, I think, 40, a little above the general return given by the Commissioners of Lunacy for the whole of England and Wales.

9119. Forty per cent.?—That is 40 upon the admissions into our asylums.

9120. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Forty per cent. upon the admissions?—Yes.

9121. (Chairman.) Then of course it would not be so high as that with regard to the patients you take from prisons?—No, not nearly so high.

9122. What per-centage of the cases you take from prisons could you say were attributable to prison treatment, to having been put in prison with solitary confinement, No. 1 diet, and so forth?—I should be very sorry to say that the insanity was manufactured in prison. I do not affirm that for a moment. What I mean to say is that the evolution of their symptoms is brought about by certain forms of treatment in prison, and that a degenerate offspring will, if placed in certain conditions, evolve invariably hallucinations and other mental troubles, whereas if he were out abroad it would not be the case.

9123. Can you say how many cases were cases in which the germs of insanity had been matured through the more or less necessary conditions of prison life?—I do not think we have any statistics upon the point. I do not think there are any to offer, and more particularly owing to the fact that a very large proportion, I believe, of the criminal community (I would guard that observation by stating that this is entirely a matter of opinion) are degenerate and pass away out of our prison into ordinary life on the expiration of their sentence without being recognised officially as on the border line of insanity, if not actually insane. I feel sure that many general paralytics sent to prison will pass out into life again and come back to us as pauper lunatics.

9124. Then I understand you to say that you have no knowledge of any cases where lunacy was manufactured in the prison, so to speak, but there are cases in which prison treatment may have hastened the development of insanity?—That is just my opinion. I think it would be most unfair for me to maintain for a moment that lunacy was manufactured by the prison treatment apart from what you have just stated.

9125. Do you think, taking Wakefield for instance, where you have an average of 600 prisoners, that the medical supervision is sufficient, amongst other purposes, for watching symptoms of insanity among the prisoners?—Yes, I do so far as the present system is concerned, although I should certainly advocate a much more thorough inspection, under different conditions, of the whole prison community. All who were regarded as neurotic we should be able to segregate more thoroughly, and I have no doubt that, with official cognisance of incoming cases, lunacy would be detected before they came to us; but with the enormous admission into our prisons of 30 to 50 a day it would be utterly impossible for the medical authority to give that attention which is necessary for the weeding out of those neurotic cases. They are discharged before such attention could be bestowed upon a case.

9126. Do you think that it would be desirable, if it were possible, to concentrate in particular prisons the weak-minded and neurotic prisoners for special observation?—I think it would be a most progressive movement, and one of very vital importance. My views have always tended very strongly in that direction. I think that the segregation of the feeble minded, both of the asylum and criminal classes, should be attended to much more closely. I do not refer here to ordinary prisoners and say that they should have in such places a medical superintendent at the head of the establishment, because it would involve a very large amount of labour, and medical capacity I think alone would be able to manipulate it properly. I do not for a moment suggest that a medical superintendent should be appointed to all large prisons. I would not for a moment suggest that; but to such intermediate institutions as I understand you to allude I should say certainly medical supervision should be given.

9127. In every prison you find a few—6, 12, or 20, as the case may be—of this particular class of men.

6 Dec. 1894.

What I was meaning was that these cases could be concentrated in some particular prison where they could be specially treated and specially watched?—I am inclined to think there is a heavy per-centage of such cases, and that it would be found necessary to multiply such institutions if the question were once taken up.

9128. Are you in favour of special treatment of habitual drunkards and the provision of compulsory detention?—Under State control, certainly.

9129. You think that possibly that might save them from ultimate insanity?—Yes, I do think so; I am of that opinion.

9130. Supposing you had special prisons for such habitual inebriates, would it be advisable, do you think, to have a branch of that establishment for the detention of the weak-minded and neurotic prisoners, or would you keep them entirely separate?—I should feel inclined to keep them entirely apart, but I see no reason why they should not be associated with the feeble-minded class in large asylums. They are parallel more or less; they are educable to a certain extent; and such institutions would inaugurate an era of—not such repressive measures, but expansive educational measures; and I think all those measures should be adopted which involve careful medical supervision with the view of bringing them to the condition of healthy rational beings.

9131. I suppose when you receive a prisoner whose sentence has not expired, the prison is charged with the expenses?—That is so.

9132. Then after the expiration of his sentence, what is done?—Then he is relegated to the class of pauper lunatics, and becomes chargeable to the union where the offence was committed.

9133. (Mr. O'Connor.) I suppose you regard it as a matter of great importance that when a man is taken to prison on a charge there should be ample opportunity and facilities for a correct diagnosis of his mental condition?—Yes, I regard that as an all-important consideration.

9134. Could you give the Committee any practical suggestion which would not involve any very large expenditure, as, for instance, by establishing a new institution by which such a diagnosis could be secured, especially in the case of those short sentence prisoners who would be liable only to short sentences if they were convicted?—My feeling, I think, I have partially expressed on that point; that is, that the medical officer in charge of that prison should be, in the first place, recognised as an enthusiast in the study of craniology, and that that man should have a preparatory training in our asylums. I believe if he were allowed to have six months' attendance upon the insane communities the gain would be very considerable indeed; but of course they are not afforded that opportunity, much as they wish for it. Over and over again I have heard the expression used, "I only wish I could come to an "asylum and study mental disease there for a short "period," just as we feel, on the other hand, that as regards prisons we should like to go and see more of prison life, but we cannot do so. With regard to the other suggestion, I think it is all important, and much more important in every respect.

9135. Have you had occasion to look up, or have you from curiosity looked up, the professional antecedents or qualifications of the great bulk of prison officers. Do you know whether they have had any training to enable them to make rapid diagnoses?—I am aware that occasionally an officer is drafted off from the asylum service into the English prisons; but I think they would be in the minority, and very largely in the minority.

9136. What would you say would be a necessary medical staff to deal fairly with, say, 200 prisoners in a single day?—I may take it that those prisoners are fresh admissions into the prison?

9137. Yes. Take a London prison, for instance. We will take 100, or 200, or 300, if you like, in a day. What would you say would be a necessary medical staff in order that such a reasonable diagnosis might be made as to secure proper weeding out of subjects more fit for the asylum than for the prison?—Am I to understand that the diagnosis must be made summarily, and must not extend over some days; say a week?

9138. Well, I suppose three days at the outside?—I should say four officers in that case.

9139. For how many prisoners?—For 200 admissions per diem.

9140. You think that something under 100, say about 50, would tax the energies of one man?—I think so, if the work were efficiently performed.

9141. (Chairman.) You mentioned, I think, that you rather wished you had more frequent opportunities of seeing the prisoners in the prisons?—Yes.

9142. Did you mean that you have not time for such visits, or that there was not sufficient opportunity?—Well, I simply meant that with a population of 1,400, and an admission rate of 460, at the West Riding Asylum, it would be quite impossible for me to devote the time I would like to devote to that work. My position would be altogether different from that of the officers in charge of one of Her Majesty's prisons in this respect, he may be able to afford time for the attendance with the sanction of the authorities; but in lunacy I think it is quite impossible. Our time is so much taken up by departmental work and by administrative routine, I am sorry to say to a very large extent over and above the conditions of medical life. The medical officer of your prison is a typical medical officer, that is to say, he does not take up the administrative work which the governor does, whereas the medical officer of a lunatic asylum has a large amount of administrative work to do.

9143. I suppose you have had no difficulty in getting access to a prison whenever you wished?—No, not at all. I have always received the kindest attention and consideration.

9144. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Do you find any objection in the asylum to having criminals sent to you, associating them with men who have been admitted as paupers?—Yes, distinctly so. The association must be recognised as vicious to those whose maladies are simply not their fault but their affliction. The young insane girls and lads of tender age are associated immediately with habitual criminals, and it is impossible, as the system is at present adopted, to segregate them in our large asylums. We cannot separate them.

9145. You think the State ought to make some other provision for the lunatics who are criminals than sending them to the pauper lunatic asylum?—Unless the Local Government Board intervenes, and renders it possible to act in a different direction, my own feeling is that we are even now evolving a condition of things in asylum life which may meet that question. We are trying to establish acute hospitals for the insane. That would be a building specially devoted to the recoverable cases. We should take in all admissions, but should draft off the chronic cases, which would include nearly all the criminal class, into the large county asylums. We should receive the recoverable class here, and detain them until cured.

9147. Then you would have the criminal in that hospital and also the chronic cases?—We should only admit him into the hospital, and should pass him on to the chronic block.

9148. There he would be mixed with a class who are not criminal?—Not the young and recoverable case or the case of mild mental enfeeblement—cases which may be more or less dealt with successfully; but that there is such a vicious tendency to such admixture in our asylums I have not the slightest doubt. I can refer to many cases where undoubtedly the young pauper lunatic has come in to us somewhat mentally enfeebled, and has been much degraded by association with a certain class of criminals.

9149. You have a sufficient number in Wakefield to produce that effect?—Yes, we have a certain number who remain there as paupers. There are 23 there at the present time as paupers who have been criminal lunatics, and whose sentences have been completed.

9150. In fact, they changed their status on the expiration of their sentence?—That is so, and above that number there would be 11 others remaining in the asylum who were admitted into the asylum upon the expiration of their sentence as pauper lunatics. They have inherited all the features of the criminal lunatic, but at the same time they are classified as pauper lunatics, and mixed up generally with the others.

9151. Practically you have received a certain number of persons on their discharge from prison as insane who have completed the whole of their sentence notwithstanding they were insane in prison?—That is the case. The number amounts to 40 during the past 10 years.

9152. Is not it rather singular that they should have kept them as insane in the prison when they were recognised as insane, and yet should only have certified them as insane on the completion of their sentences?—It would suggest itself in the first place as showing a want of special training of the medical officer of the prison, but I would dissent at once from that, owing to the fact that I am acquainted with the difficulties of the medical staff. I am only too well aware of the difficulty. The medical officer may have made, of course, an anxious inquiry into the mental condition of the patient, and may think he finds evidence of insanity, but the difficulty you have to deal with is that he may be malingering. The consequence is that after weeks of constant observation he has come to the conclusion that the man is insane, and he presents the man for certification, but the magistrate fails to see what the medical officer wishes him to see. Of course you cannot expect the magistrate to see what the medical officer has for months failed to elicit, and the consequence is that the man remains longer in the prison. The magistrate absolutely refuses to certify such a case in many instances, I believe.

9153. Then when these men are discharged, on whose initiative are they brought to you? Is it through the relieving officer?—Yes, the class I have just alluded to are the pauper patients.

9154. I mean pauper patients discharged from the prison; are they brought to you by the relieving officer?—Yes.

9155. So that he comes to you under the ordinary conditions of a pauper lunatic?—That is so.

9156. How do you know then that he has come from prison?—The magistrate's order for his detention at an asylum accompanies it.

9157. But the man is discharged from the prison. So far as the medical officer and the gaol are concerned they are quit of him?—Quite so.

9158. But by some action taken inside the prison the relieving officer has been notified that a prisoner is about to be discharged who is probably insane?—That is the case.

9159. Then the relieving officer takes him before two magistrates and he certifies him?—Yes.

9160. Do you happen to know that that is the action taken?—Except that the magistrates visiting the prison take the action.

9161. The visiting justices do?—Yes.

9162. (Mr. De Rutzen.) How many instances have you ever known of that being done?—I do not quite follow the question.

9163. You say that when a prisoner has just served his sentence, the prison authorities give notice to the relieving officer about him, and the relieving officer takes steps to have him removed to the asylum. How many instances have you known of that—many?—The same form will apply to all those 40 cases during the past 10 years.

9164. On what ground do you say that these 40 cases are dealt with in that particular way, and that they have not been cases which the relieving officer has taken up, and which have then been certified and the order of the magistrate made to remove them?—I have always taken it that the relieving officer in bringing such a case invariably tells us that the case has come from prison.

9165. "Has been in prison," or "has come from prison"?—Has come from prison. Of course I allude only to those whose sentences have expired, and who are truly chargeable to the union, and not to the Prison Commissioners.

9166. How many cases can you say have come direct from the prisons in that way. You say 40?—Yes; that is in 10 years.

9167. But in that particular year?—In that particular year, I could not answer your question.

9168. (Mr. O'Connor.) With regard to the charge for such a patient; if he was sent to you by the Prison Commissioners, would the Prison Commissioners pay the expenses of his keep?—Yes.

9169. Would they continue to pay after the expiration of the man's sentence?—No, certainly not. Then the case is relegated to the proper union authority, which is the union in the district where the crime has been committed.

9170. Then you know the date of the expiry of the sentence, and after that time you look to the guardians?—Yes, for the remuneration.

9171. I suppose it would cost more to keep a man in a lunatic asylum than it would to keep him in a prison?—I am afraid I have not sufficient data to fall back upon to give you that information.

9172. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) What is your charge?—9s. 9d. Would it be at all irregular if I placed before you one thing which might possibly be of service?

9173. (Chairman.) Not at all?—In a communication from the Rev. W. D. Morrison, I find that he has afforded me this information, which seems to me to be very important. He tells me that there were 43 suicides committed in prison in the five years between 1889 and 1893, the per-centage of old offenders amounting to 41·8 per cent. The point is important for this reason. The Scotch returns give us 33 per cent. of cases of insanity occurring amongst old offenders as indicating the amount of neurotic heredity, but this is a much higher per-centage, as 43 suicides, or a per-centage of 41·8 were old offenders. By "old offenders," it seems he means those whose return to prison averages 7½ to 8 times, and his conclusions upon this point tallied very largely with my own. His contention is that the repeated imprisonment of old offenders tends to aggravate their morbid and mental condition, and to increase the ratio of insanity. The growth of suicide can in no great measure be stopped by mechanical means, out it has been diminished. That is the more important point I wish to place before you before I leave, that the tendency to suicide as an evidence of insanity seems to have run up to a rather high per-centage in prison life.

9174. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) In England?—Yes.

9175. Not in Scotland?—In Scotland it reaches 33 per cent. That is insanity, not suicide. There is direct evidence of insanity in some form, but here is direct evidence of suicide to the extent of 41·8 per cent., and it is so important a per-centage that I thought you ought to be in possession of these figures.

9176. (Dr. Bridges.) I do not think I understand your figures when you say 41 per cent.; that means per cent. of what?—41 per cent. of the gross cases in the asylum, I understand it to be, during that period.

9177. In which asylum?—I mean the prison; the only figures I have are that 43 suicides were committed in prison during five years, so that that would be of the total population admitted to the prison in that year; the per-centage of old offenders amounted to 41·8 per cent.

9178. You are not suggesting that 43 suicides occurred in any one prison?—During the five years that is the case.

6 Dec. 1894.

9179. (Chairman.) In which prison?—It does not distinctly state.

9180. Dr. Bridges.) You mean that out of the whole prison population in England and Wales, 42 suicides have occurred in seven years?—In five years; it is between 1889 and 1893.

9181. Those are not figures you vouch for from your own knowledge?—No; but the information coming to me lately, I thought you should have it before you.

9182. (Miss Orme.) In explaining what he means by "old offenders," what does he mean by saying an average length of 7½ years?—I do not mean 7½ years, but 7½ returns to prison—relapses to crime.

9183. Then how can it be an average of that. Some of those people might only have been in once, so that saying "average" is a very indistinct term?—Yes, it is certainly obscure, so far as it goes.

9184. (Chairman.) It is five years subsequent to 1888?—Yes.

9185. On an average population of 14,031; that is what that refers to?—Yes.

9186. (Dr. Bridges.) Of course we have the whole of those figures before us?—Then I have quite unintentionally taken up your time; I was not aware they were officially recognised.

The witness withdrew.

Dr. Ancrum.

Dr. ANCRUM called and examined.

9187. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You are a county justice of Gloucestershire?—Yes.

9188. You were formerly in the medical profession?—I was.

9188. You do not practice now?—No not for 35 years.

9190. And for about that period you have been taking a great part in county government?—I have.

9191. You have been a visiting justice of Gloucester gaol?—For nearly 30 years.

9192. And at the present time I think you are chairman of the visiting committee?—I am.

9193. Would you tell us how the duties were formerly carried on by visiting justices as compared with the way in which they are carried on now?—Well the visiting justices in former times visited the prison every month. There was a meeting every month; everything was referred to them, and, to a certain extent, the governor was, you may say, under their entire jurisdiction. He of course carried on the discipline of the prison, but everything connected with the labour—at least with the occupation of the prisoners, the diet and the engagements of the warders—was always referred to and emanated from the visiting justices. In fact the governor carried on the discipline of the prison under their control.

9194. The visiting justices were there oftener than once a month?—The committee met once a month; but besides that the visiting justices visited the prisoners always every fortnight, and the chairman generally visited the prison more frequently; I think I was there every fortnight.

9195. I suppose all contracts for food were made by the visiting justices?—Everything.

9196. And the diets were entirely settled by them?—Yes, the diets were settled by the visiting justices. The diets were settled on two occasion when I was a visiting justice and, on each occasion we consulted two eminent medical men in the neighbourhood as to the diets. At one time I thought the diets were rather low, and that the prisoners were suffering from lowness of the diet. It was considered at that time that a prisoner who was condemned to three weeks or one month was very severely treated, and I think the diet was something modified.

9197. As compared with the existing diets?—Well, with respect to the existing diet, I must say I think the diet is sufficiently good. Certainly I think the diet that was settled by the visiting justices for the three months prisoners, and for the year, or two years prisoners, was perfectly good, and that they all of them gained in weight. At the present time the diet consists of, first, what is called the first-class diet, which consists of 16 ozs. of bread, and a certain quantity of what is called "stirabout." Well, I do not think that this is universally eaten throughout England, and I think that if a prisoner has a diet it ought to be such a diet as he will eat. Now I asked some warders whether the prisoners generally would eat this diet. Of course they eat their bread, but the people in Gloucestershire (what we may call the ordinary prisoner in Gloucestershire, being the agricultural labourer), generally will not eat the stirabout; and therefore, though the stirabout is given to him, he does not eat it. Now I have no doubt that in the North of England they will eat it; they are accustomed to porridge there, and they will eat porridge, but they will not eat porridge in Gloucestershire.

9200. Do they suffer from not eating it?—No, I do not think they do.

9201. Do you think prisoners have in any way sufferred from the loss of interest taken by the visiting justices in prison administration?—Well, it is very difficult for me to say. Our prison is very small, and has dwindled very much. The sentences are very short, the prisoners remain there a very short time. There is not much to be done by the visiting justices in the way of considering how they should hope to reform the prisoners that are in the gaol. Formerly this was a subject that engaged our attention very much. They were very anxious, if possible, to turn the man out with a trade or some means of occupation. I think all that desire to discuss the future prospects of the prisoner has ceased, and I think generally that the interest taken in the gaols is, comparatively speaking, greatly diminished throughout England, and not only in Gloucestershire. We had a great many persons there who were very much interested in prison discipline, and very much interested in the reformation of prisoners; and I have met in other parts of England other gentlemen who have been visiting justices, who have been equally interested with ourselves, but I do think all that has ceased now. I attended one of the prison congresses as a delegate from Gloucestershire during the time that Lord Aberdare was Secretary of the Home Department. There was a very large number of gentlemen there who took a very active interest in the prisons. I think it would be now very difficult to find a body of men who would meet in London to discuss these matters.

9202. You think the loss of interest is due to the new system?—I think so. I think we consider generally that now the system is stereotyped, it would be almost impossible for any person to get any alteration made; and if you once arrive at the conclusion that there is nothing further to be said with respect to prisons, then, of course, there is no necessity for the interference of the outsiders; but I believe that the persons outside the prisons have been those who have contributed chiefly to the reform at all times; persons who have thought on the subject, and who have devoted their minds to it, have introduced great alterations in the prisons from the beginning of this century, and I think now that that has ceased.

9203. I believe in former times, when the population of Gloucester prison was unfortunately larger than it is now, that Gloucester took a lead in prison administration?—I think the first prison on the separate system that was built in the world was built in Gloucester, and it was built in 1791. I took an extract from the Quarter Sessions book when the new separate prison was being built, and I there saw that the chairman states that the penitentiary, "the only one in the kingdom excepting Milbank, was originally similar in most respects to the model experiment at Pentonville, intended only for prisoners after conviction who were in a great measure in separate confinement, with a day and night cell assigned to each.

9204. A day and night cell assigned to each?—Yes; but, at any rate, it was thought, after the prisoners were sentenced that they should be confined in a separate cell, as is now done throughout the whole of England and Scotland. Now, I believe that that system began in Gloucestershire, in 1791. Of course the prison was not warmed, and the cells opened into the open air, but the men were confined and kept separate from one another.

9206. Subsequently another prison was built, exactly on the present model?—That was in 1844.

9207. About the same time as Pentonville?—Yes.

9208. And you think that the old system of visiting justices rather led to light being thrown on prison discipline and management, and that improvements in prison management originated in consequence of so many minds being brought to bear upon it?—Yes, I think so. As far as we are concerned in Gloucestershire, I do not think any change took place. Two members of Parliament who supported the Government at that time came down to enforce on the Quarter Sessions the principle that Lord Cross introduced. They were obliged to confess that, as far as Gloucershire was concerned, there was no change required. In fact, I know no changes that took place in the prison. There was the difference of the plank bed, and there was the difference of diet that I mentioned, but I think our diet of that time was just as good as the diet of the present day. Then there was a certain difference in the mark system, but we carried the mark system on; we happened to have a very good charity, sufficient for our wants, and we have had it for a good many years. We always gave to the prisoners as they went out a certain gratuity, according to their conduct, which they called "gratitude money." They receive now a sum of 10*s.* only, which they say they have a right to.

9209. They say they have a right to it?—Well, they think they have a right to it; they say they earn it, and get their marks; but they do not continue that system of marks. If a man continues two years in prison he gets marks up to 10*s.*, and the latter part of his imprisonment does not contribute to the sum that he receives.

9210. Can you suggest any mode by which the interest of visiting justices might be restored in the management of the prisons?—Well, if people have not power they do not care very much about it. I do not see how to induce interest if any suggestions you make do not meet with immediate action.

9211. Unless they had some control given them in prison you could not restore the interest?—Yes, I think the system which superseded the visiting justices is responsible for it. I have only the experience of one county to go by, but I think the system that superseded the system of visiting justices in Gloucestershire made no improvement; there was no difference; we had only one prison, and I do not think there is a bit more economy in the new system than in the old.

9212. Could you substitute for the control of the commissioners, or for the immediate control of the commissioners, the control of the visiting justices over the prison in any way?—Well, it is so difficult to get people to take an interest in the thing, supposing you suggest anything, and have not the power of having it carried out.

9213. But supposing you had the power?—That is a different thing. Supposing, for instance, you wished to employ prisoners in some particular craft which would give them an opportunity when they left the prison of having a trade, formerly we could institute such an occupation, and by that means we could give the prisoners an opportunity when they left prison, if they chose, to follow a proper life, of earning their livelihood in a proper way.

9214. I believe you did institute such occupations?—We tried many methods.

9215. Do you think it would restore the interest of the visiting committees if they had the power of settling the trades to be pursued in prison?—I should think so; it is difficult to say what powers you could give to men. No doubt it is very important that there should be an equal system throughout England, and that prisoners that come to one prison should not be better treated than when they go to another. Of that there is no doubt, but I think the Act of 1865 could have been so improved as far as labour went—I do not say as far as food went, because I do not think there had been a uniformity of food—and as far as occupation went, I think that the system of the old visiting justices was very good in that respect.

9216. Do you think any advantage in restoring interest would be gained by allowing the visiting justices to appoint portions of the prison staff; say, to select a chaplain, or to appoint a warder, or to act in conjunction with the governor as the representative of the commissioners?—The warders always appear to me to be very good warders. I had a complaint as to one, and I called the attention of the inspectors once to the quality of a woman that was introduced. I said they should not have appointed a woman of that kind. I said, you seem to me to have laid too much stress on the educational abilities of a person. I must say that I thought in appointing female warders generally we had an opportunity of knowing something of their antecedents, of the people we were appointing, and I think that the justices had a strong feeling that they desired to treat those persons who were confided to their care as erring beings whom they tried to reform.

9217. You think the reformatory influence is less used by the want of interest taken by visiting committees?—Yes, I think so. There is another question. I see now that in our gaol we have had the advantage of having, as far as I have known, most excellent governors, and I think the same of the person who is now in charge of the gaol. He is a very good man, but he is a warder in charge, and a warder in charge has risen probably to that position from that of an ordinary warder. He thinks of a prisoner as No. 200, and he thinks that the prisoner is to obey the rules and regulations of the prison. I think such a man has not the ideas that a benevolent man would have. I will not say he would be wanting in benevolence, but I think he is less likely to be as anxious as the governor, assisted by visiting justices, would be of reforming criminals. I think he is less anxious to desire to reform than he is to keep the prison discipline always right. I do not think the visiting justices would ever have made that change. It is an economical change I admit, but I do not think it would have been wrong to have given the 200*l.* or 300*l.* a year, which the visiting justices would have spent, in continuing in a gaol of any kind the services of a person of superior intelligence.

6 Dec. 1894.

9218. Of a superior class?—Yes.

9219. With regard to insanity; in the Gloucester Gaol do you think that is carefully watched?—Yes, but there are many men who feign insanity. There are a certain number who are insane; but very few.

9220. I believe you are the chairman of the county lunatic asylum?—I am. I see 1,200 lunatics every month of my life.

9221. Do you think there is any objection to transferring a criminal who is found to be a lunatic to an ordinary lunatic asylum?—Yes, if they were homicidal or violent lunatics. We had a violent lunatic who was sent to a county asylum some years ago, and we sent him away to Fisherton. Our present superintendent is a robust gentleman, who said he was not afraid of lunatics, and he said, "I will have him home."

9222. You do not think there is any objection merely from the fact that the man has committed a crime, and is associated more or less with honest people?—No.

9223. The mere fact of his being a criminal is no objection?—No. They do not like criminals. No doubt they are not liked, but I do not see any great objection to it.

9224. The other patients did not object to the fact that the man had come from prison?—I do not think so. We have very few.

9225. Do you think any difficulties arise from the difficulty of judging whether a man is lunatic or not, or whether he is on the border line of insanity in prison?—Well, I think that the prisoners who are suspected to be insane were always carefully treated. They are separated.

9226. And put into association?—And put into association. I do not think they are ever roughly treated. I think the instant any man shows any sign of insanity—any sign of disease of any kind or sort—that immediately the doctor takes care he is kindly treated and separated.

9227. I daresay you remember a case, which I know has been under your observation, both in the county asylum and in gaol—I mean the case of a young man (I forget his name now) who has been constantly either in the asylum, in the gaol, or in the work house. I daresay you recognise him from that description?—Yes, a man who requires restraint in order to keep him straight, like a great many people in the world.

9228. Could you suggest for that peculiar class, who are always either in the gaol, or the asylum, or the workhouse, any different mode of treatment from what is adopted now?—No.

9229. That class is a perplexity to every official?—Yes.

9230. And is essentially so?—The difficulties you have in the world are such that I do not see there is any other course to pursue than to deal with it as it arises day by day.

9231. Would a man of that sort be properly kept in a cell by himself?—I think so.

9232. He would not suffer any mental deterioration? I do not think so.

9233. (Mr. O'Connor.) Is your chief warder at Gloucester a civilian, or is he an ex-soldier?—I think he is a civilian. I think he told me that he had been for a long time at Milbank.

9234. Would you say that you consider that the present system of administering prisoners is one under which they are looked upon as men to be kept in safe custody, and to be subjected to strict discipline so as to give as little trouble as possible while they are under sentence?—Yes, I think that is so. I should say that that is my idea of it.

9235. With regard to the kindness shown to men who manifest symptoms of insanity, I suppose those symptoms have to be pretty well pronounced before they are recognised?—I do not think they are very pronounced, if a man shows signs. For instance, some of them are malingerers, but at any rate the moment they do show symptoms of insanity I think they are carefully watched.

9236. Yes, but the symptoms which are recognised as indicating insanity have to be pretty clear before they are accepted?—Certainly.

9237. And before the treatment of the man is of that kindly description which you speak of?—Certainly; he would be carefully watched. Two medical men would see him, not only the medical man of the gaol, but he would call in another medical man, and they would determine before they signed the paper to send him to a lunatic asylum.

9238. It may well be that the man was suffering from physical, nervous, or mental affliction or disease, without manifesting it by any overt act or well-marked symptom?—Well, he might not be violent, but there are so many forms of madness. There are forms of melancholy and apparent moroseness. I do not know that simple moroseness would induce people to separate them as insane people, but at any rate there would be some eccentricity of conduct before he would be treated as a person suspected of being insane.

9239. (Dr. Bridges.) I think your prison at Gloucester is a small one?—Well, it is capable of containing a good many prisoners. We used formerly to shut up under 300 prisoners, but now there are not 100.

9240. Sir John Dorington asked you with regard to one of those troublesome cases that are on the border line between insanity and crime?—Yes.

9241. Those cases at Gloucester, I suppose, are not very numerous?—No.

9242. I mean they are not so numerous as to justify any special provision being made for them in the way of an institution?—Certainly, I think not Of course, I remember the time when I used to observe a much greater number of prisoners.

9243. Carrying your mind from Gloucester, which has a comparatively small population, to very large cities like Liverpool, or even to London, where such cases are very much more numerous, what should you say then, supposing you had a very considerable number, and instead of dealing with one such case, you had to deal with 100 such cases?—Yes. I should then have them in a separate establishment. I have not given my mind to it, but if you ask me that question, I think so.

9244. (Miss Orme.) Do you ever find situations for female prisoners who leave the gaol, as domestic servants?—We send them frequently to homes. We try as far as we possibly can to restore them to an honest livelihood.

9245. And does it ever occur that you are able to get them situations as domestic servants?—Very infrequently.

9246. Was that more often the case in the old days?—No, I think not, because we have a very considersum of money at our disposal. We continue that. The last governor of the gaol was a very benevolent person, and he always used to speak to some of us with respect to any person he thought it would benefit, and we would give them sums of money, or pay sums of money to some institution, in order that, if possible, they might be reclaimed.

9247. So that with regard to the future life of the female prisoner, it is much the same now as it was?—I may say that, as regards all the prisoners, there is no difficulty in providing for them. We have a less number of prisoners, and we have the same large sums to try and rescue them from crime.

9248. (Mr. De Rutzen.) With your large experience, is there any improvement you could suggest upon the present internal working of the prisons?—I do not see that there is much. I think the justices should have greater power of modifying the food. I must say I think that it was a blot to find that a large number of prisoners would not eat the food that was provided for them, and that it was so distasteful to them. I think improvement might be made certainly in a large prison in providing them employment. I am very strong in my idea that it is possible to reclaim a certain small per-centage of prisoners, and to turn them out earning an honest livelihood, even those that have been in prison several times ; I think generally we used to find that 90 per cent. of our prisoners were Gloucestershire people, whom we knew more or less. They frequently did not return, but those who did return we always gave a longer period of imprisonment, and kept them for a good time to try and reform them. I think that system is dying out. I see that short sentences are given to persons who are repeatedly convicted. We used to discuss very much in our county the question of how long a prisoner should be kept in confinement who repeatedly was returning to prison, and we used to make up our mind at that time and keep them for a longer time.

9249. (Chairman.) Are you in favour, then, of the establishment of cumulative penalties on habitual offenders who come in repeatedly ?—If a man came in repeatedly I should give him a long sentence of imprisonment. In fact the system that we adopted was this. We proposed that when a man committed a first crime he should have a week's imprisonment, if it were not a very heinous crime. After that he would get two months, if he returned again ; and after that he would get two years ; and if he returned again, he would be sent to penal servitude. We tried to find out the period of life at which men ceased to be active criminals, and we thought it was averaging 40 years, and that after that time they were not very active criminals.

9250. Should you be in favour of treating the habitual drunkard as a class apart from other prisoners ?—I think habitual drunkards should be confined in prison or confined somewhere. Most undoubtedly they should not be allowed to annoy the public or to annoy their families.

9251. You support the opinion of the committee which sat last year ?—Certainly, and most strongly ; but when you say "habitual drunkards," it must be shown fairly, before a fair court, that they were habitual drunkards. That is most important.

9252. Are you in favour of associated prison labour ?—Yes, after a time. The principle that Maconochie introduced was better—that you should keep them separately first, and gradually allow them to come into civil life again.

9253. What Prisoners' Aid Society have you at Gloucester ?—Well, we have a private society of our own, which has been subscribed for by gentlemen in the county, and which has accumulated, and which we keep as a private trust.

9254. Who administers it—the visiting justices ?—The visiting justices administer it.

9255. Do you see every prisoner before discharge ?—Sixpence is given to everybody on discharge. It is what you call a Prisoners' Aid Society, but we do not receive it in the usual way from the Government. We do not ask anybody for a halfpenny. We have got the money as a private trust, which has accumulated to such a sum that enables us to deal well with every prisoner who comes out of prison.

9256. It is adequate for the work ?—Quite adequate, and has been always adequate, and more than adequate.

9257. (Mr. O'Connor.) Is it independent of the Charity Commissioners ?—Yes, entirely. We do not wish any Charity Commissioners to get hold of our money.

The witness withdrew.

The proceedings were adjourned for a short time.

Dr. David Nicolson called and examined.

9258. (Dr. Bridges.) You are the superintendent of Broadmoor ?—I am.

9259. And have been since when ?—Since 1886. I have been at Broadmoor for 18 years.

9260. As assistant medical officer ?—As deputy-superintendent and superintendent for 18 years.

9261. Before that time you had some experience of prisons ?—I had 10 years before that.

9262. Tell me what your experience was ?—I came to Broadmoor from Portsmouth, where I was medical officer for three years. Before that I had been at Milbank, and previously I had been at the invalid convict prison, at Woking, and for four years before that I was assistant-surgeon at Portland Prison.

9263. I think that, independently of your large experience, you have paid considerable attention to the subject of medical psychology ?—I have.

9264. I believe that you are at present president of that branch ?—I am president elect.

9265. Of the Medico-Psychological Association ?—Yes, I am president elect of the Medico-Psychological Association, which meets in London next year.

9266. At Broadmoor I believe you are not connected either with the Prison Commissioners or with the Commissioners of Lunacy directly ?—Not directly ; the Lunacy Commissioners visit us once a year, but we are entirely under the Home Office. We are directly under the Home Secretary.

9267. You communicate direct to the Home Office ?—Yes, direct to the Home Secretary through the Council of Supervision ; it is a distinct department, of which, as well as being superintendent, I am the accounting officer for the finances.

9268. At Broadmoor your inmates, consist, I think, of two classes, do they not ; those received from convict prisons and those regarded as Queen's pleasure inmates ?—Yes, that is so.

9269. Those are the two great classes ?—Yes.

9270. And from your last report I think you have about 480 males and about 160 females ?—That is so.

9271. In the great majority of cases the inmates have been charged with murder ?—More than half ; about 53 per cent. of them have committed homicide ; that is including manslaughter.

9272. Attempts to murder and manslaughter? —Of actual homicides we have 53 per cent. The proportion of cases of homicide was 53 per cent., taking both sexes ; and the curious distinction between males and females is, that so large a proportion of females as compared with males have committed homicide ; no doubt owing to pregnancy, parturition, and lactation, and the insanity resulting from them.

9273. Anyhow, 82 per cent. of the women have committed homicide ?—Yes.

9274. About half the men, or not quite half the men, have also committed homicide. The other men admitted into Broadmoor are in for various crimes ?—They are in for various offences. There are murders and attempts to murder, and violence to the person. There are four cases of that sort to one of offences against property.

9275. But you do admit a certain number of people who have committed larceny ?— Yes, and for comparatively trivial offences sometimes.

9276. Has that admission of comparatively trivial offences rather increased of late ?—There has been no noticeable advance at all.

9277. I see that you admitted 43 in the last year which you report upon ?—Yes, I should think that is about the annual average.

9278. And you had a mortality of 17 ?—Yes, an entire mortality of 17 ; our mortality is about 3 per cent.

9279. I will ask you this general question ; do you make a perfectly broad and definite distinction between crime and insanity ?—I do.

6 Dec. 1894.

9280. You do not think that the majority of cases of crime are more or less connected with insanity?—I do not.

9281. You admit, perhaps, that there are some cases forming a sort of border line between the two?—Undoubtedly.

9282. Might we take it that those cases are in your opinion a comparatively small proportion of the total amount of crime?—Of course there is the question of absolute insanity and the question of weak-mindedness and ill-balanced minds; that is a totally different matter, in my estimation, from a case either of insanity or of an individual whose act would be put down to mere criminality.

9283. I will put it in this way, then: are a very large proportion of criminals in your opinion sane?—Yes, a very large proportion I regard as being sane, and to be held responsible for their actions. The exceptions form a small minority.

9284. You would say that where a man forms a definite purpose, and has a clear knowledge of the results of his action that the mere fact of his being a man of vicious instincts does not destroy the responsibility for his actions?—I would; but I also think that an insane man has frequently a definite purpose of committing the act.

9285. And a clear knowledge of its results?—Yes, undoubtedly.

9286. And yet he may be quite insane?—But yet he may be quite insane; that is most certainly so. There are cases where individuals, whilst undoubtedly insane have shot other people in order that they might be hanged as a result of their act; individuals about whose insanity no question could arise.

9287. You are, I believe, very frequently consulted by the Home Secretary in cases, for instance, of a criminal under sentence of death with regard to whom allegations of insanity have been made, with a view of your reporting your opinion as to whether the prisoner was insane or not?—That is so, in fact I go to-night to Newcastle in a case of that sort.

9288. You would say that was a case of great difficulty, requiring the whole of your knowledge and experience?—Yes, it is. Everything that one can bring to bear upon it is required, more particularly in the way of approaching and of knowing the individual. It is where one has to approach an individual who has committed murder, and who for the time being may or may not be sane or insane, and one has to approach him in one sense as a possible lunatic, and no doubt also as a criminal, and to differentiate how many of the circumstances along with the man's condition go to justify one in certifying or in not certifying that he is insane, which becomes a difficult problem in a good many of the cases.

9289. You are aware from your previous experience in prison that a prison medical officer is constantly required to form an opinion as to whether a man is really ill, or whether he is not ill, and whether he is insane or whether he is sane?—That is so.

9290. But with regard to physical and mental illness a prison officer is constantly required to form an opinion?—That is so.

9291. Would it in your opinion be advantageous to a prison officer that he should have had some kind of training and experience in an asylum?—I should say it would be most advisable that his knowledge in that direction should be completed, and that he should have experience in dealing with actual lunatics; because the mode of approaching and questioning a lunatic is somewhat different from one's mode of approaching and questioning a criminal or an ordinary prisoner, for this reason, that those conditions of weak-mindedness which more or less prevail in a large proportion of ordinary prisoners who come up for medical observation have to be reckoned up, not merely with regard to his mental faculties and his capacity for earning a livelihood outside; but they have also to be reckoned up alongside of his capacity for bearing or being able to undergo prison discipline. There are the two standards which have to be borne in mind, and an outside medical officer who has no experience of prisons would probably be unable to say how far this or that individual was capable of undergoing the prison discipline even in a relaxed form. He might be able to say that the individual's condition would be with reference to other weak-minded creatures outside, but he requires to have a prison experience to enable him to arrange those persons individually in relation to their capacity for withstanding the evil effects of prison discipline.

9292. You have had, I suppose, at Broadmoor a considerable number of persons sent to you from Holloway?—We have.

9293. I do not know whether you are acquainted with Holloway?—I have been there officially and seen the work there, but I have never been stationed there.

9294. You are aware that a large number of persons are under observation on account of their mental condition?—Yes, on remand.

9295. From what you have said to the Committee already, I suppose you would say that you wanted great strength in the medical staff there both as to quantity and as to quality?—Most assuredly, where that work would have to be done. Any individual case might for a special report take up an hour or two. I do not say that it often would be so, because a man who is day by day under the eye of the medical officer who has a few words with him, would not require so much time. But let us take this individual, whom I am about to visit and of whom I know nothing except from a newspaper report. I shall have to be with him an hour-and-a-half or two hours at least, and unless I find that he is unable to speak or that he is demented or something of that sort, he has probably to be visited again before a responsible report can be written. I think it is very unjust that the medical officer should be pushed by any pressure of work to slur that most particular kind of work over hurriedly; and with the work that has to be done there I think it is more than imprisonment for a medical officer to have to work from morning to night in the way the medical officer at Holloway has to do. It is impossible for him to be in a wholesome state of mind to do his work. I know if I had not the opportunity of having healthy outdoor exercise, I could not carry out my work; and the opportunities at Holloway are so restricted (and no doubt it is so in other prisons as well) and the medical officer has such large responsibilities on his shoulders, that he ought to have great facilities for recreation and physical exercise outside his work.

9297. Would you be of opinion that in a prison like Portland a senior medical officer and assistant medical officer are competent to do the work?—I should think in a general way they are. In those days we did the work, and I am bound to say I was not able to complain. Although in some sense it was both responsible and heavy, still the work was not more than two could do.

9298. With regard to the previous first nine months of imprisonment in the case of a convict, you have had the opportunity of observing that probably at Milbank?—At Milbank we had a proportion of those cases.

9299. What is the effect produced physically or mentally by those nine months' confinement? Is there anything that you could define as being the result of that discipline?— Well, I must say that I have no reason to think that, taken generally, any prejudicial effect is felt by them. In some cases an improvement takes place; that is to say, in those classes who go about the streets drinking, until their health is undermined, who have been badly fed, and whose habits are very unsatisfactory altogether; when they come in to prison their conditions of living are improved in the way of regularity, and they get a satisfactory, or at all events, a reasonable amount of nutritious food. The tendency certainly ought to be for a large proportion of that class to somewhat improve during the separate confinement period. On the other hand there may be a number of individuals, especially people in a better class of life, whose moods are more sensitive to the change in their surroundings; they may for some time feel some amount of depression, not necessarily from the prison itself, but in connexion with the whole circumstances which have brought them there.

9300. And those you think may occasionally suffer? —They may feel it for some time, until they get more used to the regime of prison life.

9301. Have any instances come across you where you have thought it has done them physically or mentally harm?—With regard to their mental condition I am not able to say so; not ultimately. It is so long ago that I would not like to pin my word to it, but my recollection is that no harm resulted from it.

9302. You have had, either in prisons or else in Broadmoor, some experience of criminals of the half-witted class?—I have.

9303. Can you make any suggestion to the Committee as to the best way of dealing with that class. Would you be in favour, for instance, of treating them as a class by themselves?—Yes, distinctly, they are sufficiently numerous and sufficiently distinct to be dealt with neither as lunatics nor as ordinary prisoners. I am most distinctly of that opinion.

9304. You would like some kind of intermediate institution where they would be under detention?— Firmly under detention, and yet not definitely classed as lunatics.

9305. Employed, I suppose?—Yes, employed as much as possible out of doors. I think nowadays, when land is so cheap, that some kind of farm place could be got; because if they are dealt with in a considerate sort of way they do not require such close overhauling supervision as either the normal convict or the absolute lunatic, and the supervision need not be expensive. They could be kept there for any length of time, practically during Her Majesty's pleasure, or in that sense, until a group of circumstances arose that warranted the Home Secretary in sanctioning a conditional or an absolute discharge.

9306. Then such an institution would be a sort of mitigated Broadmoor, that is to say for cases of a much less aggravated type than those that are under your care?—Yes, that would be so.

9307. That leads me to ask you a word or two about the expense of Broadmoor. I believe the prisoners at present cost 43*l.* a year?—From 43*l.* to 44*l.*

9308. That includes every possible expense?—That includes everything, except new works and repairs of buildings.

9309. Does it include the outlay on the building —It does not. It includes the expenses of maintenance, clothing, and keeping up the establishment generally.

9310. The officers?—Yes, the officers as well as the inmates.

9311. But not the rent of the building?—No, the actual cost will be found in Table 41 of the Annual Report. At the outset it was a great experiment, because in 1863, when it was opened, and before that, criminal lunatics were kept in prisons and in asylums and gaols and different places indiscriminately, and they started off on rather a high key in the administration of a place which had to combine the security of a prison with the privileges of an asylum; and the cost, which in those days was about 60*l.* (that is in 1869 and 1870), was gradually taken down by judicious administration on the part of my predecessor, by a re-arrangement of the dietary, and to some extent by reducing the general expenditure; so that instead of being about 60*l.* it is now about 44*l.* per head. I should think that instead of being 44*l.*, which is about twice the cost of a pauper lunatic, that for the kind of place you suggest there need not be so much cost; certainly it ought not to be more than half way between the two.

9312. Then a great part of your expense at Broadmoor is due to the enormous staff you are absolutely obliged to maintain?—I will not say it is an enormous staff, but I will say it is a large staff. It is just the proportionate staff for the work we have to do.

9313. You have not a single officer too many, I dare say?—We have to prepare for the contingency of sickness and for escapes. Fortunately, we have not many escapes, but we have to prepare for contingencies of that sort, as well as for special violent cases, for which sometimes three or four attendants are wanted for a day or two.

9314. I was not suggesting for a moment that there was too large a staff at Broadmoor, but I was going to ask you whether, supposing such an institution as we are now speaking about were set up for the half-witted criminals, it might not be worked for a very much smaller cost than you are able to work Broadmoor?—Yes, it ought to be.

9315. Because you could work it with a very much smaller staff?—Most certainly. I should think two-thirds ought to be enough to manage there, because there would be an opportunity of removing a man who became troublesome either to a prison or to an asylum, or to Broadmoor itself probably. It would meet its own difficulties in that way.

9316. I suppose you have not gone enough into the statistics of the matters to be able to form any estimate of the number of such classes, taking our prison population, for instance, as 10,000?—I am not able to speak of statistics at the moment, but I think we used to regard from 2 to 3 per cent. as being a possible kind of estimate of the people who, by reason of their weakmindedness, had compelled the prison discipline to be relaxed more or less.

9317. So that an institution holding about 200 or 300 would meet the demand?—I should think so. With those discharged and those transferred upon getting worse it would be something, probably, like those numbers, but the tendency would be to increase by accumulation.

9318. (Mr. De Rutzen.) How long a time do you think it is necessary for you to have in order to come to a conclusion whether a prisoner is insane or not. Of course, in some instances you might be able to detect it at once, whilst in other instances it would take you a long time. What length of time do you say?—My notion of the habit of observation of prisoners under those circumstances is that, as a rule, they have to commit some overt act to bring them under observation. Then you have an opportunity of estimating the individual according to the nature of the grounds upon which he seeks to explain his conduct. You have to take, in the first instance, his general appearance and demeanour; then you have to find out his capacity to give reliable information about himself and his past history. Ultimately, after examining him as to the particular act or offence which has brought him under observation, you arrive at a conclusion as to his mental condition both generally and at the time he committed himself. Much depends upon the nature of the offence and the circumstances under which it was committed. The simplicity of the ordinary routine of prison life affords much less scope for noticeable deviation from a man's normal standard of conduct than do the varied domestic and everyday circumstances of life in the outer world; and in the two cases different kinds of influences have to be taken into account.

9319. I rather mean this, that taking into consideration the great strain there is on medical gentlemen who have people sent them for observation, would seven days be sufficient to arrive at a conclusion as to whether a man was insane or not?—In the great majority of cases seven days would be amply sufficient; but in some cases it would be impossible to put down any given length of time in days as sufficient to test a man so as to certify to sanity or insanity with confidence, as delusions are at times temporarily quiescent or masked, and for other reasons.

9320. I am only talking of persons who had been sent there for observation?—Sent there on remand, with a special note about them?

9321. Yes?—That is different, of course, from prisoners coming under observation after sentence; but in either case the question of shamming has to be decided. I think that in the bulk of cases, apart from this question, a decision could be arrived at in two or three days.

9322. Now, taking this ordinary form of report, which is very common, as perhaps you know, that after having had a man under observation for some days the report is, "I find that A.B. is a man of weak "intellect, but has shown no actual symptoms of "insanity"?—About the treatment of him, do you mean, or about what?

9323. What would you suggest should be done with a man who, according to the evidence of medical men, is of weak intellect, but who shows no actual signs of insanity?—I think that is a case for disposing of and treating in the way suggested, and not to be sent as a lunatic. That is a case to be treated in an intermediate kind of institution.

9324. But at that particular stage it may be hoped that he would improve?—Some improve, but in a large number of cases there is not much hope for improvement. Of very few who come in showing a natural defect can it be hoped that they will improve after they have turned 22 or 23.

9325. (Sir Algernon West.) I do not quite understand what you mean when you say so many people are sent to you at Broadmoor for trivial offences?—What I meant was something either of the nature of larceny or small offences not involving personal violence.

9326. What sentence would they get?—No, there is no sentence in the cases I am referring to.

9328. What was the sentence?—In those days they were acquitted on the ground of insanity, and sent there to be detained during Her Majesty's pleasure.

9329. They all come to you on a sentence?—Only the convicts, numbering about 100, are on sentence. The Queen's pleasure inmates, numbering about 540, are dealt with on order of court.

9331. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) All cases of lunacy occurring in convict prisons come to you, do not they?—Yes, male and female.

9332. Would there be any objection to extending that to local prisons?—Except that the cost of our place is considerable, and would scarcely warrant our taking those people in, and we have about as many as we can easily manage.

9333. The establishment would have to be a good deal larger?—Yes, it would have to be enlarged.

9334. What is your maintenance rate?—44*l.* a year, which is about 17*s.* a week, just about double what it is in the county asylums.

9335. Is that owing to the number of warders?—Our staff is large, and they are better paid than county asylum staffs.

9336. And it is a much more risky staff?—Yes, it is much more risky than the ordinary asylums staff. We have in special instances had to take local prison men.

9337. How do you take them?—If it is specially represented to the Secretary of State, he may send them to us. We have a man who very nearly killed his mother at Leeds, and who got six months' imprisonment. There is no doubt in my mind that this man was insane at the time he committed the act. He will be sent from Broadmoor to his county asylum at the expiration of his sentence.

9338. Why did not his county asylum take him?—He may have been very unmanageable just at the time, and it may have been represented that he was so violent that he ought to go to Broadmoor, and very often in the early stages violence is more prominently manifested, and they are not able to look after a man of that description, especially if it is a homicidal case, in the county asylum, for the very reason that the staff of attendants looking after them is insufficient for this kind of duty.

9339. A witness who was called to-day said that they had a case of that kind, and they sent him to Fisherton, where the supervision was stronger. They might have sent them to you, you think?—It would be possible if he is a criminal lunatic.

9340. When they are with you, although they are, properly county asylum cases, you take them at the Government cost?—Yes, so long as he is a criminal lunatic; but we have one inmate who is not a criminal lunatic, but who is a pauper lunatic, a very dangerous man. I can do nothing with him in the way of getting him to settle down, so as to be reasonably safe for a county asylum; and the Act of 1884 provides for a man of that sort, on my certificate, being detained in Broadmoor as a pauper lunatic and chargeable to the county.

9341. Then you think a county asylum on application to you, on your report to the Secretary of State, may transfer their criminal patients to you?—It may be done, but the desirability of it is another matter. We are perfectly willing to take them, however violent they are. The question is not a question of whether we can deal with them at Broadmoor; so long as we have plenty of room I do not care how violent they are.

9342. I suppose if a convict prisoner undergoing his nine months, or a local prisoner, is insane, he comes to Broadmoor?—Oh, yes, the convict does; but not the local prisoner.

9343. Have you many of those convicts?—We have from about 15 to 20 a year of convicts altogether. At the present moment I could not tell you which prisons they come from, but we have about that number of convicts that become insane. They mostly come from convict prisons.

9344. In the first stage?—That is a curious point that I can find out. Some come who undoubtedly ought not to have been sentenced; that is to say, that their insanity at the time of the trial ought to have been certified, and the individuals ought to have come as Queen's pleasure patients.

9345. Have you any reason to think that the insanity has been produced by imprisonment?—I think not.

9346. You have not known such a case?—I would not say I have not known such a case, but my belief is that cases are very rare where you can put down imprisonment as the sole cause of the insanity.

9347. Have you ever known such a case, either in the convict or local prisons?—Well, it is 18 years since I left prison work, and I would not like to say. My memory is perfectly clear as to having a knowledge of any number of cases of insanity occurring in prison, but as to whether there might not be one or two such cases I would not say. I can ascertain about the convicts who have come insane to Broadmoor.

9348. Perhaps you would let the Committee have an exact account of the different convicts you speak of?—I will give it you for the last five years, since they came back to us in 1888, and for the same period up to 1874, when the convicts were all taken away from Broadmoor; that is, from 1874 to 1888 they were kept at Woking. (See Appendix VII.)

9349. I suppose at Broadmoor, in regard to the treatment of prisoners, there is very considerably more elasticity under the rules, and a good deal of discretion is left to you?—I have every amount of discretion left in my hands, and they are dealt with on the asylum principles.

9350. Should you say, speaking from recollection, that there is sufficient discretion left to the governors of the convict prisons?—I would hardly be able to estimate how far discretion in their hands would be judicious; that is to say, in the kind of routine work laid down for governors to do, I do not know that they would always care to have large discretionary powers.

9351. You have nothing specially in your mind of your regulations of the convict prisons as to any reform that may be necessary?—Well, in connexion with an inquiry of this sort, certainly at some convict prisons it is quite possible that where a governor has his work very closely indicated and mapped out, and where the medical officer has very considerable discretionary powers, that between the governor and the medical officer in some cases, a few individual cases might fall through. If the governor is a governor of a certain temperament, and rather resented the interference of the medical officer who might wish to give his opinion, and to press it, this might happen; but where, as ought to be the case, a governor recognises the medical officer as working entirely with himself, where harmony goes on, where the governor says to the medical officer, "most certainly do this or do that," I believe that nothing of the sort should happen; but, in the other case, if the medical officer is a little disposed to stand off and say, "Well, I get no credit for interfering," I am bound to say that possibly it might happen in a few cases, that the prisoner suffers somewhat in consequence. However, I am rather giving an indication than a statement that I could bear out. That is my whole recollection of the history of 10 years in the convict prisons some time back.

9352. Who decides on the removal of the prisoners to Broadmoor? Does the governor make a report to the Home Secretary?—The governor and medical officer make a report, and the director has to give his certificate. Then that is forwarded to the Home Office, and the warrant is sent to me to receive him, and to the governor of the prison to send him to Broadmoor.

9353. You said that your warders were paid somewhat higher than they are in the convict prisons?—On the whole, a little less than the warders in the convict prisons.

9354. Do you think they are about the same class of men?—There is a larger proportion of military men amongst the warders in prisons than I would care to have as attendants in an asylum; that is to say, I prefer to train up an ordinary man—perhaps it might be a labouring man or an artizan—because there is not so much of the "toe the line" business on their part as a soldier naturally has, and which is necessary in prisons; there is more of the element and idea of nursing with us; that is to say, we have to get the inmates to rub along somehow from day to day, but we must get them to do it in a pliable kind of way.

9355. Do you appoint the warders?—The attendants; well, practically, I am responsible for it. I may say I appoint them, because they come to me, and they are appointed on my nomination after a period of probation.

9356. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) But who appoints them?—The Home Secretary really appoints them.

9357. (Chairman.) How many suicides do you have at Broadmoor?—I think there have been three in my 18 years.

9358. Only three in 18 years?—I have only known three.

9359. How many attempts?—I could hardly tell you how many attempts. We are frequently having attempts at suicide by starvation, strangulation, and cutting throat. However, they have to be so closely kept under observation that they have not very many opportunities for doing it; but the attempts, although not always serious, are not at all infrequent.

9360. Should you say there was a sufficient staff at convict prisons for the watching of any symptoms of insanity?—Well, I really am unable to say, because I have not the proportion in my mind. I do not know what arrangements are made. My own feeling is, going to prisons from time to time and seeing them, they are undermanned from the fact that they have to send for outside people, who, in my estimation, are almost worse than useless. Instead of sending for casual assistance, I think the State ought to provide a sufficient number of warders to be able to do supernumerary work and extra work, without temporarily hiring labour of that kind.

9361. Have you formed any estimate as to how many of your patients become insane through drink?—That is a question that requires some amount of subdivision, because you have drink operating directly or indirectly. You have a man reduced into such an state of poverty, and misery, and wretchedness, that his house is in a state of desolation practically through drink on his part, and that may lead him into the committal of crime. That is a question of drink in one sense, but, except indirectly in that sense, I do not see how drink itself and the actually being overcome by drink, ought at the time the crime is committed to be held to be largely responsible for it.

9362. (Dr. Bridges.) Have you not stated the causes with regard to that matter in Table 10?—They are given there. That is the account with regard to the insanity, but the committal of the crime is a somewhat different thing. You will find different asylum superintendents attach different degrees of importance and of influence to the drink question. One says it is more a defect of his mind that leads him to drink, and the other is more inclined to attribute the whole of his insanity to his drinking habits. Now, it is somewhere between the two, and my own opinion is that, with the exception of causing disturbance in the way of delirium tremens, the actual operation of intemperate habits is not of itself such a prominent factor in producing brain disorder and insanity as is sometimes alleged.

9363. (Mr. De Rutzen.) I heard you say just now that the state of a good many who came to you was such that they never ought to have been sentenced?—It is this, that they become convicts when, if they had had the evidence of their insanity produced in court, they would have been "acquitted on the ground of insanity," as the formula used to be, or "found guilty, but insane," as it now is.

9364. That is just what I was coming to, that a good many are sentenced who never ought to have been?—Yes, who ought to have been dealt with on the other footing.

9365. I will not say there was any dereliction of duty, but do you imply that they slipped through the hands of the medical gentlemen at the gaols at which they were?—Well, that is a complicated matter, because it is not for the medical officer of a prison to definitely disturb the normal progress of judicial questions. If he prejudges the man, the man may say, "I am not insane at all, and I want to defend myself; I did not do it."

9366. Have you ever been in a prison from which people were sent up for trial?—Not in the sense of the local prisons where they were remanded to.

9367. But I daresay your experience would be able to tell me this, in the calendars which are prepared for assizes and so forth, it states the state in which a man's education is, but any remark such as that which would have a bearing with reference to a man's weak state of intellect is never put in a calendar is it?—I think it would be a pity if it were, because that is just the point where one has to be extremely careful to give the man a fair opportunity of declaring his innocence of the offence. If a medical officer prejudges a prisoner by expressing his opinion before he is called upon to do so he may do harm to the man or to his case.

9368. The other alternative would be that he would be sentenced without the person who is sentencing him knowing anything about his state of mind?—The theory of the prosecution is that a man should be defended.

9369. But supposing he is not, the result of it would be that a man who was in a weak state of intellect would be sentenced without the person who sentenced him knowing anything at all about it?—Not only that, but a man who is actually insane may, through defect of the machinery, be placed in that position.

9370. You think the machinery is defective in that respect?—From time to time it is.

The proceedings were adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, 7th December at 12 o'clock.

EIGHTEENTH DAY.

Home Office, Whitehall.

Friday, 7th December 1894.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P. (CHAIRMAN).

The Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B.
Sir JOHN EDWARD DORINGTON, Bart., M.P.
ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Esq., M.P.
ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis; and
Miss ELIZA ORME.

JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

Mr. E. Taylor.
7 Dec. 1894.

Mr. EDWIN TAYLOR called and examined.

9371. (Chairman.) You are deputy-governor of York Prison?—Yes, I am deputy-governor in charge.

9372. What has been your prison service?—38 years.

9373. What offices have you held?—I started as warder in 1857 at Salop County Prison. Then I was deputy-governor at Salop County Prison during the last five years I was there. I left there in 1874, and was deputy-governor at Knutsford. I was deputy-governor there for 14 years, and left to go as deputy-governor in charge at Aylesbury. There I was two years and a half until the closing of the prison.

9374. You have had long experience then in the prison service, both before and after the transfer?—I have, for 21 years before the transfer.

9375. You have read the evidence of Mr. Walker, of Liverpool?—I have.

9376. Are you in general agreement with him?—Yes, but there are just one or two points I would like to mention.

9377. Perhaps you would specify those points to the Committee?—The first one is that the result of the transfer of the local prisons to the Government is satisfactory both with regard to economy and the discipline of prisons, but Mr. Walker says that he would be glad if the visiting justices had more power as to administration and financial dealings, and a qualified power as to the appointment of officers. I hardly think that would be advisable from my experience. I think that that would clash too much with the Commissioners.

9378. Do you mean that you would not give them any increased power, or are you referring to giving them power in the recommendation or the appointment of officers?—No, I think not. If the governors as at present, look into the character and abilities and appearance of officers as though they were going to have them for their own officers and their own warders, I think that is by far the best.

9379. Then do I understand you to mean that you would not favour the giving of further powers in the prison administration to visiting justices?—I think not. I think it would clash.

9380. You are aware probably that complaints are everywhere heard that visiting justices, since the transfer, do not take sufficient interest, and in some cases do not take any interest at all?—They do not.

9381. Have you any recommendation to make?—I have heard that they do not, but in the prisons that I have been in, in every one of them the visiting justices took a great interest in the part that they had to take in the prisons.

9382. Then you do not think anything needs to be done in that way?—I do not.

9383. What is your next point of difference?—I strongly object to the association of prisoners, unless an officer is placed over them. Mr. Walker states about 1,000, and I say that a deputy-governor should certainly be at a prison of over 700.

9384. That is all told?—Yes, both men and women. In my experience I think that there should be a deputy-governor. At Knutsford I had between 400 and 500 frequently, and I was deputy-governor there over 14 years.

9385. Have you any opinion as to whether it was advisable to limit the size of the prisons?—I think it should be anything over 700.

9386. But up to what size?—I say no prison should be over 1,000. If it is it is too unwieldy.

9387. Then will you go to the next point?—He does not approve of placing warders in charge of prisons, I think, not for anything over 50. My idea about it is this, that all officers in charge of a prison should be called "governors." That is my opinion.

9388. "Governors," or "deputy-governors"?—"Governors," I think. Number them as you like, but they should all be called "governors," and if you do make any reduction let it be not over 50.

9389. I suppose you mean that you would not object to having governors classified?—No; that is what I say. Number them as high as you like. At present they are numbered up to four or five as to pay; but certainly I should go up to five or six, and so number them. For instance, at York, I am appointed there. I was first sent there as chief warder in charge, but I objected to that because I had been deputy-governor over 21 years when I went there, and I thought it was very hard that I should be reduced to the position of chief warder. I applied to Mr. Mitford and he very kindly took the matter up, and had my past rank given to me again.

9390. Will you tell us why you think that the number of prisoners under the charge of a warder should not be more than 50?—Well, I think it is an important prison which goes up to 100. For instance, mine is a very important prison. I have the whole of the assizes for the north and east ridings of Yorkshire.

9391. How many prisoners have you?—I have now 96.

9392. Is that due to the assizes, or is that the normal number?—No, last year it was only 92, but during the last part of last year there was an extended area added to York, so that my average now will be as near 100 as possible.

9393. But if a capable chief warder is qualified to have charge of 50, is not he qualified to have charge of 70?—Yes.

9394. If he is not qualified to have charge of 70 is he qualified to have charge of 50?—Well, there is hardly that responsibility where there are only 50 that there is above 50, I think; for instance, you will very seldom see an assize town where there is not more than 50.

9395. Do you think the chief danger in the system of appointing chief warders lies in their being unable to manage the prisons, or is it that there are difficulties with regard to their relations to other prison authorities?—Yes. I should rather think the latter.

9396. Have you had any experience to show that friction has arisen?—No, I have not myself. I have never had any difficulty whatever, but I have heard of it at one prison especially, but only one.

9397. Then you do not consider that they are disqualified because of their unfitness to supervise the prison?—I do not. My idea is that the officer in charge of any prison of over 50 should be called the "governor."

9398. Then what is your next point?—He says as to visits and communication the present system operates well; but governors should have greater discretionary power. I do not see how you can give them greater discretionary power. I think they have every power in their hands.

9399. You think that there should not be more elasticity in the rules which govern the visits and letters. You would not approve, then, of a discretionary power being given to the governor to relax those rules?—Yes. I think that the governor might have more power in visits and letters after a certain length of time, after the first three months, for instance. I think that may be so; but the stage system really acts very well. Then the next point is about the Prisoners' Aid Society. I think the Prisoners' Aid Society answers the purpose of what they propose to do. It does a great deal of good, and our present system at York answers remarkably well. Out of 1,300 prisoners we had between 300 and 400 who were aided by the society.

9400. What is the society?—It is called the "York Castle Prisoners' Aid Society." It has a fund of about 50*l.* a year besides subscriptions from magistrates, and so forth.

9401. Does it get any of the Government grant?—No, the Government grant is stopped in consequence of that. They think it is sufficient for the present requirements; and it is too. We were asked by the clerk to extend our relief a little in consequence of there being sufficient funds.

9402. What arrangements has that society for meeting prisoners on discharge?—They have an agent.

9403. Then does the agent see the prisoners before they leave the prison?—Yes, he does.

9404. In the cells?—Yes, in the cells, or in my office, or in the chaplain's office.

9405. Then has he a standing permission from you or the Commissioners to see them?—Not from the Commissioners; from me.

9406. And does he see every prisoner before discharge?—No, only those who are recommended by the honorary secretary, who is the chaplain.

9407. So that it all depends on the chaplain?—Yes, the chaplain and myself. Of course, if a prisoner speaks to the chaplain for relief the chaplain generally speaks to me about it, and we consider the man's application, and if it is a good application we relieve the prisoner, and find him work, or give him clothing, or pay his railway fare.

9408. Have there been equally satisfactory arrangements in the other prisons with which you have been connected?—Equally. It was good at Aylesbury and also at Knutsford.

9409. Then you think Prisoners' Aid Societies are sufficient as they are now?—I do as far as I have seen.

9410. But in your experience have the agents of the societies always had access under the governor to the prisoners before discharge?—Well, at the last two prisons I acted as agent myself; not as paid agent, but as agent. I acted for Mr. Murray Brown at Knutsford; and at Aylesbury. I acted as agent for the secretary. I saw the prisoners with the chaplain there, and made every arrangement about them.

9411. Will you take the next point of disagreement?—Mr. Walker says that as to prison offences he would hold a judicial inquiry, and that he would allow prisoners to give evidence. I object to that very much. The judicial inquiry is quite right, but I object to allowing prisoners to give evidence.

9412. Then how could you get on without it when prisoners bring a charge against the warder, or a warder against a prisoner, and the only witnesses are prisoners?—I have found it answer very well From my experience I can tell almost in a very few moments which is right and which is wrong; but I never like prisoners to give evidence. It used to be done at Knutsford, and I did not like it. I have known officers very much disheartened by it. A prisoner would be brought up by an officer on report, and he would there make some statement about the officer and say that the officer had ill-treated him in some way. A prisoner is called who perhaps would corroborate what the other prisoner had said, which was not true.

9413. But supposing you had the evidence of three warders as against one prisoner, and other prisoners who had seen what had taken place are there ready to give evidence, do you think that your instinct would necessarily show you that the three warders were right?—No, hardly that. I never had a case of the kind where there were so many officers as that.

9414. Let us say "two" then, or even "one"?—Where there was one officer against a prisoner I have, I think, taken one word against the other and judged for myself; but I do not like another prisoner being brought in.

9415. Still, I suppose, there are some prisoners who would be as good and as truthful witnesses as any persons outside?—That is so, but my taking the generality of prisoners. For instance, a prisoner that would misconduct himself would take care to get a prisoner to give evidence for him that was of his own style—a badly conducted prisoner.

9416. Then you would know that prisoner and be able to value his evidence accordingly?—Yes, that is true.

9417. It does not follow that, under all the circumstances, you would reject the evidence of prisoners?—I can assure you I never like it. I have seen it done many times. I do not say that I would refuse it altogether, but I never liked it.

9418. Then what is the next point?—Mr. Walker says he does not approve of flogging—(I quite agree with him there)—but as he says, it is necessary as a deterrent. Then he said that adequate industrial employment should be found for prisoners. I quite agree with that, that there should be some productive labour; at least, it should be all productive labour and no unproductive labour for prisoners at all.

9419. You have not very much productive labour, have you, at York?—All our work is productive.

9420. I see that you have got the treadwheel?—Yes, and that is productive.

9421. And there are 18 upon it?—Yes.

9422. That is productive in the sense that you grind corn?—We saw timber and cut it up for the military department.

9423. In a sense that is productive?—Yes.

9424. But so far as the moral effect upon the prisoner goes, is not it much the same as an unproductive crank in a cell?—I think not. I have never had in any prison I have been in the unproductive cranks, and I do not like them at all. I think they should be abolished.

9425. But the treadwheel involves one mechanical motion which cannot occupy the mind of a prisoner, and is purely mechanical, and that surely cannot be satisfactory?—That is only for the first stage. After that they do not go on the treadwheel, but then it is productive because it cuts the timber up for firewood.

9426. After sawing it?—Yes.

9427. If it is objectionable at any time I should think it is objectionable on admission, or do you look upon it as a punishment?—I look upon the treadmill as a pure punishment, and I do not think they could well be taken off it for the first month.

9428. But is not it desirable in the treatment of prisoners to give them work which shall, as far as possible, occupy their minds?—I think so. I like mat-making very much.

9430. You agree at any rate about the desirability of labour?—I do to a certain extent, about associated labour, under sufficient supervision.

9431. You do not think the possibilities of talking are against it?—If there is not sufficient supervision, and where there is not sufficient supervision there is mischief.

9432. Are you against oakum picking?—Oakum picking is very useful because you can fall back upon that when there is nothing else.

9433. How many women have you?—17. That is about our average.

9434. Have you a laundry?—Yes, and we have about five or six in the laundry. Those are women from the stage, when we can get them after the first stage. In the first stage we keep them picking oakum in their cells, or knitting, or sewing.

9435. Should you be in favour of allowing prisoners to earn more money by their labour?—I think I should. I think it is an encouragement to prisoners, because as I said just now the stage system is a great power in the hands of the governor to keep up the discipline of the prison.

9436. Then what is your next point of disagreement with Mr. Walker, if you please?—I have no other disagreement with him.

9437. You agree specially with what Mr. Walker said about the treatment of juveniles and young offenders?—I think I quite agree with that.

9438. You do not take a hopeless view of the work of reclaiming prisoners?—I do not, because I have seen so many reclaimed.

9439. Should you be in favour of treating the drunkards as a separate class?—I should certainly.

9440. Would you be in favour of the recommendation of the Committee which sat last year upon inebriates and which recommended that powers should be taken to compulsorily detain them?—I do. It is a thing I have thought a great deal about within the last few years, especially since I have been in York. We have women, for instance, coming in time after time. They are out two days, in for 14 days; out three or four days, in for 14 days. They simply come in and they get what they say is "a bath and a sober," and they go out again and go on the same way. I think if the sentences were extended a little and different treatment given it would be very useful to them.

9441. Have you any opinion upon the question of habitual criminals, the men who come in a great number of times. Should you be in favour of or are you against cumulative punishment?—Certainly, cumulative punishment. To give them the too short punishments they get now is really of no service whatever. It does them no good at all. I have a case in my mind now of a woman who has come to me from Scarborough something like 115 times, and each time it is for one month, and she goes out for about three days, and then it is a month again, and so on. For the first week she is soddened with drink, and cannot take her food and cannot work, but she comes there and is just ready for it again when she goes out after the month. She had three months last time because she made a mistake and took a pair of books; at least they were found in her basket. She did not put them there she said, but she had three months. Now she has been away three months in consequence of her having had three months. It is longer than one month, you see.

9442. You were at Knutsford?—I was at Knutsford 14 years.

9443. Have you any opinion upon the present practice of sending convicts to local prisons for the first period of their imprisonment?—I have never seen any evil effects from it.

9444. Do you see any advantage in it?—I do not except that perhaps they would be treated better in the local prisons for what they call their separate term. I do not know exactly what the system is in a convict prison, but I think they would be better in a convict prison.

9445. You do not think that they are an undesirable element in the local prison?—Yes, I do.

9446. Then that is a considerable disadvantage in the present practice?—Yes. I do not think they help a local prison at all.

9447. Are they more difficult to manage?—Much more difficult.

9448. They give more trouble?—Yes, they want so much, and the nine months is the worst part of their time.

9449. Have you found any danger from contamination?—Hardly that, because they are kept so entirely separate. You see we have a separate treatment for them. They have to remain in their cells, and are exercised together, and they are at chapel together, so that there is no danger of contamination. I do not think it is well to have them in the local prison myself.

9450. Have you ever seen any overcrowding in any prison you have been at?—No, not one. At Knutsford we had plenty of room, and at Aylesbury we had plenty of room, and at York I have 150 separate cells, and 90 of them only sleeping cells.

9451. Have you any views upon the present system of teaching the prisoners?—Yes. When I went to Knutsford first the schoolmaster used to get eight or 10 in the schoolroom together. I never cared much about that. I would rather have the cellular teaching myself.

9452. But that involves more work?—It does, as there are so few now that require teaching as compared with what there used to be. The greater part of the prisoners could not read or write, and then it was necessary to have them in classes perhaps, but now it is not so.

9453. How many have you at York?—I have only one, and he is serving 18 months. I have no schoolmaster.

9454. Who teaches this man?—The chaplain gives him lessons when he is passing along, perhaps twice a week, and I help him myself. He is a man who is serving 18 months. He is a very low type of agricultural labourer, but having the man for so long a time I did not like him to be in his cell with nothing to read, so that I really started teaching him myself, and the chaplain took him out of my hands, and is giving him lessons twice a week.

9455. Do you think the schoolmasters should be uniformed officers?—I do. It has always been so at every prison I have been at, and I find no difficulty in the matter. I think that being a uniformed officer he has every privilege it is necessary for a schoolmaster to have. He has access to the cell at any time. I see in one gentleman's evidence it was stated that the schoolmaster could only go to the cell that he had to teach in. I have never seen that, and wherever I have been the schoolmaster could go to any cell he thought proper. For instance, if a prisoner could not properly put a letter together he would ask the schoolmaster to do it for him. He would go and see him. He might want his help on a petition, for instance.

9456. Do you think it would be desirable to pay more attention to the training of warders?—In what way do you mean?

9457. I suppose you would agree that it is most desirable that warders should treat prisoners with gentleness consistently with discipline?—Certainly.

9458. And in their duties there is a great deal of tact and discretion necessary?—Yes.

9459. Which can only come intuitively or by practice and training?—That is so.

9460. Do not you think the more you can get the necessary qualifications for a warder the better?—Yes. My idea is that you should not appoint a warder who is over 30 years of age, and then if he comes to us young before he has got to be hardened he is gradually taught by us and becomes an assistant warder, and then he gradually works into it like I did myself, for instance. I entered the service when I was 20, and I have not been one day out of the service since. I have gradually worked up, and I can do anything with a prisoner, I do not care how rough he is. When I was at Knutsford I had some very rough characters there who were drafted from Liverpool. I remember on one occasion being in my office, and they would say: "So and so is carrying on again." Perhaps there was no officer who dared go up to his cell. I would go and say: "What is the matter?" and just put my hand to the man and say: "Quiet." Many a score I have saved from a flogging simply by tact and management. When I left Knutsford a few months afterwards I happened to go back again, and one of the officers said: "We have had to flog Mac after all." I was sorry for it, because there was some good in the man after all.

9461. (Mr. O'Connor.) That was when you were away?—Yes.

9462. (Chairman.) Then should you say that some kind of training school, if it could be set up, would be desirable?—Well, I do not see how you could train an officer better than by actual management amongst prisoners.

9463. Why should you not pick one or two of the smaller prisons as training schools, and put them in charge of experienced governors?—That I should like to see. I think that is a very good thing where they should be in charge of someone who would train them up to the work.

9464. I should like to ask whether, in your experience, you have known of cases of serious ill-treatment or brutal harshness by warders?—I may say not since the prisons went over to the Government, but before that I have. I mean from 25 to 30 years ago.

9465. But since the transfer the conduct of the warders has improved?—Yes, it has.

9466. Taking them generally, do you think they are a satisfactory body of men?—I do, indeed. A great deal depends upon the chief officers in guiding them, and watching over them, and stopping anything that is detrimental to the good of a prisoner, or the raising of a prisoner from the low level he is upon.

9467. Of course there must be harsh officers here and there?—There are just one or two now and again.

9468. And they require special watching?—They do.

9469. You said that you would like to see all officers in charge of prisons called "governors"?—Yes.

9470. I suppose you do not mean that you would care to see the promotion from the ranks stopped?—Not at all.

9472. Is there any reason why the clerks and the store-keepers should not be eligible if they show special qualifications?—Yes, but they show very little qualification for discipline, I can assure you. The clerks and store-keepers show very little qualification for that, as far as I can see. You see they are amongst the prisoners so little, and you must be amongst them to know their ways and their little tricks and dodges, and that sort of thing, in order to know how to deal with them. I do not think it would be a wise thing to do that.

9473. Are you in favour of the plank-bed and the No. 1 diet?—I am, for the first month, for males especially.

9474. The No. 1 diet?—Yes, I think it is a good thing.

9476. Do you think it is a desirable form of punishment?—Yes, I do. I think it is desirable that prisoners coming in for a short sentence should not get too good food. You see there is such a power in the hands of the medical officer that if he finds, or if I see a prisoner going down hill I call the doctor's attention to it immediately; and therefore I do not see that there is any harm attaching to the first-class diet.

9477. And the plank-bed?—And the plank-bed.

9478. You approve of that?—Yes, for the first month.

9479. (Sir. J. E. Dorington.) We have heard that your female prison is not a good prison?—It is not a good prison.

9480. In what way? Is it dark?—It is dark and it is an old prison of, I say 60 or 70 years ago, modified into separate cells from big rooms.

9481. Is it sufficiently good to go on with?—Well, our numbers are so low, and they are getting lower.

7 Dec. 1894.

9482. The male prison is a good prison?—Yes. The male prison is a good prison for the present numbers.

9483. Your objection to the convicts in the local prisons is that they are rather more troublesome?—That is it.

9484. They give more trouble to the governor?—Well, you cannot deal with them so well as you can at a convict prison.

9485. Beyond the extra trouble to the governor or warders in managing the convicts there is no harm in their being in the local prison?—No.

9486. They do not get in the way of or interfere with the discipline of the other prisoners?—I think not.

9487. It is that you want a larger staff?—Yes. You want a staff to deal with them entirely.

9488. Yes. In fact you want your staff augmented?—Yes, that is it.

9489. Did you replace a governor at York?—Yes.

9490. You were the first chief warder in charge?—Yes, and then I was promoted at last to my old rank which was given me back while I was there.

9491. What is your old rank?—Deputy-governor.

9492. Was the governor you succeeded appointed by the old visiting justices?—No; he was appointed by the Commissioners.

9493. How long did he hold his appointment?—Three years, and the one before him about 12 months, and the one before him four or five years.

9494. You thought that the discipline of the warders was unsatisfactory?—Most unsatisfactory.

9495. The governors had not managed them well?—I think not.

9496. Have you changed many warders?—Two, I think; one has died and one has left.

9497. Did he leave in consequence of inefficiency?—He was removed, I find I have only one. They gave me an extra officer about nine months ago when they were augmenting the staff. I have only one left, so that I think the old ones there are satisfactory, but I am glad to say I have brought them up.

9498. You seem to think it was rather the fault of the warders than of the governors?—Yes.

9499. They were not properly trained?—Well, I do think that. I think they have been left too much in the hands of the chief warder.

9500. That the governor had not exercised his office properly?—I do.

9501. You were originally at Knutsford?—Yes.

9502. And under the old system?—Yes.

9503. Do you think the warders have improved in class there since they have had the new system?—I do. I think they are a very good class of officers. As I say, they have a good governor and chief warder to keep them.

9504. Is it the fault that the chief warder did not pay sufficient attention to it, or that the governor did not pay sufficient attention to it?—Well, I think the governor is the chief officer, but of course if he leaves his work to the chief warder you can hardly expect the work to be kept up.

9505. It depends rather more on the governor than the governing body?—Yes, he gives the tone to the whole thing.

9506. But you may get a bad governor even under the present system?—Now and again, but I think it has been led away from the old system, and that it has been improved.

9507. I ask you about York and whether he was a governor under the old or new system?—He had been there only three years.

9508. And was appointed by the Prison Commissioners?—Yes.

9509. (Mr. O'Connor.) What do you understand by a "judicial inquiry"? You said the inquiry with regard to prison offences should be "judicial"?—Mr. Walker mentioned in his evidence that he holds a judicial inquiry into prison offences.

9510. What would you gather from the use of those words? What do you understand by a judicial inquiry?—Well, I thought that he meant that he should judge between the officer and the prisoner.

9511. Where there is a statement of the warder on one side and the statement of the prisoner on the other side, you have no difficulty you say as a rule in deciding?—I have never had any. I generally give the prisoner the benefit of the doubt.

9512. Even without his evidence being corroborated?—That is so.

9513. Then you would believe a prisoner against a warder, or give him the benefit of the doubt?—I would hardly do that. I would give him the benefit of the doubt and then watch him. That has been my plan and I have found it answer very well. You understand me. If a prisoner was a mischievous prisoner and the officer brought him up and he denied all this, and I really thought that perhaps there was a little exaggeration on the part of the warder, I would say, "Well, now, I will warn you, I "will caution you;" and then I watch the prisoner myself or get the chief warder to do so, and if he were to misbehave again I would deal with him.

9514. You would not allow a prisoner to bring another prisoner who was in sight to corroborate his story?—I will hardly say I would not allow it, but I do not like it. I object to it very much. I have done so on one or two occasions, but I do not like it.

9515. You say that the convicts are men who are difficult to manage?—They are, when they are doing their nine months especially, because it is a very much harder part of their work, and they are always kept separately.

9516. And it comes hard upon the warders?—It does.

9517. When convicts are in local prisons under local prison officers do those local prison officers receive pay on the convict prison scale?—No.

9518. And they are expected to do convict warders' duty for local warders' pay?—Yes.

9519. (Chairman.) But surely they have not got the outdoor work which convict warders have in convict prisons?—No.

9520. (Mr. O'Connor.) Those are convicts?—Yes.

9521. And the officers are local prison officers?—That is so.

9522. Now in your experience I suppose you pretty well know the feeling of the service?—I do.

9524. How many prisoners have you now?—96.

9525. Of whom how many are convicts?—None. We do not keep convicts at York.

9526. Then the grievance would not arise in York?—No, but I have had it to deal with at Aylesbury. I had convicts at Aylesbury and also at Knutsford.

9527. You speak of some of the men who were warders in times past being military men. Have you any preference as between military men and civilians for warders?—I do not like military men as a rule. There are some good ones, but as a rule I think I like civilian warders.

9528. Would that be because of their more humane deportment and bearing?—That is my view entirely.

9529. Then you attach great importance to the personal bearing of the warders to the prisoners?—I do.

9530. And it is a matter of great importance from the point of view of discipline?—Yes.

9531. But you say the prison staff as a rule take their tone very much from the governor?—That is so.

9532. If then the governor was a man who was inclined to be severe and harsh towards the prisoners he might expect a reproduction of that tone amongst his subordinates?—That is so.

9533. (Miss Orme.) Do you attach much importance to the general arrangement of the chaplain's services as to the effect on prisoners?—In the chapels that I have had to deal with, both at Knutsford, Aylesbury, and York, the prisoners were very well behaved, because they were not overcrowded, but if they were overcrowded there is no chance of dealing with them in chapel at all. I always arrange to have my prisoners at least 18 inches apart, and I never have them one behind the other, so that I can see each man's face. Standing at the bottom I can myself see their faces. I would say certainly that one officer could look over 100 prisoners and I would defy them to speak or attempt to speak without my seeing them, from custom and usage.

9534. What should you expect would be the effect of a chapel where the prisoners are sitting quite close to each other — actually touching?—It is most mischievous.

9535. You think that would have an important effect?—Yes; it could not be worse. In fact, it would be far better to keep them from chapel altogether than have prisoners close together.

9536. As to the arrangements about preaching in the chapel, should you like now and then to see a new preacher introduced on a Sunday?—Well, I hardly think so. I have thought the matter well over, and I fear that they would clash. I have seen no difficulty with the present arrangements of the chaplain.

9537. Do you know cases where a good effect has been produced on the minds of the prisoners by what they have heard in chapel?—Yes, many times.

9538. You think that there is really a beneficial effect to be gained by that method of approaching them?—I do.

9539. I suppose you think that the action of the governor in relation to the Prisoners' Aid Society has a great effect in making it more or less useful?—Yes, a good deal.

9540. It depends a great deal on the governors?—I have known several governors who will have nothing to do with it, and in those cases they have no control over a prisoner with regard to the Aid Society.

9541. Do you think generally the matrons may be useful in the same way in regard to the female prisoners?—I think so generally.

9542. Should you approve of a matron acting as an unpaid agent in the way you described to us?—I should very much.

9543. Then I suppose it must be in the case of a matron who has not got too many prisoners?—That must be so.

9544. How many prisoners do you think a matron ought to have under her charge in order to be able to do useful work in that sort of way?—A matron can do with up to 100 prisoners.

9545. If she had 200 prisoners under her charge do you think she could give any time to the work of the Prisoners' Aid Society?—Yes, I think so.

9546. (Mr. De Rutzen.) You spoke highly of the services of the visiting justices at the gaols that you have been at?—I did.

9547. How often do they visit you at York?—Once a month regularly, or at least 12 times a year.

9548. How often do the inspectors come?—Once a month.

9549. You are well acquainted with the rules laid down by the Secretary of State with reference to the visiting justices, of course?—Yes.

9550. Do the inspectors do nothing besides that which the visiting justices can do under the rules?—Yes, they examine the books and sign all books and journals, which the visiting justices did not use to do.

9551. That is only for the information of the Commissioners?—Just so.

9552. But with reference to the many duties which the visiting justices have to do, and can do, even to making a report to the Secretary of State, their powers and duties are very much of the same class as those of the inspectors, are they not?—Yes, they are.

9553. Do you have in any people sent to you on remand?—We do very frequently.

9554. Would you have people sent there for observation as to the state of their mind?—Very seldom indeed. I know some two or three years ago there were one or two sent, but the doctor objected to them and they are never sent to us now.

9555. Then what becomes of them?—They go to the workhouse.

9556. Do you know the end of the affair?—I do not.

9557. Understand that I am talking of prisoners who are charged with some offence, no matter what the offence may be?—Well, we have not had any in York for years.

9558. You never have cases of that sort?—We do not.

9559. Then what makes you say they are sent to the workhouse?—Well, I have known cases where they have been found in the streets, for instance, and thought of weak mind.

9560. That is a different matter; then they would be taken up as being supposed to be wandering lunatics and they are sent to the workhouse?—Yes.

9561. I mean people who show some symptoms after the charge is made; do you never have such cases as that?—I have never seen any since I have been in York.

9562. You have the prisoners in your gaol who are going to be tried at the assizes?—Yes, for the north and east ridings of Yorkshire.

9563. Is there any report made at the prison giving a return showing the state of education of the prisoners?—No, I think not.

9564. That is not done at any prison?—I think not; I do not remember it.

9565. In the calendars there is one column headed "reading," "writing," "perfect education," and that sort of thing?—Yes.

9566. But I mean with regard to the prisoners altogether, there is no return at all made as to the state of their education?—There is none.

9567. You report evidently, but there is no report of that sort?—No.

9568. (Mr. O'Connor.) You attach some value to the services in chapel?—I do; I always attend myself.

9569. Could you tell me as a matter of administration, has a governor power to deprive a man of his right to go to chapel by way of punishment?—That is one of the punishments. For instance, if a man misbehaves himself in chapel he is kept away for one, two, or three days, and I have known him beg to go to chapel 9570. Where do you find authority for that in the rules?—There is no authority.

9571. Is it not directly against the terms of the Act of Parliament?—I think not.

9572. I mean the schedule of the Act of 1865?—I think not; but, however, I know that I have very seldom to do it. I do not think I have done it more than twice during the four years I have been at York.

9573. It is paragraph 46?—It says, I think, that the prisoner shall attend the services, but any prisoner under punishment does not go to chapel.

9574. What I want to know is whether a governor has power to prevent a prisoner from going to chapel as a punishment, and nothing else?—No, I think not. I quite understand you now, I did not see it in that light.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. E —— called and examined.

9575. (Chairman.) I think you are now carrying on the trade of a boot and shoe maker?—Yes.

9576. You have had considerable experience of convict prisons?—Yes.

Mr. E——. 7 Dec. 1894.

9577. Will you tell the Committee what sentences you have undergone?—Yes. When I was a little over 16 years old I was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment. I served my 12 months in Springfield Gaol.

9578. Where is Springfield?—In Essex. The next sentence was seven years' penal servitude.

9579. At Portland?—Yes, at Portland.

9580. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) What age were you then?—19.

9581. (Chairman.) Subsequently to that what were your convictions? What was the next sentence?—Eight years' penal servitude.

9582. At Woking?—Yes.

9583. How soon did that sentence follow your discharge from Portland?—Sixteen months.

9584. Then you would be 28 years old?—Yes.

9585. Then your next sentence was what?—Ten years' penal servitude and seven years' police supervision. I served that sentence at Portsmouth.

9586. How old were you when you were convicted then?—Thirty-five; there may have been a few months difference perhaps.

9587. You were on ticket of leave then?—Not for my 10 years. I was on ticket of leave for my first sentence of penal servitude which was only for seven years. On my next sentence I was sent to Woking, and had to serve the whole of the eight years because I had to work out my remission on the seven years. I really had no license when I came out but they gave me a license. That was eight years I served. Then I had 10 years and seven years police supervision.

9588. Did you serve the whole of the 10 years?—No, I served seven years and a half, but I had no remission on the eight years; I served the full time. On the 10 years I served 7½ years, and was discharged in June 1892.

9589. That is the record of your convictions?—Yes.

9590. So that you have altogether served 24 years in prison?—I suppose nearly that.

9591. How was it that you first got into trouble?—My parents died within about a few months of each other, and I was sent to work for a shoemaker in the district where I lived. My brothers and sisters, who were younger, were taken by relations, and I was considered to be old enough to look after myself. I was nearly 16, and I went to work for a shoemaker. My parents had always brought me up respectably, and were Christian people. This man I went to work with was a gambler; he was a betting man; and he took me to the West End with him to a gambling saloon, and two men came into the shop and he sent me away to Romford, in Essex. We went to a place at Romford to have some refreshment, and one of these men went upstairs and stole some property, and brought some wearing apparel into the place where we were having refreshments, and he said, "Take them." I would not take them at first, but the result was that we all went out together, and the waiter came and saw the parcel belonged to the master's wife, and we were taken to the police station, and I was charged with stealing wearing apparel and was sentenced to 12 months.

9592. Then when you came out how was it you got into further trouble?—I looked about for work and in the Hackney Road, and I saw a bill up for a lad to do washing up. I applied for it and the master took me on without a character. He kept a dining room, and I was engaged to wash up the kitchen. After several weeks he said, "This is too dirty for you, I will find "you a better job; I will make you a waiter," and I went up to the saloon to wait on the gentlemen. He told me someone had been in and told him that I had been in prison. I said, "That is quite right, sir, but "I had almost forgotten it." He said, "I cannot "have you here, I shall lose my business, you will "have to go," and of course I was discharged at once. I sought other work, and I was promised a job provided I had got a character. I sent him to Mr. Williams who kept the dining establishment, and when I went for the answer they said they could not have me because they had heard I had been in prison. The result was I walked about for several weeks and I fell into bad company, and went with a gentleman who had a horse and cart. We broke into several gentlemen's houses. Then everything vanished from me. I got into that state that I could not get away from him, and finally I was taken into custody and sentenced to seven years' penal servitude for housebreaking.

9593. What happened when you came out of Portland?—I got a job on a telegraph vessel named the "Seine" at Sheerness. That was in 1874. I got a job as store-keeper and I served on it from Sheerness to Portland.

9594. When you got the job was it known you had been in prison?—Yes. I was sent away to the boarding-house keeper; he got me the job. I had no certificate, but he took me to Sheerness and I boarded a ship there which was called the "Seine." I assisted to lay the cable from Madeira to Pernambuco. When we had completed it our ship came back to England. I think Siemens had the contract to lay the cable. After a week or two I got a berth on the ship "Admiral Cochrane." They engaged 50 men to take the ship to Valparaiso. I boarded that ship at Hull and assisted to take the ship out and I tried to get discharged at Valparaiso. On the way back to Plymouth I met with an accident and was taken ashore. It was in the winter time so I came back to London. After coming back to London, and stopping about two months I fell again, and was sentenced for an attempt to rob a house at Highbury. We only made the attempt, but I was sentenced to eight years' penal servitude for it.

9595. Was that the first offence you committed after your former conviction?—Yes, because I had been on board the ship all the time.

9596. When you came out from there what happened?—Then I got a job on the Inner Circle Railway. It was in course of construction then from Cannon Street to the Tower of London, and it had been in work for about two years, and they were going on with it. I applied to the foreman, Mr. Bastable, and he gave me a job as carpenter's labourer. After about three months they shortened up hands, and I was stopped, but during that time I learned to know some of the gangers, and I told one of them I would give him a trifle of money to give me a start. I gave him half a sovereign and he kept me on a bit longer until the railway was completed in May 1884. In October 1884, we were all discharged. I had saved up a few pounds while I was there and I went on for a few weeks, but winter was coming on and I could not get a job, and of course in walking about you meet people, so that I fell again, and I met a man who had been 15 years in Wormwood Scrubs. Another man was with him and he introduced me to him. He told me he had just come from Wormwood Scrubs, and that he had served 15 years, and if I liked to go with him he knew a place where he could get some money. He gave me a jemmy; it was a piece of iron, it was about 12 inches long, to carry with me. We took a train to Dartford and got out there between 4 and 5 in the afternoon. It was dark. I think it was the latter end of December, just 10 years ago. As we were going up the Dartford Road or Sutton Road, whichever it is, he ran away. Two policemen were coming up the road; they rushed forward and knocked me down, and when they took me to the station they found this piece of iron, the jemmy, on me.

9597. (Mr. O'Connor.) The other man got away?—Yes, but I should tell you he was taken afterwards. I was committed for trial to Maidstone Assizes, and charged with having instruments for housebreaking unlawfully in my possession. I admitted it; but I pleaded with the chairman to give me one more chance. He said he could not think of it, and he went on to say, "I shall give you the extreme penalty "of the law, 10 years' penal servitude, and seven years' "police supervision." I then became fairly reckless. I thought to myself, I have done wrong and I deserve punishment, but I did not deserve to be punished so severely. I felt that there was no God. I felt that there was no religion. I felt thoroughly reckless. I do not feel that now, but I felt reckless then, and that I should scruple at nothing, as I felt that religion was a mere farce; and it could not be that a man who professed Christianity could be taught that that was the way to follow out Christianity, and I felt that if that was Christianity I hoped I should never be a Christian. I have expressed myself too plainly to you, gentlemen, perhaps, but I felt so at the time.

9598. (Chairman.) Then you served seven and a half years and then came out?—Yes.

9599. Then what happened?—Then I went to the society for help, and they got me a job on the tramway at Vauxhall, but I could not do the work, I was too ill. They said, "We knew you could not do it "when we sent you; you had better go to the "hospital." I said, "Cannot you get me a light job?" but he said, "No. If we get you work we shall lose "our character, you have been so long in prison."

9600. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) What society was that?—The Royal Society. Then I thought it was no good trying. I thought I should never live, but I should die in the streets; and I thought I would dive deep into crime. I was on the road to commit a crime when two Salvationists came along and tempted me back. I was lighting a pipe, and they told me to put it out. Of course I laughed at them. I told them if they had been bothered about as I had, perhaps they would not talk to a man like that. I told them I had been in prison. They spoke to me about my soul, and I told them I did not understand them. I cannot tell you everything that transpired, but, at all events, I told them I had tried to work and could not get it, and they said, "Why?" I said, "I have no "character; I have been to prison." They said, "That "is nothing." I thought then I was in bad company, for everybody was looking at me; and then one of them told me to go to Queen Victoria Street to see Colonel Barker or Commissioner Cadman, of the Salvation Army, and they felt sure I should not be sorry for it. Of course I did not know anything about the Salvation Army, and I thought the "colonel" was a military man. I thought to myself I am afraid to go to him, because I know they are so severe, but I went there, and I saw Colonel Barker, who gave me a letter for the Bridge, at Argyle Square. They set me to work and cheered me up a great deal. I attended the meetings, and afterwards, when I could feel they were not all bad, I saw some goodness in them, and I thought then I have got a Saviour, and then all the past came before me. While I was in sin I thought I was committing no sin, but now I look back and see that I did commit terrible sins, but the punishments inflicted upon me I think were very severe.

9601. (Chairman.) You felt that there was a serious difficulty in getting work on all those occasions?—Yes.

9602. Did you feel that existing agencies and societies for discharged prisoners were not competent to provide for you?—Not for some prisoners; they cannot get the work for them. Now, for instance, if a man was well connected and received a short sentence, say, take the case of a clerk who commits himself and gets 12 months' imprisonment, the chances are that they would help him and he would get a job of work; but if a man has served a long term they can do very little for him. They may send him on to a building job, but the foreman would stop him and discharge him after a few weeks. They will tell him there are others on the list. There are some men who get benefits from the society, that is those who have been brought up well and made one false step perhaps. They can do something for them, but for an habitual criminal they can literally do nothing whatever.

9603. Did you feel that supervision by the police was very much against you?—Certainly, it ruins a man. It not only demoralises a man's feelings but it ruins his prospects. I am at the present time in a respectable neighbourhood, and perhaps if the people there knew I had been in prison I should lose my work, although if they knew all the points of the case they would sympathise with me; but if they simply said that man is under supervision I should lose my business, so that my heart trembles sometimes when I see a policeman look into the windows.

9604. But the police do not trouble you now?—No, I hear nothing from them now, but I have only been at this new place a fortnight.

9605. Did you come straight from the Salvation Army Home?—Yes, the Salvation Army has helped me to get the money to pay for the premises. It is a house and shop. I have got it as a shoemaker's shop. I have work coming in, but of course when I am out like I am to-day I am obliged to engage another man. I think in course of time I shall be able to engage one man permanently. I have taken a man from Whitechapel and I have been able to employ him once or twice when I have been away.

9606. Have you seen any man you remembered in prison during last year?—Only one, and he is dead. He was a notorious receiver of stolen property. I told him I had turned over a new leaf, and I advised him to do so. Some time after a man came to my place that knew him, and he said, "He is "dead, but he spoke about you a few days before he "died." I was not connected with a large number of those men. There were about five or six men that used to go to the "Horse Shoe" in Tottenham Court Road, and one or two that used to go to Islington, but I was never associated with the lower class of men about that neighbourhood.

9607. Do you think much harm is done to the men who come out of prison with the intention of leading respectable lives by meeting old associates who drag them back again?—Yes, but if a man is in work there is not the same opportunity of doing it. Work gradually weans him away from it; but to go back to society as I was I could not. I should think 80 per cent. of the men the Government has got down as habitual criminals would work if they could only get it. I think it is 90 per cent., but I am sure that 80 per cent. would, because I know the men I have spoken to when I was in prison. They have said, "I will "try and get a job; I will try to go to work; I will "try to keep away from here."

9608. You have spoken of the hardship of those long term sentences?—Yes.

9609. That of course you speak of from your own experience?—Yes.

9610. I suppose you felt that when you would come out of prison you wanted to get work, and that it was the difficulty in getting work that would send you back into crime, and that it was hard you should have to undergo all that long term under those circumstances?—Yes.

9611. Now I suppose in the course of your experience you have come across men of distinct criminal tendencies who have no apparent wish to get away from crime and who were what are called habitual criminals?—Yes.

9612. Who come into prison with the determination of going back to crime as soon as they come out?—Yes.

9613. How should you deal with that class. Do you think when one of that class has been in prison half a dozen times, and is found guilty of robbery and sentenced to six months imprisonment, that that sentence of imprisonment is of any use whatsoever either for that man or for anybody else?—No, that would be too short, but on the other hand it must not be too long. Now, for instance, consider the impression that a man with a long sentence makes upon a man who is doing a shorter sentence. He comes in contact with him although men are not allowed to talk in prison; still at the same time I have seen men come down with heavy sentences especially when Mr. Hardman, the chairman of the Surrey Sessions, used to inflict 20 years on a man; and I have seen a man come down with 20 years for stealing a watch, and he has seen another man who is there for five years, and when he has told the other man what he has got, the other man has said, "I will "never get 20 years, and if I go into his district I "will carry a revolver and shoot the first man that "comes near me." That is what goes on from one to another in prison. I said there were 20 out of every 100, but I should like to say that 10 out of every 100 would never alter, that is when they have been brought up young to it, and they rather brag about it.

9614. That is rather the class I have in my mind. You say it would be useless to give them a six months' sentence, but at the same time you say you must not give them too long a sentence?—No.

9615. Supposing a man has been in prison half a dozen times, and during the whole of the time he has been outside he has been living by crime and nothing else, and is then caught and comes up for a robbery on the seventh occasion, what sentence do you think would be at all calculated to deter that man subsequently from further crime?—Three years in a local prison or perhaps four, because it is the local prisons that will tame him. The monotony of a local prison is worse than a convict prison. It is the confinement. I think a man would rather go for five years, although he would have other hardships in the convict prison, but the time seems so long in the local prison that really I think three years would do him more good than 10 years in penal servitude. Three years would frighten a man. When I was doing my "separate" at Pentonville I used to hear the men say, "I shall "be glad when my nine months is up and I shall go "away." They used to say, "I don't care how hard it is away, but I do not like solitary confinement."

9616. You think that that preliminary nine months is really more of a deterrent than the penal servitude which follows?—No, because I have heard some men say they would rather do the "separate." (It is so called at Portland.) They want a change; they know they have got five years, and they say "I want to go "on the marks system; I want to get away. I want "more food," and so on, but if a man had the option of three years or five years I think he would tell you he would rather have the five years.

9617. Do you think that by any special attention to this 10 per cent. of which we are speaking when they are under detention, that they could be reclaimed from crime in any way?—Well, they could be spoken to and read to, but the question is simply this: they would, while in prison, have the full determination of doing good and becoming true men in heart; but as soon as they leave the prison they do not take those impressions to their homes. They get into a fresh element and perhaps they meet somebody, and gradually we know the company they get into destroys what good they have received in prison. It is the company they meet. If they could be taken from home into good company as it were, where they cannot see their old associates or have their old influences, they would do so, because I believe the determination is in almost every instance to do right, but when they leave the prison they are picked up and go into another element altogether.

9618. Do you think it would be possible or advisable to send long term prisoners for a period before their sentence expires to some place of detention which should be a sort of half-way house between the convict prison and liberty, which should train them for their freedom in a way in which a convict prison cannot be expected to do?—I think so; I think that would be much better for the prisoner, because as soon as the men leave the prison they have got to find lodgings where they can, and that is dangerous for them. Some of them have got friends in the country, and some want to look about them before they move, and I think it would be a grand benefit to the prisoner before he is discharged to have a place to take him to.

9619. Supposing the Government set up an establishment which really would be for the training of prisoners on discharge, do you think that many of the long term prisoners would voluntarily go to it?—They are just the sort of men that would go. They have had such a sickening of prison that they are just the men that would go. I can imagine such a thing as that being said to me after doing my 10 years. I pleaded for work, but when I went to Vauxhall from 6 in the morning to 8 at night carrying buckets of white-wash, a trap broke down one day, and the next morning I had to walk home all the way from Vauxhall, and finally I gave in, I was fairly exhausted. I was fairly weak, having been broken down in prison. I was six years in Portsmouth.

9620. Did you find on coming out after your different sentences that you were physically weak?—Yes, it undermined my constitution. I feel it greatly now. I find the effects of it now. I have a hard struggle to keep about; I am not in good health.

9621. Before discharge of course you have more food?—Before discharge from prison?

9622. Yes. Is not that so?—No, you have the same diet when you enter and the same when you are discharged, with the exception that instead of giving you gruel for breakfast if you behave well you get tea.

9623. Then up to the last day of your discharge you do not get any change in your diet?—No.

9624. Other than what you have just mentioned?—That is so.

9625. Do you think the convict rations are sufficient?—The food?

9626. Yes?—No, it is not.

9627. Is it the same for all classes in the prison, for those who are engaged outside and those who are doing separate work?—Yes, he gets the same diet as the man who is filling trucks of clay or breaking stone.

9628. Would you mean the one got the same as the other?—Yes, unless the doctor weighs the man, when he might put him on four or six extra ounces of bread. The scale is a good scale for a man who is working at tailoring or shoemaking if he get that scale, but I am sorry to say he does not get the quality; he may get the quantity but not the quality. The scale of diet at present in convict prisons is ample if you get the quality. That is to those who are working at tailoring and shoemaking, but they get their first meal at 6 in the morning, and nothing more till the afternoon, and a man who has to work squaring stone, using a pick, or wheeling barrows is really starving. I know that in my own experience. When I was at Portsmouth I have eaten things I am almost ashamed to tell you of, and others have done the same; and when men do that they must be terribly hungry.

9629. Did you find that the prisoners complained very much of the insufficiency of the food?—Almost every prisoner on the works would do that. I can imagine what they have said when they thought they were going to get 4 ounces extra bread, when all the refuse they can pick up is eaten by them; and you have only to look at the men at Portland to see that they have no flesh on them. It is a very cold place, and you can imagine what it is to be working like this and going nearly six hours without food.

9630. As a matter of fact is it not true that prisoners do gain in weight in the convict prisons?—It may be a man might be employed inside, where, perhaps, he has got the means of getting an extra loaf of bread. Sometimes he can get an extra loaf from another prisoner; they can do that. Some of them are employed as nurses in the hospital, some are organists. I suppose 100 men at Portland would give a very good account of their position simply because they have the privilege of getting a little extra, but then the men who work at squaring the stone are the men who suffer. Men working inside the prison do not suffer so much. Sometimes they can afford to give a loaf away, although if they are caught they are punished for it. If they are caught they are fined marks and otherwise punished, but the men on the works are half starved. That was my experience, and that is the experience of all the men I came in contact with on the works.

9631. When you were in the convict prison did you undergo frequent dietary punishment?—No, I was never punished except, I think, once when I was sentenced to 24 hours punishment diet for a slight infringement of the rules.

9632. But other men who committed offences were of course sentenced to dietary punishment?—Yes, some to three days bread and water, and some to 28 days bread and water.

9633. Would men who were working in the quarries be sentenced to those hard diets?—Yes, a man would go out to the quarry, say, at 7 o'clock, and if he has committed himself by speaking to his fellow prisoner on that very morning, the officer may have checked him once, and he may have been reported at dinner time, and if he has been reported before that day he will get one, two, or three days bread and water.

9635. What would you substitute for the dietary punishment?—I would still continue the bread and water, because I think when a man comes in instead of leaving it till 8 o'clock before he gets eight ounces of bread, if they gave him a little at dinner time, just to keep the man's system from going too far, it would be right. 16 ounces of bread in 24 hours is carrying a punishment too far. I say the 16 ounces is insufficient, it is carrying punishment too far considering the condition the man is in when he is beginning to undergo that punishment. Of course men that have fared well it might do good to, but if a man has scarcely any flesh on him, I think 16 ounces of bread is certainly carrying the punishment too far. If it were increased to a few more ounces I think it would be more humane than the punishment is now.

9636. What do you think the effect of this dietary punishment is upon the prisoners?—Of course it is a great deterrent to prisoners committing offences. If there were not a punishment of diet, perhaps there would be more men infringing the rules; but I would suggest it should be only inflicted for serious cases, not for trivial offences such as talking and so on.

9637. Do you think it has a tendency to brutalise the prisoner?—If what the prisoner is reported for is a slight offence and he gets severely punished for a little offence then it does; but if a man really is guilty of a serious offence he ought to be punished, and I think the man would say he deserved the punishment.

The proceedings were adjourned for a short time.

9638. Do you think that the rules governing prison discipline are too severe?—Yes, I think so.

9639. In what respect?—They are too minute. For instance, the prisoner when he rises—I am speaking of convict prisons, I know very little about local prisons—but the convict when he rises in the morning is subject to the rules, and the rules are so minute that he renders himself liable to punishment. For instance, all those cells are very small and he might knock something over, and the mere fact of an officer coming along and hearing him would involve him in trouble if the officer reported him. He would simply be reported for making an unnecessary noise. I just mention that to show you that the rules are so minute that, however much a prisoner may try to keep out of trouble, the officer if so disposed may report him and a prisoner can hardly escape infringing the rules as the regulations are so minute.

9640. Would you alter those rules?—I would not make offences out of nothing. For instance, the men when going to chapel, when I was at Portsmouth, had to walk in step. Perhaps the man in front would fall out of step and someone would be reported for being out of step. It would be just the particular prisoner the officer was looking for who would be punished for being out of step.

9641. Have you known marks lost for that?—He would lose marks for it.

9642. Have you known a case of the kind?—Yes, I have known men get punishment for it. I might mention names. At Portsmouth three years ago, when Major Farquharson was there, there was a case of that kind. The first one that the officer called would be reported. The officer would stand there and send for the governor. The men have only got a few hundred yards to march to chapel from their cells, and they must keep marking time until they get right up to the chapel, and if they do not they will get reported for that.

9643. You have mentioned the small size of the cells?—Yes.

9644. Did you find any inconvenience from that?—Inconvenience in the summer time on account of the vitiated air in the cells, and in the winter time from the cold.

9645. You are speaking of Portland?—Yes.

9646. And Portsmouth?—Yes, Portsmouth is the same.

9647. And Woking?—No, they are large cells at Woking.

9648. Did you hear prisoners complain much of those cells?—Yes, nearly all of them are ill with cold in the winter and heat in the summer.

9649. During your experience had you any reason to complain of the conduct of the warders?—Yes; some men are well meaning men, and some of course are little minded men; some of them are educated to a certain degree, but some are altogether without education. Of course it is very dangerous to fall into their hands. An officer had charge at Portsmouth of 25 men. They called them "parties" there. When he marches out with the men in the morning he sets them to work. Very possibly, after an hour or so a prisoner, after working with a shovel, will straighten his back. The principal officer there will come and point him out to the warder and tell him the man was standing idle, and of course the officer would report that prisoner, as if he did not he would get reported himself. A prisoner has always to be on the move. Sometimes an officer will see a prisoner straightening his back, but will take no notice of it, but if the chief warder comes round the officer is reported for allowing this man to stand and to be idle.

9650. Did you ever know of a case of a warder striking a prisoner?—Yes, several. I could tell you one instance, and could give the name of the prisoner, where the governor said, "Go and throw water over "the man." The prisoner's name was "D." That was at Portsmouth. He was an old man, and somehow or other he was always getting reported. Finally he said it was no use going out to work. He said, "If I "go out to work I shall only be reported," and he would not go out. He was locked up in the punishment cells for refusing to go to labour. We shoemakers were having about half an hour's exercise before we went to work. About half-past 8 a separate cell door was opened by the officer. I think his name was Guest; I think he has been made a principal warder there now; but they dragged this prisoner out of the cells because he said that he would not go to work, and they said he should. He had got the canvas dress on, and they dragged this old man out and threw him out in front of the cells, and then I heard Guest say, "Go and get something," and he brought out a bucket of water and a pint measure, and the officer took a pint of water and threw it over the prisoner, and I saw Major Farquharson in the office looking out of the window at the time. I saw that about five years ago, and we shoemakers at that time were exercising.*

9651. Have you known other cases?—A man of the name of D. L. was thrown from the top of the stairs and his legs were broken. He was in hospital for about two months. It was about 10 o'clock at night. They opened his doors and instead of bringing him down to the punishment cells they threw him down two flights of stone stairs. His name was D. L. That was at Woking. At Portsmouth there was a prisoner there, and this was a case of frequent occurrence. I was doing my separate confinement at Portsmouth and for three months I was upstairs and the punishment cells were down below. That man "S." was nearly four years under punishment in a separate cell. The records of this man perhaps can be traced back.*

9652. Four years do you say?—Yes; he was a Jew, at Portsmouth. If you could refer back, it must be seven years ago when I first went there. His cell was in a frightful state. They had to shift him from one cell to another on account of his being so bad. It was very seldom he had his clothes on, and all the rags he threw out they used to give him at night to sleep on, and they used to take them away in the morning. The whole of his sentence he was under punishment. He was a Jew.*

9653. Have you ever seen cases of ill-treatment of warders by prisoners?—Well, I had a very bad introduction at Portsmouth I think during my first sentence. It was one Good Friday. It was at Portland where a prisoner killed a warder with a pick. The prisoner's name was Dethridge. The warder's name was Trivet. It was in March 1879; we were working on the batteries. I heard someone shout and the officer said, "Go on with your work," and I saw two or three officers coming along; I was perhaps about 40 or 50 yards from him. They carried somebody in and at the time we were told that an officer had been killed. That prisoner's name was Dethridge. He had only four months to serve, but the officer had so nagged him that it irritated him. He would keep on nagging a prisoner so that he would not know what to do. He regularly bewildered him, and finally he took up a pick and struck him. I happened to be in another number. I was in No. 50, but that was No. 11 party, and all the men in No. 11 party lost their remission, though some of the men were going home in a few weeks, and they were put down for another 18 months simply because they could not get nearer the prisoner to save him from killing the warder.*

9654. Was it done premeditatedly?—It may have been—I cannot say.*

9655. Was the man subsequently sentenced to death?—Yes, he was hanged. Another one occurred after that with Blyth. A prisoner struck an officer with a shovel. He lived for weeks after, but the prisoner was ultimately tried and sentenced to be hanged, and he was hanged. I think that was a case that was sent from Winchester to Portland.*

9656. Do you think the rules as regards not speaking are too harsh?—Yes, they are; because the temptation is so great. For instance, a party of men go out to work in the morning when it is cold and so on. They get to work and the man may pass some remark to his fellow prisoner. I do not say that they should be allowed to converse, but the mere fact of speaking is enough for an officer to report you. If you turned your head with the party I was at work with it was very dangerous; and you would be reported or lose your dinner, or your day's food, or your remission only for speaking.

9657. Were there many punishments for speaking?—Three or four every day at Portsmouth; I have known as many as eight or a dozen to be reported for talking.

9658. Still there is a good deal of talking in convict prisons?—Yes. If for instance a man wished to convey a message or anything of that kind he could do it provided he was in the same district; but it is very hard where prisoners are together like that, and one speaks to another, to be reported. A man is supposed to go to prison for 20 years and he is never supposed to open his lips, and he says, "Whatever I "suffer I will do it"; and he does suffer because he is punished for doing it. Take a party of men, perhaps 500 or 600 men from different parts of the dockyard, and it is almost an impossibility to say that they shall not speak. I say they should not be allowed to converse while at work, although it would be a little humanity to let them talk on Sunday at recreation time. If they were determined to do mischief they could do it. It is not talking that does it. I think it is unnecessary punishment. It is a punishment that tends to demoralise rather than reform a man because temptation is really thrust in a man's way. He cannot resist it. He yields to that temptation and for so doing he is punished for it.

9659. With regard to medical treatment, do you consider that the medical supervision is satisfactory?—No, I do not think it is.

9660. In what way is it unsatisfactory?—Why they have not the means at their disposal to treat sick prisoners as they should be treated.—A man at Portsmouth once really dropped down before the doctor could do anything for him. I have seen men go to the doctor recently—say three years ago—and men who complained to the doctor. "Well," the doctor says, "see me at dinner time," and during that time he or the assistant surgeon has perhaps to see 50 men. They are passed through, and they make their complaint. From what I have heard the doctor says, "Do you "eat your food?" "Yes." "That will do." Or perhaps he orders a dose of medicine, and the man must really drop before he can get attended to, unless it is a case of a wound, or an accident, or something of that sort. There were two cases at Portsmouth where a man applied for the doctor at 12 o'clock in the dinner hour to see him. He said there was nothing the matter. The man went out and dropped down dead. About six weeks after there was another case and the man went out and dropped down dead, I think there were four men made away with themselves while I was there. That is not long ago. One man threw himself over the bannisters. Another man hanged himself.*

9662. (Chairman.) In cases of serious illness did you find that the medical supervision was adequate?—Well, when a man is very ill, where I have been the man gets treatment by the doctor, but he must be very ill to get treatment. Where a man could say that the man is nearly done up or very ill then I have seen the doctors give the man medical treatment, but they would not treat ordinary indisposition. A man may fall weak and ill, but that man has to get over it somehow, and some men have not got over it. At Woking I applied myself to the doctor; for nearly three weeks I could hardly move, I was so weak. Finally at 3 in the morning another prisoner heard me groaning and he sent for the night watchman, and I was carried out and put on a water bed and I got through, but I was laid up for three weeks with rheumatic fever. I had been three weeks complaining to the doctor and he would do nothing for me.

9663. Where was that?—At Woking.

9664. I suppose you would agree that there has been a good deal of attempted malingering?—Yes, but I think that arises out of the severity of the punishment the prisoners have got to endure. You do not see it among men who have privileges. You never see it where a man has got a billet or a job in the prison. He will keep away from the doctor, but the man who has really got to face this terrible punishment is the man who will do that. I have known prisoners inflict wounds on themselves. At Portland I remember a man asking me to strike his hand with a hammer and smash it; I would not do it. Another man did it for him so as to get his limb amputated and to get him into the hospital. Men put their arms under trucks, and they do that to get them cut off. Several of them did that at Chatham, so that the punishment must be very terrible for them to do that. I suppose the majority of convicts do, especially those who are employed on public works. The food is not enough for a man; and when he comes away he becomes reckless after he has been punished several times, especially if it is a punishment for a little offence.*

* For observations by the Prsions Board on Mr. E——'s evidence 9650–5 and 9660, see Appendix IX.

9665. All prisoners I suppose are not brought into contact with the civil guard?—No; they are only posted there to see that they do not run away. They do not seem to have anything to do with the discipline of the prison.

9666. When you met the Salvation Army officers were they on the lookout for discharged prisoners?—No, they seemed to be passing along. They were going along the Thames Embankment. They did not seem to be on the look out for anybody.

9667. You were carrying a revolver at the time I think?—Yes.

9669. Did you find in your experience of the Salvation Army Home that the discipline of the work had an improving effect upon those who were in the home?—Yes, I think so. There is every effort used by the Salvation Army officers to try and impress upon the men the beauty of doing good. There are meetings every night for that, and they do all they possibly can to cheer them up. But I think the Salvation Army are rather pinched in the matter of giving people a little more money than they do. For instance, a man gets a grant every Saturday. It is simply done by the Army, but it is not permanent. They cannot promise any permanent employment. It is a kind of probation for them to remain at the "Prison Gate Home" until something turns up for them, but I have known many men who have got work through the Army. Those who like to be patient and wait get it; but some get tired of it, although I think if men are patient the Salvation Army finds something for them at last, so that they do not go back to sin again.

9670. Do you attach much value to industrial work in prisons?—Yes, I do.

9671. You think it is good for the prisoners?—Yes.

9672. Do you think that there is any tendency to take to the work out of prison which they have learned in prison?—Yes, I do; but a man when he leaves the prison (no matter what work he does) is not qualified to go into a high class form of work. That is so either with a bootmaker, or a shoemaker, a clinker, or a carpenter, or anything else. He could not compete with the men outside, but he would be a very handy man, and it would be the means of his getting on, and would aid him; it would be a help to him. I have known many men myself who have learned things in prison who have made use of it when they have come out.

9673. Can you suggest any improvements which might be made in the organisation and development of labour in the convict prisons?—Well, I think there is a lot of labour done in convict prisons that is altogether useless. It is not profitable. For instance, there is oakum-picking. I should not recommend that as a profitable occupation for prisoners. Then there is stone-breaking. Stone is broken up at Portsmouth. Of course I suppose it is done to make work, but they cannot use it. That was how it was when I was there. But with regard to building, and so on, of course that is very useful work, and it breaks the monotony of a prisoner's existence in prison.

9674. Do you think that there is sufficient classification of the prisoners? Do you think that there is any danger in the present system of contamination by the worst men?—Well, I do; because they classify them in this way, first, second, and third class. A man may be a first class man according to the rules of the prison, but he may be a very low class of man in disposition. Still it does not matter, so long as the man has a blue collar he is a first class man, and will be placed with the best prisoners. It is the facings of the man's coat that classifies him, and not his moral character. If he were promoted to the first class he might be a devil in disposition, and yet he might go by the side of a man who was really good; but it is simply because he has got the blue collar. They do not discriminate according to a man's disposition. They do not seem to understand that; but they go by the class he has got into by earning his marks.

9675. Do you think that further classification would be necessary?—I do.

9676. And you would separate them more according to their moral characters?—Yes, and that could soon be found out.

9677. Are not some of the best behaved men in prison some of the worst of men?—Some of them are when they come out. You must understand that when they go to prison they understand the prison discipline better than the others do. Those men perhaps you find have had more education. The more ignorant a man is the sooner he falls in prison. The better informed he is the better he is able to avoid committing offences of a certain degree. The poor ignorant fellow perhaps is a good hearted man, and he is sent to prison, and that man will be picked out as a marked man to be punished. I have known several cases where they have been unable to meet the wishes of the officers. Some prisoners lose the whole of their remission by being punished in that way. They are fined 42 marks or 30 marks or whatever the number may be, and that means a week or a fortnight's loss of remission. If a man is reported many times, and he gets those marks taken from him, of course he very soon loses his remission. I think the system is wrong in many respects, and that they do not discriminate between the good and the bad. It is simply classification, and you are punished for doing so and so. You are brought before the governor, and of course the governor believes the officer. The man goes away reckless, and as soon as he can speak to his fellow prisoner he tells him of it, so that the impression goes right throughout the prison.

9678. Do you think it would be desirable to enable the prisoners to earn more money in prison?—Yes, I think it would.

9679. To earn money until discharged?—Yes.

9680. How much can they earn in convict prisons?—A prisoner sentenced to five years I think can earn 3*l.* or near upon it. If he is in for over five years he can not only earn the 3*l.* but he can get an extra grant of 3*l.* if he gains the special class. If a man serves 20 years in prison, he cannot get more than 6*l.*; but very few do get that. I got that with my sentence of 10 years. I served seven and a half years and I was promoted to the special class when I was within the last 12 months of my sentence; and that gave me an extra 3*l.*

9681. Was that paid in cash when you left the prison?—It is paid over to the "Prisoners' Aid Society," and they give it out to you. They gave me a sovereign the first day, and so they went on until it was exhausted.

9682. Is the distribution of it left to the discretion of the Prisoners' Aid Society. They must give you the money?—Yes, they must give you your 6*l.*

9683. But in such amounts as they think fit?—Yes.

9684. Does that answer well or could you suggest a better way of dealing with the money?—By what I see of it they are sometimes rather pleased to give the discharged prisoner his gratuity and let him go. That is so in many instances. If they cannot give a man work they would of course be glad to give him his gratuity and let him fight for himself.

9685. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You think that police supervision is rather a tyranny?—Yes, it is nothing but tyranny, it cannot be otherwise.

9686. Is not the police supervision confined to certain officers of the force. Every policeman has not got a right to come and supervise, has he?—I think not, but it is simply this. At the district station where a man reports himself all the detectives know him, and of course it is not long before it is known to nearly all the police that such and such a man is living at such and such a place, and that he is under supervision.

9687. If you were to speak to an habitual criminal in your district, and if you were seen so speaking by the detective, that would be risky?—Yes, it would, but perhaps where I am at the present time they are satisfied that I am a changed man, and there might not be much notice taken of it, although I should not like even now to be seen to speak to an old habitual criminal.

9688. They know you are under police supervision but they know you are going on creditably, and so they leave you alone?—Yes.

9689. Is not it the fact that a man knows that if he is not going on creditably he will be controlled by the police, and is not that rather a check on his doing wrong again?—No, it is rather against him to a certain degree, and it is no check on him at all because if a man is determined to do wrong all the supervision in England will not prevent it. They cannot always watch a man. If a man is under police supervision and is determined to do wrong to-night he can do it, because he can go away and do wrong, and it is rather prompting him to do it to know that he has to submit to this galling yoke. A few weeks ago I neglected to write to Scotland Yard; I was two or three days over my time, and I was afraid they would have taken me again. A thing like that is something terrible. I have to remember the 6th of every month; and perhaps in the course of business it might slip my memory. It is a great anxiety on my mind.

9690. Of course you are all right now, but supposing you had got an offer to work at, say a mason's yard, or a bricklayer's yard, do you think the police supervision would interfere with your chances there?—I believe the police are supposed to tell the master where the prisoner is working who and what he is.

9691. And if they do that judiciously, would it do any harm. They would not tell the master "you "must discharge that man, because he is on ticket "leave"; but they ought to say to the master, "you "have got a man in your employ who we believe is "going on creditably, but he is under an order by "which I am required to watch him." If the police did that it would not hinder a man?—It does. Some Christian men would rather employ a prisoner, perhaps, but others are not so inclined; and furthermore when I was sentenced to 10 years' penal servitude it would have been more just to me not to have been brought under police supervision. A convict has to earn eight marks a day by actual labour, and he is told that if he does that he will earn a remission of one fourth of his sentence. That man perseveres, and I thought I had earned the one fourth of my sentence. The result was, that as soon as I was discharged I was brought under the order to report myself to the police during that time. I think when a prisoner earns that remission he ought to be able to feel that he is a free man, but he does not, because he has to report himself to the police every month.

9692. A good deal of the trouble you got into was owing to your dropping into bad company again almost as soon as you were free?—Yes, and the necessity arising from wanting the means of life. If I could have got work I should never have done it, but if a man is out of employment wandering about the chances are that in course of time he is sure to meet some one.

9693. You think that a man who is under supervision has no help from the police?—No. A man feels that it is very tyrannous. It is a terrible thing. Take it in my case, that for seven years I have always to have it in my mind that I have to write a letter once a month. It is not that I should care now about their knowing where I live, but it is a great weight on my mind, and in addition to that I consider my punishment was too excessive.

9696. But that is done by letter?—No, that is only in special cases, as in my case. Ordinarily they have to report personally every month. Then if they are standing loitering, or say if they are looking at a shop window in the Strand, the police can lock them up for loitering and they can be sent back; the punishment is I think very severe to a man after he has earned his remission to be made a prisoner of during the remainder of the time.

9697. (Mr. O'Connor.) If you had met your Salvation Army friends on your first coming out of prison after your first 12 months' sentence you might have been saved all your subsequent experiences in prison?—Yes, I am sure I should; I felt when I was engaged at the dining room establishment at Hackney that I was building up hopes for the future. I really forgot that I had ever been in prison.

9698. On four separate occasions you were arrested and had a charge proved against you, but of course those were only four cases. Would you have any objection to telling us on how many occasions you got off successfully without detection?—I cannot tell you the exact number of cases.

9699. But was it a good many times?—I daresay I was successful eight or nine times.

9700. Was that between the first sentence of one year and the sentence of seven years?—Yes, but they were minor, petty things.

9701. Then the next time, which was between your seven years and your eight years sentence how many times did you escape?—After I had served seven years?

9702. Yes?—Well I commenced to do wrong in October, and I was taken in January, and during the three months perhaps it occurred five or six times.

9703. Then between the eight years sentence and the 10 years sentence, if I remember rightly, you were employed upon a railway?—Yes, the Inner Circle Railway.

9704. Did you get your employment on the railway very soon after you came out of prison?—Yes, a few months afterwards.

9705. What were you doing during those few months. Were you living on the public in any way?—No, I was not doing wrong then; I was going down to Victoria Docks and getting odd jobs.

9706. How long were you unemployed and without regular employment after leaving the railway before you were taken with the jemmy in your possession?—I commenced, I think, about the latter end of November; I was going to several places of work but I was unsuccessful each time, and I met a man who had some money and he used to give me money just to keep me going.

9707. You made attempts in which you were successful and you were not caught?—Yes.

9708. You told us that the men on the works at Portland were half starved, but that you drew a distinction between the men who was at sedentary work and the men who were shaping stone?—Yes.

9709. Do you say that the dietary is enough in sedentary employment?—I think it is.

9710. But it is not enough for the hard work on the rocks?—On public works, no.

9711. You told us also that men are sentenced for 28 days to bread and water; what authority is it that passes a sentence of that kind?—The directors.

9712. The governor of the prisoner cannot give 28 days bread and water?—No, only three days at a time.

9713. Now when a sentence of that kind is passed, before whom is the prisoner brought? Is it always before a director?—Yes.

9714. Does a single director come at one time or are there two at a time?—One.

9715. Do you know the circumstances of any particular sentence of 28 days bread and water?—Yes.

9716. Can you say what the effect was on the man?—That prisoner W. I saw after he had served the 28 days on bread and water. He is at Portsmouth; he is sentenced for life and he came out bent double; he could not straighten himself when he had had 28 days bread and water for threatening an officer. I saw him at Portsmouth a few years ago when I was there.

9717. He was reduced to a state of practical incapacity from want of food?—Yes.

9718. You said something about men being excited. Do you remember the connexion in which you used it, whether it was in regard to the food or in regard to the demeanour of the officer. However perhaps you do not recollect it?—No.

9719. With regard to talking, sometimes I suppose men are obliged to talk in connexion with the work on which they are jointly employed, are they not?—Yes.

9720. For such talking as that there would be no report, would there?—Yes, I have known prisoners who have been reported for it, and the warders have told the governor, and he has said, "You must refer "to the officer, you are not allowed to talk at all."

9721. But, as a matter of fact, do not men on the work talk, and is not it recognised that such talking is sometimes necessary?—Sometimes the officer will allow you to strain a point, and if the men are at work on a scaffold they may perhaps ask for a tool or something of that sort, and perhaps he would allow that for a time, but nothing further.

9722. Would a man be allowed to ask another man to pass him a tool for which he had a momentary need?—Yes, and I do not suppose they would report him for it, unless the officer was down on the prisoner, which is hard.

9723. Does it rest upon the discretion of the individual officer whether a man is reported for such talking or not?—It does; he is entirely at the mercy of the officer.

9724. You told us, I think, that some of the officers were prejudiced against the prisoners. I think you used the expression "unless the officer was prejudiced "against a prisoner." Have you in your experience noticed that individual officers were prejudiced against individual prisoners?—Yes, in many cases.

9725. And in such a case as that a report which is in the discretion of the officer about talking might be made, whereas if there were no such prejudice it would not be made?—Just so, that is exactly it.

9726. You told us also that four men made away with themselves at Portsmouth?—Yes.*

9727. Do you recollect in what year that was?—I think the last one was four years ago. It was H. He hanged himself on the Sunday, and when they opened the cell door on the Monday morning the man was dead.*

9728. In what year would that be—about 1890 or 1891?—About 1890.

9729. It might be at the end of 1890 or the beginning of 1891?—Yes.

9730. What was another case?—A man named S., by throwing himself over a landing.*

9731. But is there not a net?—No.

9732. He threw himself over the balcony?—Yes, over the upper landing of the prison.

9733. He killed himself?—Yes.

9734. Was he killed on the spot?—Yes, he died directly he was taken to the hospital, I think.

9735. Will you tell us another case?—There was a man named H L. You do not get to know the whole of it in prison. A warder will perhaps tell you that a prisoner who is named so-and-so made away with himself, but you do not get to know the facts of the case.*

9736. What was that?—That was in the separate cells.

9737. Do you know anything about the mental condition of any of those four men?—They seemed to be very childish and simple-minded, but of course others are able to keep their intellect.

9738. Do you think it would be rather rash to assume that those cases of suicide were the results of prison discipline, and that they might not have occurred if the men were at liberty?—I feel sure it arises from the fact of the severity of the punishments in convict prisons.

9739. Could you tell us shortly what is your impression, if you have one, with regard to the effect upon a man's mental or nervous condition from the imprisonment which you have undergone?—I think it is detrimental both morally and physically. His nerves are strained to the utmost to keep him out of trouble. If, for instance, he is a man who wants to earn his remission he has to watch so sharply that his intellect to a certain degree becomes weakened, and his nerves are unstrung.

9740. I do not ask you to mention anything about any man with particularity, but do you say you have noticed in several men or any number of men indications of mental or nervous deterioration in consequence of imprisonment?—Yes, many. I have seen men when they first came to Portsmouth Convict Prison when they came down from the "separates." after their first nine months, who are fresh and lively; but I have noticed in the course of a few months that they have become changed men in every respect.

9741. You told us some time ago that what the men dread most, or appear most anxious to get away from, is the nine months "separate"?—Yes, I said so.

9742. And now you say that some, at any rate, of these men come out of the separate confinement rather noticeable for their cheerfulness?—Yes.

9743. And that after that you have seen them alter?—Yes.

9744. Now in what way have they altered, and to what cause do you ascribe the alteration?—In the first instance during the time the man is serving his nine months he is set at his work, tailoring, shoemaking, mat-making, or whatever it is, and his food is more than he can take, so that the man is in full flesh. As soon as he comes to the convict prison it is a change for him: he brightens up in every sense, and he thinks he has come out of a prison; but when he is put to hard work he gradually loses his strength, and then he finds the discipline against him, and finally he begins to get weak. Then, of course, all his spirits leave him and he feels his position. But it is the confinement during the nine months that affects the man, and makes him feel he wants to get away from it; and then when he leaves the separate prison of course he has got his flesh on his bones, but he has no flesh on after he has been down to the other place for a little time. He loses all that, and then he gets punished. Of course a man can avoid punishment in separate confinement because he is not liable to temptation. He is locked up for 23 hours out of the 24, and he is not likely to render himself liable to punishment, but as soon as he is put on public works he is in association and is liable to punishment.

* For observations by the Prisons Board on Mr. E——'s evidence 9726–7, 9730, 9735, see Appendix IX.

9745. You would not be prepared to hear it stated on authority that men employed on public works gain weight rather than lose it?—I cannot see how they can gain weight on public works unless it is a man who is on a privileged job. I never knew an instance of a man gaining weight unless he had been put on extra diet.

9746. You have had considerable experience. Now supposing you had it as a duty to do what you could in connexion with the prisons, so as to keep them deterrent, to keep them punitive, but at the same time to improve them in some way or another, what would you suggest as a reasonable, practical improvement?—Well, in the first instance I should like to have a man in separate confinement however much people may oppose it.

9747. Why?—Because in the first instance he is kept out of trouble; he is separated from evil associations, and what he hears from the chaplain and scripture reader and so on he takes notice of, and he has got no one to snatch it away from him as soon as he has heard it; but where they are all mixed together there are sure to be a few bad men amongst them.

9748. Then you would be inclined to extend the period of nine months separate confinement?—No, I would do away with the nine months separate confinement, because I cannot see what good it does as when he has passed through that he goes on to the public works and he forgets it all.

9749. I am afraid I misunderstand you. You told me just now you were in favour of working in gangs?—Yes.

9750. If they do not do that, then they must work separately?—Yes, but it must be either all separate confinement or none at all. The first nine months does a man no good. He forgets that when his sentence is nearly completed; but if instead of giving a man a long term you were to give him three years in a local prison, it would have a greater effect on his mind when he came out than it has when he is coming out of a gang at Portland.

9751. How about talking? He would have no opportunity of talking according to you?—He would at exercise.

9752. You would advocate permission to talk at exercise, at any rate occasionally?—Yes.

9753. How often?—I think a man ought to have two hours exercise a day in a separate prison where he is shut up.

9754. How often should he be allowed to talk—once a week?—If he is allowed to talk at all I do not see why he should not talk every day, but he should not talk during his employment. Talking time should be during recreation time only.

9755. (Miss Orme.) Were you ever at Chatham?—No.

9756. How did you hear about those men who got themselves injured at Chatham for the purpose of being put in the hospital?—From men at Woking, where I was. They used to send those crippled men there. A man who lost his arm or his leg would be sent on to the "Invalid Convict Prison" at Woking. I was there for some little time; I was a nurse in the hospital. Some of these men were sent there maimed and some were sent there to die, and they used to tell me about Chatham Prison which was a byeword of reproach.

9757. Then you heard of these events from the persons who had actually suffered?—Yes.

9758. And in the case of people putting their legs or arms under vehicles or something of that sort, did you know actual cases of the kind?—Yes, I knew a man who was sent to Woking with his leg off; another with his arm off; and the wounds were hardly healed up when he got there.

9759. You never saw it occur actually?—No, but I saw the men who had lost their limbs, and I have heard hundreds of men speak about Chatham.

9760. How many men do you think you have seen who have actually suffered injuries of that sort?—I suppose about half a dozen who had lost limbs at Chatham. Others had lost their constitutions and were sent to Woking as invalids.

9761. But about half a dozen men had actually suffered these injuries?—Yes.

9762. (Mr. De Rutzen.) You have just told us what you were engaged in between the separate terms of penal servitude you suffered. Had you ever had any experience of crime previous to the occasion when you had 12 months first as a criminal?—No, not previous to that. I was brought up by kind parents, and they were Christian people. I used to attend a place of worship and Sunday School.

9763. You mean that was your first offence?—Yes.

9764. (Sir Algernon West.) I want to refer a little to the question of cells. I think you said in your evidence that you had heard constant complaints of the cells and food, and that you heard of a death which took place at Portland; and that you heard many facts talked about as to the treatment they had in Chatham. Then again you say the rule is "silence"; but practically you do talk a great deal surely in convict establishments?—There are times when you do; as, for instance, the officers will perhaps change duty for a fortnight, and what they call a good officer would come on duty; and that officer would turn his head at the prisoners talking. Still, they cannot talk much, but they can talk just enough to convey their feelings one to another.

9765. That is not what you would call "practical silence"; it is not the silent system?—I think it is; I was not allowed to speak, and if they are seen talking they are reported.

9766. But you have told us there is a little talking?—But then it is under the fear of being reported.

9767. Then you talk of this, that it would be better for a prisoner to be in separate confinement, that is in cellular confinement altogether or not at all. You say you disapprove of it for nine months; but will you go so far as to say this of penal servitude. I think you have had a period of 10 years penal servitude?—Yes.

9768. Would you recommend for a man who got 10 years penal servitude 10 years solitary confinement?—No, certainly not; but instead of giving a man 10 years penal servitude I would recommend that he should be given three years separate confinement. I think that would be better for the man and for society.

9769. Ten years' penal servitude or three years' separate confinement?—Or six years or perhaps four years should be the longest sentence.

9770. Should that four years be all in cellular confinement?—Yes; if that man had exercise every day I think it would have a generally good effect on the prisoner.

9771. You think that, I gather, because you say they associate together, and that the good men will get mixed up with bad men, and I think you say that the association is bad for the good men?—Yes.

9772. Then you say a prisoner in cellular confinement is to be in exercise two hours a day, and yet have two hours' talking?—Yes.

9773. There is a contradiction in that. If the object is to avoid contamination, how are you to avoid the contamination if you allow them to talk for two hours at exercise?—By classifying the men.

9774. You say you would classify men into good and bad. How would you set about that if you recommend the system to be adopted?—I would watch the movements of the prisoner carefully and see how he went on both in work and reading and attending and so on; you would soon find it out.

9775. Surely that is the case now, because marks are gained by good conduct in prison, but you take a very different view of a prisoner who behaves well in prison and the moral character of the prisoner?—A bad man often earns his marks, and many a good man loses them because the rules, as I have said, are too arbitrary and minute.

9776. But they all earn marks for good conduct, obeying the rules, attention to the chaplain, and so on; they may all gain marks by that?—Yes.

9777. Therefore I do not see how the moral character comes in there. You talked of a man wearing a blue uniform. That is because his conduct in gaol has been satisfactory; but I do not see how you would separate the good and the bad by those methods better than by the methods that are employed now?—The methods that are employed now do not give the means to discriminate. Even in the cells there is only an iron partition, and the result is that you can speak to another prisoner. It is a great temptation when you hear a man walking about his cell half an inch from you, and you feel you must speak to him. He is exposed to the temptation, but then he is reported if he is caught.

9778. You think it is bad for the prisoners to have conversation even surreptitiously through an iron partition, and yet you recommend that each prisoner who is confined in his cell should have two hours' exercise every day and be allowed to converse during that time?—I do not know about the conversing. A gentleman said just now they might be allowed to speak on Sundays, but if they were allowed to speak on Sundays I do not see why not on other days. Perhaps two hours would be too long for exercise, and there should be only one hour, or two hours broken up into several periods. For instance, there are in the prison the young men, and such men as that it would be safe to allow to talk and converse under supervision and observation, of course.

7 Dec. 1894.

The witness withdrew.

Captain Henry Kenneth Wilson called and examined.

Capt. H. K. Wilson.

9779–80. (Chairman.) You are an inspector of prisons?—I am.

9781. How long have you been in that position?—I have been 16 years inspector of prisons, and previous to that I was governor of Gloucester County Prison for five years and afterwards governor of Kent County Prison at Maidstone for four years.

9782. How many visits do you pay in a year?—I pay a visit every month to each prison.

9783. Whether large or small?—Yes.

9784. Do you go at regular times? — No, at uncertain times.

9785. And do you give notice when you are going?—No.

9786. Do you find any marked difference in the administration of different prisons?—No. I think that the Bill has been up to a certain degree a success in many ways. First of all it has been a success inasmuch as we have had uniformity of system in dietary, clothes, &c. I think the officers have been bettered also. They have had better pay than they used to have; they also have lodging allowances or cottages in lieu. There are several prisons where there are no cottages yet, but that, it is to be hoped, they will have in time. They have not yet been able to be built.

9787. Do you attach much importance to that?—Certainly, because in some large cities the rent which is given by the Commissioners does not pay for the rent the officers have to pay. The Commissioners give them 3*s.* 6*d.* a week, and in some cities and large towns they have to pay from 9*s.* to 10*s.* a week, so that it becomes a very large sum out of their weekly pay.

9788. You think generally there has been an improvement since the Act of 1877?—I think in many ways there has been an improvement.

9789. In your visits do you go systematically through every part of the prison?—If you will allow me I will mention exactly what I do. I go, first of all, accompanied by an officer to every cell occupied by a prisoner. If some of those cells are occupied by particularly young people I generally go and have a chat with them; I mean hearing what their past history was, and what their hopes for the future may be, and I do my utmost to cheer them up. I find that a kind word given now and again has a most happy effect on them, and I have known it to be so. After that I go to the cook-house, the hospital, and the treadwheel. Then with regard to the female prisoners I do the same. I listen to all complaints and applications, and if I can settle them on the spot I do so, but if there is any serious case, or one which would take me any time, I hear it all out in the office and have the witnesses before me, when I inquire into it thoroughly, and if I think it necessary I report on to the Home Office—to the Commissioners.

9790. Of course you have no power to give any order?—I have got no power to give any specific order. I have got power if I see anything wrong to tell the governor so, but I have got no power whatever otherwise.

9791. Practically if you pointed out that something was wrong, it would be equivalent to an order?—Yes, if I saw anything dirty in the cells or not up to the mark I would at once find fault, and draw the governor's attention to it.

9792. How often have you occasion to send complaints up to the Home Office?—Very, very seldom. I do not think I have done it more than once or twice. Generally when I return to the Home Office I see my Commissioner and mention to him any matter which I may think is not quite right, and he gives an order, or brings it before the notice of the chairman.

9793. Do you take a favourable view of the decrease in the number of prisoners?—Yes; and I ascribe the decrease of prisoners to many reasons.

9794. We have got the general main causes?—I ascribe it very much to one or two things, particularly to education, and also to the shorter sentences that are being given.

9795. You approve of short sentences?—I do not approve of very short sentences, but I approve of what I mean by short sentences; that is, up to a year. I do not approve of a two years' sentence.

9796. You approve of short sentences on first offenders, I take it?—Yes, in fact they ought not to be sent to gaol at all. This I consider one of the causes for the decrease. I think among other causes are the "Summary Jurisdiction Act" and the "First Offenders' Act."

9797. For the lighter offences?—Exactly.

9798–9. Are you in favour of short sentences for habitual offenders who have been in prison five or six times?—Well, I think that cumulative sentences have been a failure. That is my experience. Mr. Barwick Baker was a great advocate for cumulative sentences.

9800. But have you any idea whether with a man who chooses to live by a career of crime it has been successful?—I do not think it has; I do not believe much in the deterrence system.

9801. Do you think the present system has operated at all in the direction of decreasing crime and the number of prisoners?—I think it has; I think it has made prisoners work better, and things are carried out with greater uniformity and regularity; but, as for reformation and deterrence, I am very doubtful about it. There are certain cases where if a young woman or girl is taken in hand and sent abroad, that woman will be saved. Again, a man who is sent abroad may be saved; but I doubt whether it has any effect upon a man who has been often in prison; certainly it has upon very few. I know a case which occurred at Liverpool. I took great interest in a young fellow. He was one of those men who was under police supervision. I am not very fond of police supervision. However, this man reported himself regularly. I had before his discharge seen him in his cell, and he had promised me most faithfully that he would do all in his power to reform, and he did try. He was a very good bricklayer, and was employed by a large firm in Liverpool; but one day I found him back again. I spoke to him on the subject, and he said, "Well, sir, I did my best, but a policeman "passed one day and saw me up building"—a steeple I think it was, but it was either a steeple or a chimney—"and he went at once to the employer," and the next day that man got his congé, and did not know what to do after that. He was obliged to steal or starve; he did steal and was sent to prison again.

Capt. H. K. Wilson.

9802. Do you think that often happens judging from your experience?—I do.

9803. I understand that you are not particularly in favour of cumulative sentences?—I am not.

9804. At the same time you do not think that these short terms of imprisonment, on the real, habitual hardened offender, operates at all as a deterrent?—No.

9805. In fact then, do you think that any sentence is more or less useless, except for the purpose of keeping him away from doing harm?—You keep him away, that is all. I believe myself we shall in time get better, for ever since the days of Howard and Mrs. Fry, we have been improving in prison management, but the fact of our decrease in prisons in future will depend mainly, I think, on education.

9806. Do you hold the same idea with regard to cumulative sentences on drunkards?—Well, with drunkards it is a difficult thing to say. Curiously enough, only yesterday I saw a woman, who is a noted character at Swansea. She had spent 21 years and 10 months of her life in prison. She had had 216 convictions for drunkenness, and two for felony. She was 55 years of age, so that she had not spent a very long time of her life outside. I saw that her punishments were generally "7 days"; then "7 days"; then they went on "14 days," "14 days," and so on to a month. They never exceeded a month, and I think I saw as many as 15 or 20 sentences of one month upon her consecutively.

9807. Then are you in favour of the report of the Committee of last year on Inebriates?—I did not see the report.

9808. It recommends the compulsory detention of habitual drunkards?—Well, I once corresponded with Mr. Holt of Liverpool. We were in communication for some time on that very subject as to whether an inebriate should be put in a home instead of a prison; and we came to the conclusion that inebriates ought to be detained in homes and not in prisons, and that the homes, ought to be adjoining workhouses, or separate buildings.

9809. That question was fully considered by a Departmental Committee of the Home Office which sat on it last year?—Oh, indeed! However, that was the correspondence which passed between Mr. Holt and myself. We came to the conclusion that that was the best way of dealing with inebriates, and that if you got rid of drunkenness you would no doubt thin your prisons still more.

9810. Have you any observations to make on the marks system?—The only observation I have to make about it is this; that I think a prisoner sentenced to over six or eight months, say to a year, 18 months or two years, should get some gratuity for marks earned in the same way as a prisoner who is sentenced to eight months or under.

9811. In the way of a remission of sentence?—In the way both of gratuity and of remission of sentence. I should say a two years man should have three months off his sentence; a man sentenced to 18 months should have two months off his sentence, and a man with a 12 months sentence should have one month off.

9812. It would operate as a premium on good behaviour?—Yes.

9813. And good behaviour might be a valuable training for a prisoner?—Yes, I think it would be something for him to look forward to in the future. When I was in Paris I was very much struck with the Prison de la Santé. There they had men from seven days to 12 months, and they had very much that kind of system. They had association rooms, but they had no treadwheel or anything of the kind; but for the first month they were very strict in having the prisoners perfectly separate. The prisoners manufactured wooden dolls for instance, and they had a separate room for making the legs, arms, heads, &c. In the next room they were putting them together. Then going on from that to another room you came to where they were painted and clothed; and then finally they were sold. I asked the director what was done with all the profits made by the manufacture of dolls, baskets, and all kinds of things. He said, "The profit we make is divided between the prison "and the criminal." I passed through all the rooms where they were all assembled. I could not get from him how they were classified; but there they were. They never said a word. They knew very well if they spoke or misconducted themselves they would be sent back again to the usual separate condition. I asked him about mats. I said it was a great pity that in England we had no mat making which used to be our great staple; and I asked if the French people outside did not object to their making mats. He merely shrugged his shoulders and said, "We in prison here "do not care about what they say outside."

9814. You are in favour of the development of prison labour?—Yes, but I am very much against both the crank and the treadwheel. I have been against them for years. I have written against them. First of all as to the treadwheel what does it do? Some treadwheels you have got an enormous labour on, they grind corn; but the prisoners do not see what they are doing. Other treadwheels pump up water; and many do nothing at all. They grind wind. That is what is said of them. I think prisoners have to ascend something like 4,500 feet in 6 hours. They are constantly going up seeing nothing. As for the crank, I look upon it as still worse. A prisoner is kept in a cell at a crank for six hours, doing nothing. They go on doing this winter and summer. They have to perform 800 revolutions of the crank at a pressure of about 12 lbs.

9815. Are you at all afraid of associated labour?—Not in the least. I know a good many of my old friends who were in the service in the old times, think I am very wrong. It may require one or two officers more, and perhaps you would have to build workshops and so on; but I am not the least afraid of it. They are all associated in chapel; you could not have them more associated than they are there; and they are associated on the treadwheel; but I would not have more than 12 or so associated for work.

9816. Have you any suggestion to make as to the kind of work which should be added to what there is now in the prison?—We have got very little work at all as far as my district is concerned.

9817. You are in the north now?—No, I was formerly in the north-west I am now with Mr. Ruggles-Brise in the centre. I go from Pentonville right down to Carmarthen. In the London prisons you get a good deal of work and you get good work in large towns, but in the country prisons there is nothing else but oakum picking. In some prisons they do nothing else but re-picking oakum. I think the governor and storekeeper of each prison ought to find their own labour, and not leave it to the central authority to find.

9818. At the same time is not it necessary to have a central authority?—Yes, but to let them have the samples. To let the governor of a certain prison find the work for his own prisoners, and when he has found that work he can send samples of the work he has found to the Commissioners, and get their approval for carrying out this particular work.

9819. The Commissioners have had to be careful of late years because of outside agitation?—Yes, but would not that lessen the agitation very much. These agitations I always understood were in the towns; but in the country you do not have much agitation, I think.

9820. What is the market? Where would the produce be disposed of? in competition with the outside market?—Certainly, I think so.

9821. And would you undersell that market?—I suppose every man is a free-trader, whether he is in a prison or not.

9822. But the objection of the trades unionists I understand is that the outside worker does not start on the same level, because the prisoner is found free quarters, and the article is produced at the cost really of the Government, and is then put into the market in competition with other articles which have been produced at greater cost. That is their argument, as I understand it?—I know it is their argument; but do you think it holds water? I think that prisoners ought to work to pay for their own keep. A prison ought to be as much as possible self-supporting; and when I was a governor of a gaol I did my utmost to make it so, though I do not think I succeeded. I do not see Sir John Dorington here, or he could have mentioned that amongst the women at Gloucester we did washing, and we used to wash for the infirmaries, the lunatic asylums, and other places. There was no cry out about it and we used to make a good bit of money by it.

9823. I suppose you would agree that in organising prison labour, and disposing of the produce, you ought to avoid, as far as possible, competition with the local markets?—Well, if possible; even it would be better if we could send our produce abroad.

9824. It would be better still if you could get through your labour without competing with the outside world?—Yes, it would be better certainly; but it would be very difficult to accomplish.

At this stage of the proceedings the Chair was taken by Sir Algernon West.

9825. (Sir Algernon West.) I will just go on for a moment with the question of labour, and ask you whether you think it very desirable that there should be skilled instructors in all the prisons?—When I was at Maidstone we had a skilled boot instructor, and a skilled tailor instructor, and other instructors, and I think it worked well.

9826. The Committee has been told that very often prisoners who have gone out of gaol, and have tried to make their livelihood by the trade they followed in prison, have not been sufficiently good to come up to the outside requirements and compete with the open market afterwards. That would come, one would suppose, from deficient instruction?—That would depend very much on the length of the sentence. If a man, say, is sentenced to 18 months, and you have got a good shoemaker instructor, I think very likely he could compete with others when he goes out; but you must remember that the majority of prisoners in our local gaols are short sentence prisoners.

9827. I think the answer we got was to the extent that no prisoner coming out of prison was ever sufficiently instructed in the niceties of the trade to put him on a par with the others even if you had the best instructors?—No, I think differently with good instructors.

9828. What would be the result?—I am talking of the Kent County Prison, where I found it in existence.

9829. Did you find the prisoners on leaving the prison followed the trade they had learned in prison?—I think so; for instance, the trade instructor we had for mats was a first class man, and he taught prisoners how to make Turkey carpets, or rather Indian carpets. We made two carpets just before the Government took us over. One is at my house, and the other the late Lord Hardinge bought. They were made by the prisoners under the direction of this officer.

9830. Are you in favour of a classification of prisoners?—Certainly.

9831. Could you tell us in any way how it could be arrived at with fairness to the prisoners? You have nothing to do with convict prisons, have you?—No.

9832. Would you tell the Committee how you would proceed to classify prisoners?—It would be a difficult matter to carry out, and would require a great deal of thought. I should not like to say at once how it could be done, but I think it might be done partially. For instance, there are so few first offenders in prison if you look at the whole facts of the case. The previous conviction prisoners come up to, I should say, 70 per cent. of the total.

9833. Previously convicted?—Yes; the remaining 30 per cent. may have been previously convicted as far as we know. They may be decrepit old people who cannot do anything.

9834. But you do not think it would be a good classification to say that first offenders, or even second offenders, should be treated one way, and third or fourth offenders in another way?—Yes, I should like to see that done, as I suggested just now, with regard to association. I think association ought to be properly classified.

9835. But do not you think we may fall into this difficulty, that a first offender may be an unmitigated scamp who might corrupt the second offenders?—That is quite possible.

9836. And, therefore, should not there be, not a hard and fast rule, but some means of really dividing the people into classes other than taking the number of their convictions?—Yes.

9837. Could not the discretion be left with somebody?—Yes, I think the discretion might be left with the governor.

9838. In your experience as an inspector do you find that the visiting justices take the same interest in the administration of prisons that they did before the Act?—Oh, no.

9839. Do you find it varies?—There is a very great difference. In some prisons they do not go at all. For instance, at Swansea they hardly ever visit during the year.

9840. Could you suggest anything by which by an improved system inducements might be held out to stir up an interest in them again?—I think if they had a little more power they would take more interest. For instance, if they were allowed to grant special letters, that would be one way of doing it.

9841. Would you allow them to assist the governor in the classification of prisoners?—Yes. I will tell you another way. I think they might see candidates or recommend officers for promotion. Let them have an interest, not only in the prison, but in the officers themselves.

9842. If classification was adopted (we will put aside the difficulty of classification) would you like to see a class in which half-witted prisoners could be put by themselves?—There are so very few of them that I do not think it is necessary.

9843. As to inebriates you answered the question?—Yes.

9844. Now as to people who are in prison for contempt?—Yes, they are usually called "debtors."

9845. Do you or not see any reason why they should be treated differently from other prisoners?—No, I see no reason at all for it, and I am sure we should be very pleased if they were not.

9846. You think they should be treated as other prisoners are?—I think they ought to be made to pick oakum or to do some work.

9847. They interfere as it is with the general discipline of the prison by being differently treated?—Yes, and they are put in one part of the prison or in a separate building.

9848. I think you report to the Commissioners?—Yes, once a year I report to the Commissioner of my district every time I return.

9849. Do you do it personally?—Yes, and sometimes by letter.

Capt. H. K. Wilson.

7 Dec. 1894.

9850. Would you have the power, supposing you thought anything wrong was going on, to report direct to the Secretary of State?—No, not at all.

9851. Do you consider it part of your duty to see to the discipline all through the prison; for instance, to see that the fire exercise is attended to, and so on?—Yes, I have seen fire exercise frequently when I was in my old district, at Knutsford Prison especially. And in other prisons I used to have fire drill very often also.

9852. Do you think that chief warders should ever be left in charge?—I do not like chief warders in charge; I object to the name first of all. I think the Act will tell you that there is no such rank. It says a "governor"; and a "warder matron" is a mistaken name also.

9853. What would you call the chief female officer?—I should call her a "matron," and that is according to the Act.

9854. But they are called "matrons," are not they?—No, they are called "warder acting as matron."

9855. (Miss Orme.) In very small prisons you mean?—Yes. For instance, at Cardiff there is an average of 68 women. I think there she has got the rank of "principal warder-acting matron."

9856. (Sir Algernon West.) Then do you think there should be matrons wherever there is a female prison?—I think you may call them matrons of the 5th, 6th, 7th, or 8th class, but they ought to be called "matrons."

9857. Then when the governor is on leave or absent in any way would you be satisfied with the position the matron now occupies?—Yes, certainly.

9858. And you think that is best?—Yes. You were mentioning something about the chief warder in charge.

9859. Yes?—I am not against their promotion; I think it is due to chief warders to be promoted occasionally, but when they are promoted they should be called "governor" in the same way as a sergeant-major promoted from the ranks is not called "sergeant-major in charge," but "lieutenant."

9860. (Mr. O'Connor.) But sometimes he may have only local rank?—In what way?

9861. Take Colonel Wolseley for instance. A man in the army may have only local rank, although it may be higher in name than his real one?—Yes.

9862. (Sir Algernon West.) About the chaplains; do you think that the present system of having one chaplain who goes his daily round is good either for the chaplain or for the prisoners?—In what way?

9864. Do you think it would be advisable or at any rate desirable to have different preachers in on Sundays so as to vary it both for the chaplain's sake and for the prisoners' sake?—No, I do not think that would answer. I think a good many chaplains—I do not say all—would object to it. I have met some excellent chaplains who have taken a very great interest in the prisoners, particularly on Sundays, and I think they would feel it as almost a slur against them if anyone was invited to preach unless they were previously asked about it. My own idea about the matter is that I am not in favour of daily chapels; I think if we had morning services two or three times a week, it would be quite sufficient.

9865. You think it would have a better effect?—Yes, and also it would stop a great many punishments.

9866. Why is that?—Because there is constant talking in chapel, and numbers of the entries in the punishment book are for talking in chapel. They see their friends that have come in, and they know when prisoners are going out and thus receive and send out messages.

9867. Will you tell us what your experience is of prisoners' aid societies?—Well, I think they do a certain amount of good, but it is only temporary.

9868. Do you think it possible that all the prisoners' aid societies could be organised in some way?—Yes, but where are you going to send the criminals? They cannot give much to a man. They may give him a suit of clothes, and when the man goes away and not procuring work gets desperate, he steals something and comes back again.

9869. Do you think there might be some intermediary establishment between a prison and absolute freedom. We were told the other day of a man coming out of prison and being absolutely dazed; do you think it possible to have some intermediary place where a prisoner might go with a relaxation of rules?—I have never thought of it, but it strikes me as one that requires consideration, and I think it would be favourable consideration. I think myself it is a very good idea.

9870. Perhaps you will think over that?—Yes, I will.

9871. You told us the story of a man who was employed in labour of some kind—that a policeman passing him told his employer he had been in prison. Is it the duty of any policeman to report a prisoner as having been in gaol?—No, but very often a policeman thinks a great deal of himself, and expects a great deal of kudos if he finds out a criminal. It is not supposed to be done.

9872. I thought when you had a convict out on ticket of leave that he was only amenable to special policemen; that is policemen high up in the service, or in plain clothes; but do you mean to say that any policeman seeing a man employed would feel it his duty to say anything about him?—This is merely an isolated case. I was only alluding to police supervision, which I consider is a very bad system. My brother-in-law, the late Sir James Fraser, who was the head of the City Police, said he thought it was the most absurd measure that ever was passed, that only those that chose to report themselves did so, and that they were the men who wanted to live honestly; but those who would not report themselves disappeared.

9873. (Mr. O'Connor.) You report as it is to the Home Office. You make your reports to the Commissioners?—To the Commissioners, not to the Home Office.

9874. Under the Act of 1865, section 22, an inspector of prisons is directed to report by letter, "addressed to the visiting justices, calling their "attention to any irregularity he may have observed "therein, or any complaint he may have to make "against the building, the officers, or the discipline "of the prison; and the visiting justices shall enter "a copy of such letter in their minute book." Is there anything in the Act of 1877 that you know of, or is there any other authority contained in the Act of Parliament which interferes with that?—Yes, there is this. You must first of all understand that in 1865 the visiting justices represented the magistrates, and reported to the quarter sessions. They used really to inspect and visit the prisons. The only inspectors were the two appointed by Government, one to take the north of England, the other to take the south. They reported independently to the Secretary of State. By the Prisons Act of 1877 the Prison Commissioners took the place of the visiting justices, and the two inspectors passed away. I believe in the original Bill, 1877, the inspectors were called "assistant commissioners," but in Parliament it was changed from "assistant commissioners" to "inspectors"; and we are merely the assistants, and are appointed by the Secretary of State.

9875. The distinction you draw is as between the inspectors under the Act of 1865 and the inspectors under the Act of 1877, and you say that the provision in the Act of 1865 does not apply to the inspectors under the Act of 1877?—No, certainly not.

9876. Do you think it would be a good thing, and would it enhance the interest of the visiting justices or the visiting committee in the prison, if the report was made to them now, as it used to be made under the Act of 1865?—By whom?

9877. By the inspector?—It would not do so long as we are under the Commissioners to write direct to the Secretary of State.

9878. Then your answer is "no"?—No, not to the Secretary of State at all. We are under the Commissioners, and in a matter like this I should say the right thing would be to abolish the present inspectors, inasmuch as we have no power whatever, and to increase the number of Commissioners.

9879. You think the inspectors should be as independent of the Commissioners as they are of the visiting justices?—Yes. Any new inspector you may appoint.

9880. But then we ought to have a proper system of inspection which should be independent of the Commissioners?—I think so.

9881. Do you think we can have that ideal system of inspection by officers who are practically appointed by the chairman and commissioners?—I would rather not say.

9882. I think that you gave evidence before Lord Kimberley's Commission upon penal servitude?—I think it was Lord de Ramsey's.

9883. That was on the grievances of prison officers. But did not you give evidence also before Lord Kimberley's Commission in 1878?—I am talking of Lord de Ramsey's.

9884. I am thinking of Lord Kimberley's?—No, I did not.

9885. Did you ever give any evidence on the question of insanity in local prisons?—No, I have never given any evidence, but I have my own ideas upon it.

9886. What do you say about the effect of a long separate confinement upon prisoners in respect of their mental condition?—I think it is better not to have it, but during the time I was governor, I have never known a case of any man going insane from being kept in separate confinement. You must remember, first of all, that they are not in separate confinement because they are constantly out; they are either on the treadwheel or something or other.

9887. Do you think it has any tendency to develop any germs of mental or brain disease?—That may be so, but that is more a question for the doctor.

9888. You gave evidence upon the Commission with regard to prison officers' grievances?—I did.

9889. Did you on that occasion say the warders take their tone very much from the governors?—I know that they do.

9890. Then if the governor is severe they are likely to be severe?—I consider that if the governor is severe his officers are severe also.

9891. Do you think the new men specially amongst the warders are inclined to be overbearing towards the prisoners?—No, if they are they are at once checked. It would not be allowed.

9892. You have not had occasion to dismiss a warder on the complaint of a prisoner?—No, never; but I have found fault with officers if they have used any harsh language to a prisoner. Certainly I would disapprove, and I would bring him before the notice of the governor.

9893. You think, therefore, that reports by warders against prisoners ought to be very carefully and impartially considered by the governor?—Yes; when reports were made to me, I heard every witness who was brought before me.

9894. As an inspector, what would you say of the condition of a prison in which you found that the warders in the exercise yard had to carry truncheons?—I think it is a most ridiculous idea.

9895. What would you surmise to be the condition of such a prison. I am speaking to you now as an inspector?—If I ever saw it I would withdraw the truncheons at once. It is the very way to make prisoners attack you.

9896. Looking at things from the point of view of an inspector, what would be your opinion of the condition of a prison if you found that several prisoners had attacked warders in the exercise yard?—Well, I should say at once that the prison was very badly managed.

9897. Are you aware that the officers in local prisons are paid at rates lower than those in convict prisons?—I only knew that lately. I do not know anything at all about the convict prisons.

9898. But you have learned that lately?—I have only learned that lately.

9899. Is that because the convict duty is supposed to be more arduous than that in the local prisons?—I cannot say.

9900. Do you say it requires a better class of men for the convict prisons?—I think we ought to have a better class of men in our local prisons.

9901. You would not at any rate be inclined to speak in favour of the employment of local prison warders to the duty of convict prison warders in local prisons?—If they were a better class of men than we have at present I do not see why they should not.

9903. But you have some convicts in local prisons?—Yes, merely for the first nine months you mean?

9904. Yes?—But I am talking of the management of convict prisoners themselves. I have so little knowledge of how they are treated, or what they require.

9905. But as a class convicts are the better, I suppose?—I have seen convict officers drafted to local prisons, but I consider that in the local prisons they are quite as good as the others.

9906. Did you ever hear any suggestion of discontent on the part of local prison officers at having to do duty with convicts?—No, I never heard that, but I have heard this (and I mentioned it to Lord de Ramsey's Committee), that the assistant warders are so long before they get any promotion. I then suggested that it would be a right thing to do would be to do away with the rank of assistant warder altogether. We never required them in the days when I was governor, and I said, "Do away with the rank of "assistant warder altogether, let them begin with "60*l.* a year, rising so many pounds until they reach "the maximum of a warder."

9907. At present there is a sense of injustice amongst the assistant warders?—Yes, and some of them are 16 years before getting promotion. If you do that they can all go gradually up to that and there will be no complaint, but I know it is felt as a grievance, now.

9908. I suppose at any rate you would not be in favour of placing inexperienced prison officers in charge of convicts?—No. That depends also entirely on whom the governor chooses, some warders are not particularly brilliant.

9909. I suppose primâ facie such a thing as that would not be likely to improve the relations between the warder and the prisoners?—No, I have always found the convict prisoners well behaved. Many are a better class of men in fact.

9910. A better prisoner?—Not only a better prisoner but a better class of man.

9911. Now under the old system, which you are acquainted with, the convicts were removed as quickly as possible from the local prisons, were they not?—As soon as possible. As soon as we got the warrant from London.

9912. Was not it in those days considered proper that convicts should have a special staff?—No, it was the same staff exactly.

9913. Then what was the object of removing the convicts so quickly as you did in the old days?—Because it was a separate administration altogether.

9914. And they had as a matter of fact a special staff?—No. Not in local prisons.

9915. Now men are removed from the convict side on to the local side, are they not?—Now I think they spend nine months in local prisons.

9916. I meant to say the warders?—That I do not know.

Capt. H. K. Wilson.

7 Dec. 1894.

9917. Have you eve heard any expression of discontent on the part of the staff?—No; I do not inspect Wormwood Scrubs, but I inspected Pentonville, and we have no convict prisoners there.

9918. How does promotion go there? Does it go through the service, or is it by prisons?—The way promotion goes is this. An assistant warder gets his promotion in the prison in which he is; and a warder in the district to which he belongs; a principal warder gets his by seniority throughout the services.

9919. Do you know anything about the condition of Wakefield Prison in the old time?—In Captain Armytage's time, yes.

9920. When the convicts were in a county prison, such as Wakefield, was there not a separate convict staff for them?—I believe there was.

9921. It was considered then in some cases the proper thing to have a special staff for them?—Yes.

9922. It was not considered right that the local staff should be employed with the convicts?—No.

9923. Then would you say that the present system of employing the local prison staff in connexion with convicts is an improvement or a retrograde step as compared with the system that was countenanced before?—That assumes that you think——

9924. Never mind what I think; I want to know what you think?—You assume that the officer who looks after the convict prisoner shall be superior to the one looking after the local prisoner.

9925. No, I do not say he is superior or inferior; I think he is something special?—Then I say I do not see the slightest necessity for there being two classes, if you have a proper officer, a man who is superior in every way, who is properly educated. The education of the assistant warder who now passes into our prisons is most defective. The Civil Service Commissioners send down questions to them which a boy of 10 in our board schools would laugh at.

9926. You have been on inquiries, I believe, with regard to the conduct of officials at different times, have you not?—Yes.

9927. If you had to inquire into a disturbance at a prison, would you condemn a man without hearing him in his defence?—No, certainly not, I would never condemn a man until I had found him guilty.

9928. Or calling him as a witness?—Certainly, he must tell his story himself. I had a case the other day in which a man brought a charge against an officer and I had two officers brought up one after the other and also the deputy-governor. The prisoner tried to make out that he had not had a proper hot bath. I heard his story and I found he was telling me a tissue of lies; and by the bathing officer's evidence, I found there was 90 odd degrees of water in his bath. So of course I dismissed a case like that.

9929. We have had evidence before us to the effect that outbreaks might occur in prison very suddenly. Would you be inclined to entertain that view?—I have not known of an outbreak during my experience.

9930. By an "outbreak" I mean serious misconduct on the part not only of one but of several men?—I have never known it in my experience. I have never known it, even as an inspector in the districts which I have been.

9931. You would not say then that a prison might be quite quiet one week and in a state of very poor discipline the next week?—In such a case there would have to be defective management, and whoever allowed such a thing is not worthy of the name of governor.

9932. Do you know, as an inspector, whether a governor has a right by way of punishment to deprive a man of his chapel for a week?—I know it has been done, but I have not approved of it. I have spoken to the Commissioner, and he, I believe, ruled that a governor has no power to do it.*

9933. (Miss Orme.) Supposing there was a general re-arrangement of the duties of inspectors, do you think it would be the best plan to give an inspector one district in which he should always inspect, or do you think you would get better results if they went from one part of the country to another?—I hold a singular opinion upon that subject. I know some of the Commissioners do not agree with me about it, but my opinion is that if you are attached to a particular district you take an interest in that district; you know and encourage the officers to do their work; you encourage the prisoners to do theirs; and in fact you find that if you treat the prisoners properly, and you treat the officers properly, you will find it satisfactory. I do not like the idea of moving officers about.

9934. Moving an inspector from one district to another was my question?—Well, moving an inspector.

9936. By voluntary visits you mean?—Yes. I formerly inspected the north-west district, I used to do that. Then I went to the north-east, and then to the south, and so on. We were talking just now about washing. There is no doubt that in Lancashire, for instance at Preston, they used to wash very well for the outside, and at Strangeways they used to wash remarkably well; in fact they realised from 1,100*l.* to 1,200*l.* a year clear profit, and that without hurting the people outside. The people outside never found fault about it; the judges of assize used to go there and have their shirts washed, and I think the last time I was there as much as about 1,200*l.* clear profit was made. The storekeeper I thought ought to have given more assistance; but the matron there (Miss Little) is in my opinion the best matron in England. She herself went from club to club and so on, and by that means she made every year a larger and larger produce.

9937. (Mr. De Rutzen.) Just to go back for a minute to those visiting justices. In some places you say they hardly attend at all, and in some places they attend well?—Yes.

9938. And they even vary in the same county where there are two prisons?—Yes.

9939. At Swansea you say they do not attend at all?—Not at all.

9940. But at Cardiff they attend, do they not?—Yes.

9941. And attend well?—Yes.

9942. Do the inspectors or the Commissioners ever try to keep in touch with the visiting justices?—I used to be very much in touch with the visiting committee in my old district, but you must remember I have been only two years and a half in my present one; I always make a point of seeing the magistrates when I can.

9943. Do you make any appointment with the visiting justices?—No, if they want an appointment they write to me and frequently I meet them at the prison.

9944. Of course you are aware of the rule laid down for the visiting justices that they shall co-operate with the Commissioners in promoting the efficiency of the service?—Yes.

9945. As a matter of fact do the inspectors and the Commissioners so far as you know take much trouble to put themselves in touch with the visiting justices?—I think the Commissioners desire to do so very much, and I try all I can to assist them in the matter.

9946. Do you mean that at Swansea if you give them an intimation that you would like to see a magistrate they do not attend?—Major Knight told me it was very difficult to get any attendance, and even in Cardiff it is difficult. For instance, if you want to certify a lunatic it is very difficult to get two magistrates to come in; they are all strewed about so much.

9947. Of course the visiting justices have great powers?—Yes.

* For Colonel Garsia's evidence on this point, see 11,741.

9948. And can report upon anything the same as you gentlemen as inspectors can report? — They report direct to the Secretary of State.

9949. Yes, they can report direct to the Secretary of State without the intervention of the inspectors or Commissioners?—Yes.

9950. And are in that sense entirely an independent body?—Yes.

9951. And therefore I suppose you would say the most useful, and in fact the only outside body that is independent?—That is quite right, they are the only independent body.

9952. Would you think it would be of great service to get them to be a little more regular in places where they are not regular?—Yes. I think if they had a little more added to their responsibility and their work that they would take greater interest in the prisons.

9953. You say that the few kind words which you said to a boy in the cell had the best possible effect?—Certainly.

9954. Would you recommend that the gaol should be more thrown open to visitors who were inclined to come in and perform good services?—I think it would be dangerous to do a thing like that, unless you knew the people well. We have lady visitors in some prisons.

9955. I should suggest that they should be people well qualified, who are known to the visiting justices, known to the governor, and approved by both. Would you see any objection that there should be a better influence introduced into the prisons by that means?—I think it is more likely to be done if you have got good visiting justices. That is quite sufficient. I would not have too many, and of course they could bring in a friend, because they can do so now by virtue of their position as magistrates.

9956. They would have a right to go?—Yes.

9957. But I am rather pointing to those who have not a right to go, but who would be willing to give their services for good. Would you see any objection to that?—Well, I would hesitate about it.

Capt. H. K. Wilson.

7 Dec. 1894.

9958. Do you think it would interfere with the discipline?—No, it might not, but it might give a good deal of trouble to the officials. In some prisons the number of officers is very low.

9959. I do not suggest that they should go round if they were approved of by the governor, accompanied by the warder at every step they take, but that they should have a little freer opportunity?—Do you mean that you would allow them to go by themselves?

9960. I am rather putting it to you?—Well, I do not think they ought to go round alone. There is a good deal of sentiment in some people and they might overdo their duty. I think it would be dangerous to introduce that.

9961. You say the thing to look forward to in the future is education?—I think so.

9962. At present there is no report made of the state of education of the people in the local prisons?—There is no special report. I think the per-centage of illiterate people in our prisons might be put down at about 20 or 21 per cent.

9963. That is of illiterates?—Yes, ten years ago there would be a much higher per-centage of illiterates.

9964. That 20 or 21 per cent. is the state of things at the present moment you mean?—Yes, I have inquired about that in going about in my district.

9965. (Mr. O'Connor.) How many prisons have you in your district?—15.

9966. You see every one of them every month?—Yes.

9967. Then you have a good deal of travelling?—Yes.

The witness withdrew.

The proceedings were adjourned until Thursday, the 13th of December, at 11.30 o'clock.

NINETEENTH DAY.

Home Office, Whitehall.

Thursday, 13th December 1894.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P. (CHAIRMAN).

The Right Honourable Sir ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B.
Sir JOHN EDWARD DORINGTON, Bart., M.P.
JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, Esq., M.B., F.R.C.P.
ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Esq., M.P.
ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis; and Miss ORME.

JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

Mr. EVELYN J. RUGGLES-BRISE called and examined.

Mr. E. J. Ruggles-Brise.

13 Dec. 1894.

9968. (Sir Algernon West.) You are a Commissioner of Local Prisons and a Director of Convict Prisons?—I am.

9969. Will you tell me the date of your appointment?—January 1892.

9970. Therefore you were appointed subsequently to the outbreak at Wormwood Scrubs?—Yes.

9971. Will you tell the Committee about the constitution and duties of your board?—There were two boards, and they are amalgamated. There is the old board of directors, who were appointed in 1850, and there were the new Commissioners, appointed by Act of Parliament in 1877. These two boards were amalgamated for practical purposes in the year 1887, or thereabouts. The chairman of the Board of Directors became chairman of the Prisons Commissioners, and I must tell you it was one of the recommendations of the Kimberley Commission in 1879 that the Board of Directors should have meetings and act as a Board, so that I take it that previous to 1879 they did not meet as a board, but the chairman was absolutely their head, and their duties were confined to monthly visits to convict prisons and administrative work in connexion with their respective prisons.

9972. Are you appointed by warrant or by patent?—I am appointed by sign manual to my commissionership, and by the Secretary of State to my directorship.

9973. I am talking now mainly of your commissionership; is there any difference in the letters patent, distinguishing the difference between the chairman and the Commissioners?—You mean the sign manual appointment?

9974. Yes.—No, I believe not; the appointment is only permissive under the statute.

9975. Therefore, as far as the letters patent go, you have joint authority?—Yes, there is quite co-ordinate authority under our appointments.

9977. Will you tell me how often your Board meets?—Since I have joined the Board we have had very few meetings indeed. This has been due, practically, to the fact that the chairman, owing to illness, has had long absences abroad, and we have had no deputy chairman. It is partly due to the system which I found in existence when I joined the Board. It was not the practice to have regular board meetings.

9978. Roughly, could you give me an idea of how many times you have met in a year as a Board?—I should think not more than six or seven times.

9979. Then how is the work arranged; is it divided amongst the Commissioners, or do the Commissioners act as a committee?—It is divided amongst the Commissioners; each Commissioner has a district assigned to him containing from 17 to 20 prisons. I am talking of local prisons. For that district he is individually responsible. He visits the prisons in that district, and all the papers coming to the office relating to the prisons in that district come before him. That is the daily routine work. Large questions of administration, which are not connected with the local administration of those particular prisons under that system, are dealt with by the chairman. For instance, the Home Office refer papers, which is, of course, a most important part of our work, and they are dealt with by the chairman on his own authority, frequently unknown to the Commissioners. They do not necessarily pass under the Commissioners cognizance as part of the machinery.

9980. Then all large questions affecting the system do not come up for discussion before you as a Board?—As a rule they do not.

9981. And the papers referred to the Commissioners by the Home Secretary are dealt with individually by the chairman, and are sometimes not seen by the Commissioners at all?—Of course there are exceptions. If the chairman had called a board meeting, and there happened to be a controversy pending then between the chairman and the Secretary of State, that would no doubt be brought to our knowledge, but we are not necessarily consulted on matters of administration.

9982. Supposing in your district you found something you disapproved of very much in the system, should you feel bound to bring it before your brother Commissioners, or your chairman, or to deal with it yourself?—I feel I have a very large latitude with regard to matters in my own district, but if I felt a general question of policy was involved by any decision I might give, and it was new to the practice, I should certainly refer it to the chairman on paper in the same way as he might refer it to the Secretary of State.

9983. And you would get his decision?—Yes.

9984. Which would be communicated to all the Commissioners?—Not necessarily; the machinery does not compel that.

9985. Therefore, it would be an individual decision of the chairman, and not a collective opinion of the Board?—Certainly, you must take that to be the fact.

9986. And yet it would be issued as the decision of the Commissioners, I suppose?—Certainly.

9987. Though the Commissioners know nothing about it?—Well, it might happen, and has happened, to my knowledge.

9988. In what relation to your Board does your secretary stand?—Well, the history of the secretary is rather a peculiar one. His position downstairs depends largely on his own individual character, and the position which he will assume for himself. We happen at the present time to have a very strong man, and there is no doubt, therefore, that the present secretary is enjoying far greater powers than were enjoyed by his predecessor.

9989. Does he ever write letters on the prison system without the orders of the Commissioners?—Never; he is the absolute mouthpiece of the Commissioners, individually or collectively.

9990. Does he ever write letters on the orders of the chairman separately from the Board?—He certainly would carry out the orders of the chairman, and, as a matter of courtesy, he would inform the Commissioners.

9991. It would not be brought before them officially?—As a matter of courtesy, I have become aware of the decisions; but it is only as a matter of courtesy, which I should not have known under the existing machinery. It is a pure matter of courtesy whether the secretary circulates them or not.

9992. In fact, you say it is left to his individuality whether he does so or not?—Yes.

9993. Is there anything in your department which allots different clerks to different Commissioners, or are they clerks of the united Board?—They are all clerks of the Board, but, as a matter of fact, we have got three independent departments constituted. They are the growth of time, and they are the result of this system. The chairman, being an absolute authority, works directly with the heads of the department, not necessarily through the Board and their secretary. For instance, he would work directly with the store accountant if he wanted a question of stores or of labour considered. Their independence has been established owing to the power of the chairman. It is an autocratic system.

9994. But has he any separate department of his own?—No, one of the clerks is attributed to him as a confidential clerk, and in that capacity all the patronage of the office is exercised.

9995. How are appointments made? I want you to tell me the machinery by which appointments are made by the Board?—Do you mean the appointment of all officers, the higher and the lower, because there is a difference between them?

9996. From governors to warders?—The chairman would never select a governor without a Board meeting. Most of the Board meetings to which I have been summoned have been mainly for the purpose of recommending a governor or deputy governor to the Secretary of State. In fact, as far as my experience goes, whenever the Commissioners have met it has been for the purpose of dealing with questions of patronage in the higher branches of the service. The governors generally come before us as a board, and are interviewed individually, but in regard to the patronage of the lower ranks we are not necessarily consulted. We are not consulted as to the appointment of a medical officer or a chaplain; we are not consulted at all as to the appointment of warders and subordinate officers.

9997. These junior appointments are made entirely on the single authority of the chairman?—Acting with his confidential clerk or private secretary, whatever he is called.

9998. But you would hardly called call him a joint authority?—No, except that owing to the great power which he has had as assisting the chairman in all matters of patronage, he is really practically constituted the head of the patronage department. The thing is very anomalous according to my ideas; I call it the "staff department" on paper when I write to him, I always write to the "staff department"; for there is a large staff department which is concerned with patronage, and their work does not necessarily come under the knowledge of the Commissioners.

9999. I am alluding to this confidential clerk?—Certainly he has one of the important offices in the office.

10,000. I should like you to explain more what you mean by the confidential clerk that you call the head of the staff department. What position does he occupy in the office?—He is an ordinary prison clerk who would in ordinary course be concerned with all the routine work connected with the promotion and selection of officers, and all that sort of thing. He ought in ordinary course to prepare all information on matters affecting questions of promotion for the Board. That would be his normal duty. He should be the head of the staff dealing with those questions. He would be an official in the staff department acting under the Board, or acting under the secretary. The point is that he is not under the Secretary, but he is an independent entity. It is difficult to understand this, I know, unless you are practically conversant with the working of the machine, but that is the position.

10,001. We all know that the heads of the departments may privately, as much as they like, consult their private secretaries on all matters; but, of course, the private secretary is an unknown man. He is in no responsibility whatever, and he does not appear in any way as such?—He gets 100*l.* a year from the Treasury for doing confidential work.

10,002. That is his position?—Yes; he is called "private secretary," though I am doubtful if he has ever been officially designated as such by the Treasury or the Secretary of State. I am doubtful of that, but I think not.

10,003. I gather from that, that, putting Governors aside, this gentleman is consulted and you are not consulted on the appointment of warders, promotions, and so on?—I am not consulted as to the appointment of subordinate officers.

10,004. Or as to their promotion?—Yes; that is a question coming within my own department. All the promotions in my prisons would necessarily come before me. I am quite satisfied as to my position in that respect.

10,005. There is a document prepared which is called "The Annual Report of the Commissioners"?—There is.

10,006. Will you tell the Committee how that is prepared?—That again is prepared a great deal, as I may say, unofficially. It is prepared by the chairman himself, and he uses his private secretary or confidential clerk, and the other independent entities which I have referred to in the office for any material that he requires. When it is drafted it is circulated amongst the Board of Directors and Commissioners, and we pass it. That is all I have to do with it myself.

10,007. When you say you pass it, do you deal with it as a report submitted to you for criticism and for making your alterations, recommendations, or amendments; or do you really sign it as a duty?—Personally, when I came down I was surprised to find that I had no share in the preparation of this report. I looked upon it as the most important work of the year, and I thought we should have a Board meeting to consider it; but practically that was not the course adopted, and it was considered that the practice had grown up of its being the peculiar privilege of the chairman. If anything wrong had occurred in it I should have felt it my duty to draw attention to it, but my share in its preparation is practically nil. The secretary is also excluded from participating in that, which I think is a bad thing. It does not come under our regular secretary, it would come under the unofficial secretary.

10,008. We know that you are a Commissioner of local prisons. In that capacity do you visit them?—I do, once a year.

10,009. But as a director of the convict prisons do you visit them?—Once a month.

10,010. And in visiting them do you make any report to the other members of the Board?—I take notes of anything which occurs to me, or which the governors call my attention to, and I discuss it informally with the governor and the Board. I generally have a large mass of such notes when I return to the office.

10,011. The inspectors are under you as a Board, I think?—They are.

10,012. Do they report to you?—Informally, and their short report appears in the appendix to the Annual Report. I always make a point of seeing my inspector when he returns from his district. He takes notes of anything it is necessary to call attention to, and I deal with it with him.

10,013. Do you have any lady inspectors?—We have none.

10,014. Do you think it would be a bad thing to have female inspectors for the female prisoners?—I should be glad to have one female inspector for the female prisoners. It might do good, and I think it it is a want in our system.

10,015. And are you in favour of the classification of prisoners in local prisons?—I should be in favour of it. Of course I am aware of the stupendous administrative difficulties there are in the way of doing it.

10,016. But may I say you do not appear to have those difficulties in dealing with the classification of the convicts, because you have a star class there?—That is all; that is comparatively a very simple matter. The only classification practically in our convict prisons is the star class, but in our local prisons we have many classifications. There are four, five, or six kinds of prisoners.

10,017. Let us take, for instance, the classification into habitual drunkards, epileptic and half-witted prisoners, and juveniles?—I should be strongly in favour of classification if we could carry it out. I think it is possible to carry it out as far as first offenders are concerned, but there would be great difficulty in determining who were first offenders.

10,018. Yes, the term "first offenders" seems entirely to have broken down, because Mr. de Rutzen has told us that sometimes a first offender is a hardened villain who has been clever enough to elude the police for a time, but who comes in for the first time; and it he were put with what I may call more decent people he would be very damaging to them?—Certainly, the most difficult class we have to deal with, I should say, are the vagrant class,—men coming from London to Gloucester, and so on. We have no register of the classification of criminals. Governors have certain methods of trying to get information as to the character of people who come in. They circulate forms with a photograph, saying, "Do you know this man," but there is no complete classification.

10,019. I may take it that you are strongly in favour of classification?—Yes, if it is not laid down on too rigid lines. I should like to get the discretion of the governor and other local authorities as to who was a first offender.

10,020. That is, supposing classification were adopted, you would be in favour of not making it a hard and fast classification?—There should be a large discretion left to the governor, and probably also to the local magistrates, who are conversant with the antecedents of the prisoner. I hardly ever go to a prison but what I see someone who, superficially speaking, ought to be treated as a first offender.

10,021. If we could define that in some other way it would be practically a star class?—Yes, of men or women whose antecedents are good enough not to class them as hopelessly incurable.

10,022. Take the local magistrates. You are aware that in many prisons the visiting justices have almost ceased to exist?—That is a very deplorable result of the Act of 1877.

Mr. E. J. Ruggles-Brise.

13 Dec. 1894.

10,023. Would you be very much in favour of encouraging in some way or other the interest taken by the local magistrates in visiting prisons?—Certainly. I think it is the only satisfactory basis of a good prison system.

10,024. Would you restore to them some of the powers they had before 1877?—I would not go as far as that, but if they exercised the powers which they are empowered to exercise under the Act of 1877 that would be a most enormous advantage to us.

10,025. I mean you must do something. You have failed hitherto in getting them to take an interest; would not it be possible to give them an interest if you gave them some power and authority?—Yes, I would extend it as largely as I could, consistently with the supremacy of the Secretary of State, but that supremacy must be maintained. And by the "supremacy of the Secretary of State," I mean that he is the head of the Prison Department.

10,026. You tell us that the inspectors are held responsible to you as a board; would you think it objectionable that there should be one or two or more inspectors of a superior class who should report to the Secretary of State?—No, I should be strongly opposed to that on every ground. I think it would be bad on principle and unworkable in practice.

10,027. Have you seen enough on your visits of the duties of chaplains to form an opinion as to whether you think the system a good one by which a chaplain goes on year after year, and again year after year?—I do not think it a good one.

10,028. Could you suggest any means which would be an improvement on the present system?—I should like to see the system which is in force to a limited extent largely extended, that is, not to appoint permanent chaplains in our smaller prisons, but to introduce clergymen and their curates from outside.

10,029. That has a good effect?—Yes, both on chaplains and prisoners, because you get new blood, and you get a change for the prisoners.

10,030. You would not limit that, I presume, to the Church of England, but you would allow a change in the way of ministers of certain religions?—That is a very big question, I did not intend that. Of course we never have had the undenominational ministers other than Roman Catholics in an official position.

10,031. Is it laid down in the prison rules that clergymen, other than the chaplain, coming into the prison must be members of the Church of England?—Not that I am aware of. Any minister can come in under the rules.

10,032. (Chairman.) But not as assistant chaplain? Not in an official capacity. That has never been recognised, as you know.

10,033. (Sir Algernon West.) Perhaps you would rather take it in this way, that the ministers of different denominations would not have appointments, but would you like to see them allowed to come in for a change?—Well it has always been held to be a very sacred principle of our system that a person has no business to see the prisoners in connexion with their spiritual instruction, except under the guidance and with the consent of the chaplain. I do not wish to see any hostility set up by opposing denominations, though I think as a rule the chaplain would not object to it.

10,034. Supposing, as to classification, that the difficulties of which we have been talking were got over; and supposing homes were established for habitual drunkards; and supposing the age for admission to reformatories was increased, and supposing also that epileptic patients were kept separate, could you give the Committee any idea of what the balance of prisoners who remained would be?—Well, I could, if I had my report.

10,035. You would enormously run down the number of prisoners whom you would have to deal with as prisoners?—There is no doubt about that.

10,036. Therefore, I think, we may assume there would be a good many prisons, taking England as a whole, which might be used for the purposes of their detention or whatever it is called?—No doubt in time it would be so, but I am not sanguine of it myself. I wish we could have retreats for these different classes.

10,037. Would you consider it advisable if such a thing could be arranged, that there should be some intermediate establishment between a prison and liberty. We have been told, I think, by several witnesses that a prisoner coming out from prison, where he has been treated as a machine, is perfectly dazed when he gets out into the outer world with a pound or two in his pocket. Would you think it possible to establish some intermediate establishment for those prisoners?—It has been tried and discussed, especially with regard to the establishment of refuges for discharged prisoners abroad, but I think public opinion is opposed to it. You have the evils of contamination and association, which have been guarded against in prison, in full force when you get bodies of men together. Of course in small prisons you could do it, where they come out two or three together, but not in large prisons. I should be opposed to it.

10,038. What do you say about the work done by the various prisoners' aid societies?—I think that is a field where a great deal of useful reform might be started. There is a great want of uniformity in the work of the societies and in their methods. In almost every prison a different method prevails, and I should like to see a uniform system established.

10,039. And you think that it might be established?—I do. I have gone a good deal into that question throughout my district, and I have seen good systems prevailing there, and also bad ones.

10,040. Would not any organization tend to a reduction of subscriptions? People subscribe to things which are local things, who very likely would not subscribe to an organized system?—No, it would have to be a matter of very careful arrangement, so as not to put any obstacles in the way of voluntary work.

10,041. There are a great many subscribers and members concerned in these prisoners' aid societies who would naturally oppose anything of the kind?—Some of them are paid superfluous salaries. The chaplain should be the honorary secretary, and it should be made his duty to work in connexion with the local people. In many of our prisons it is strange that our chaplains have nothing to do with the prisoners' aid societies. It is strange that it is so, but it is so.

10,042. Do you think that prisoners who behave very well should have more encouragement to continue their good conduct by allowing them to earn some small wage for themselves?—I see no objection to it after a certain period of detention. It has been tried in this country, as you are aware, under the local system.

10,043. Have convicts ever been allowed to smoke?—Not to my knowledge.

10,044. Would you see any objection to that, supposing it was a reward for continued good conduct?—I should be opposed to it on grounds of discipline. I do not think it is necessary. There are many other solaces and comforts they might have, but the fumes of smoke getting into other cells would be objectionable.

10,045. I mean at exercise?—Then there are little cells which look out on to them. I should not be in favour of it. I think there are other ways in which to show appreciation of good conduct.

10,046. I will not enter into the great question of prison labour, but I should like to ask you whether you do not think it is very desirable that any trade that is taught in our prisons should be conducted by skilled workmen?—Yes, certainly; the absence of any recognized training of the instructing warder is a great want in our system; certainly in local prisons.

10,047. Are you satisfied now with the schoolmasters in prisons?—I am not quite satisfied with the result. I am not sanguine of any results from our educational scheme. When we started it it was anticipated that the greatest results would follow from it; and it was thought that the result of the education would be that we should have no illiterates, and that we should be able to consider a scheme of higher education for prisoners. But we have still a number of people who are illiterate. Sometimes they declare themselves illiterate on purpose, but they are still a very large percentage.

10,048. I gather from that that you do not think sufficient interest is given to prisoners?—I think the law interferes with us by forbidding education to interfere with the hours of labour. That is the standing difficulty, in my opinion.

10,049. Could you devise any scheme which would obviate that difficulty?—I cannot without an alteration of the law; I cannot as long as the law stands as it is at present.

10,050. But you would be in favour of an alteration of the law?—I certainly think it is not desirable that we should have illiterate prisoners coming there to remain for anything less than four months. That is where the initial stage begins. That is the result now. They cannot be educated in less than four months. I should like to see that term abolished.

10,051. Would you be prepared to give instruction during the hours of labour; that is to say, diminish the labour and add to the instruction?—I should, if it were carefully done.

10,052. Now, as to conversation and silence; would you like to see that altered in our convict system? Everybody, I think, that we have had before us agrees that though silence is laid down, yet practically they all talk?—They talk at their work now, and are obliged to do so.

10,053. Would you be in favour of allowing well-conducted convicts under proper surveillance to talk, instead of having a rule which is always broken?—It is not always broken.

10,054. Well, we have had overwhelming evidence from convicts and others that practically they know all that goes on?—I know it is perfectly marvellous how they do know everything, but that is a good deal due to the construction of the old-fashioned iron cells, through which they can talk.

10,055. Should you object to well-behaved convicts after a certain time being allowed to talk with other prisoners?—Do you mean during exercise?

10,056. Yes?—And during exercise only?

10,057. Yes, during association, I will put it to you?—What, talk to each other when they are in the boot shop, for instance, and say, "How is your wife," and so on?

10,058. Yes?—Then I should not be in favour of it.

10,059. Then I will limit it to exercise?—Before 1879 they used to talk at exercise, but the system of single file exercise, which was then introduced, was, I believe, the result of the Kimberley Commission. Anyhow, it was a matter of great controversy at that time, and that system was formally adopted and put in force with the sanction of the Secretary of State. It is a big thing to say off-hand that that is wrong; I am not prepared to say so. If you put me to it, I should say I am opposed to it. From a short experience, I see no harmful result from what is called the silent system. They come before me in hundreds, and their powers of voice are not impaired by the system. I do not think it is a hardship on them; they have frequent opportunities of seeing the chaplain and the governor.

10,060. (Miss Orme.) Should you see any objection to some more Rescue Homes being added to the list of those which are recognised by the department in London?—For female convicts?

10,061. Yes?—I should be largely in favour of any extension of that work.

10,062. Take, for example, the Rescue Homes which are managed by the Salvation Army in Hackney?—Any agency which comes forward to help discharged prisoners I should warmly welcome; that is the only way, I believe, of dealing with recidivism.

10,063. Should you be in favour of persons, carefully appointed by the authorities, being allowed to visit the female prisoners some days before they leave the prison?—That is the practice in some of our local prisons.

10,064. In some of the London prisons, one or two ladies visit, but in several cases the managers of the Rescue Homes are not admitted to the prisoners. Would you see any objection to extending that system if they were carefully appointed?—Yes; but they must be carefully appointed, and if they were, I would extend it as far as you can go.

10,065. So that, for example, a woman who was an officer in the Salvation Army, might see those prisoners in Holloway who wished to go to their Rescue Homes three or four days before leaving the prison, in their cells?—Yes, if it were anybody officially appointed, I do not want wandering visitors in the prisons; but anybody who was appointed by the Secretary of State I should warmly welcome. It works excellently in one or two of my prisons, where I have got philanthropic ladies who do a tremendous amount of good by visiting the female prisoners.

10,066. Could you explain to me what advice is taken in choosing the work that women are taught in prisons during the longer sentences. I mean where do you obtain the information which leads you to choose a particular industry for women to learn?—I am afraid that has been to a certain extent neglected. It has been taken for granted that women are only good for laundry work and needlework, and it is difficult to extend it much beyond those boundaries. I do not know that the subject has ever been officially considered.

10,067. For instance, you have never made inquiries as to the market price of the particular kind of work so as to discover whether a woman could earn her living by it on coming out?—Individual governors have done it, but as a system it has not been done. The system depends enormously on how governors work it; some work it well, some do not; some are anxious for that sort of thing, others do not bother their heads about it; but where you have a governor who interests himself in that sort of thing, I have no doubt he does make local inquiries, but it is in that way only.

10,068. Supposing there was a suggestion for some new industries, and supposing, for instance, it was suggested that women should learn to work the knitting machine, instead of doing ordinary knitting, by which they could earn about 1*l.* a week, would that suggestion come from the governor to you, or from you to the governor?—It ought to emanate from the store department.

10,069. But it has not been so?—Not to my knowledge I am speaking only of my three years' experience, it has not come before me.

10,070. With regard to the system of religious instruction in the prisons, do you think it would be well to increase the custom of having female scripture readers to visit the prisoners instead of their only receiving visits from the chaplain?—I think in our large prisons it would be a good thing. You must remember our female prison population is scattered over an enormous number of small female prisons. In one place I may only find one female prisoner; in another, perhaps, three; and in another, eight or nine; so that you cannot have any great advantage, I think, in those cases.

10,071. But take such prisons as Holloway, Wormwood Scrubs, and Strangeways?—Yes, in all these prisons there is a certain per-centage of female prisoners who might afford ground to work upon.

10,072. And you think that you might give a great deal of opportunity for the work of the women instead of the hurried work of the chaplain?—I think so.

10,073. Are you aware that in some of the large prisons the accommodation in the reception ward is so insufficient that the women are either put two together in small cells until they are ready to give them the bath, and in other cases that they stand in a group of old women and young women together until the matron can deal with them?—That has not come before me in my own district, but I have no doubt it is the case that females are congregated together in some districts.

Mr. E. J. Ruggles-Brise.

13 Dec. 1894.

10,074. In Strangeways, for instance?—Yes, perhaps.

10,075. And if you did see that occurring you would think that a very bad case, and a very bad form of association?—Of course; our efforts for years have been directed to preventing association of any sort.

10,076. Are you in favour of prisoners performing any personal service for the warders?—I should not allow it.

10,077. For instance, cooking for the warders' mess. Do you approve of that?—I should not be in favour of it.

10,078. You are aware that they do do it?—No, I am not aware that they do. You are talking of the female wing?

10,079. Yes.—I was not aware, as a matter of fact, that they did cook for the female warders.

10,080. Do you approve of a prisoner, who is on strict prison diet, cooking ordinary food for the warders?—I cannot approve of it from the point of view of discipline.

10,081. Then, with regard to the female warders, should you be in favour of an alteration by which the hours during which they are liable to answer the prisoners' bells at night should be regarded as working hours?—Yes, but of course we have always held that the night duty is not a duty which is counted by hours of duty either by men or women.

10,082. The men are not liable in the same way, because the night watchman answers the bell; but on the female side the warders, who have been at work all day, and are going to work on the following day are liable to be awakened any number of times during the night. Are you in favour of that?—Would you count the whole of the night as hours of duty?

10,083. I should, personally. You agree, I suppose, that in a large prison like Holloway the strain is very great on the matron, and on those warders who act in the reception wards?—Certainly.

10,084. Do not you think she should have an undisturbed night after that?—I do. I think that a large prison deserves peculiar treatment, but that those rules ought not to be applied to all prisons. Of course in a little prison no bell ever rings, perhaps, and I think it should not be established as a principle, that it should be regarded as night duty, or they would be all working for 24 hours a day.

10,085. But you agree, that in a prison of special difficulty, there ought to be some modification?—Yes.

10,086. (Mr. O'Connor.) You said that you had not noticed that there was any impairment of speech by continued silence?—I have not noticed it myself. I have only practically taken over the duty of director for a short period.

10,087. Would you test the severity of the silent system by the noticeable impairment of speech?—No, I should not attach much value to that. I mentioned it incidentally, but I do not attach very much value to it.

10,088. What practical experience of the detail of prison administration did you have before you became a Commissioner?—Of the actual details of the practical working of the prison, of course, I had none.

10,089. I suppose you have sometimes garotters and other offenders who are sentenced to flogging by the court, and who are flogged in prison?—Yes.

10,090. That is, after a public trial by a Supreme Court judge?—Quite so.

10,091. And in the convict prisons who sentences to flogging?—The visiting director.

10,092. Is the prisoner defended?—He is not defended, but the trial is on oath.

10,093. Are you a visiting director?—I am.

10,094. Have you seen the evidence that has been already given before this Committee?—I have not; I saw it for about the first six sittings, but not since.

10,095. Did you see the evidence with regard to the accommodation in the London prisons?—I did.

10,096. Was that new to you?—No, I was familiar with that subject.

10,097. How was it, as the Commissioners were aware of the want of accommodation, or of the occasional over-pressure and duplication of prisoners in cells, that something was not done to remedy it?—Well, perhaps they had too great a faith in the power of the alternate prison system. It was always supposed that if a governor was overcrowded, he should apply for leave to remove to another prison.

10,098. But, as a matter of fact, very often it has been so?—Yes.

10,099. And that is against the rule?—Certainly, it ought to have been provided against by the governor.

10,100. Can you account for Mr. Asquith's answer in the House of Commons last July, to the effect that, however the accommodation is calculated, there is sufficient room* ?—Are those the words?

10,101. I will not answer for the words, but that was the impression conveyed to my mind?—Those words, "however calculated," are very important. There is space enough for all prisoners if we calculate all the reception cells and hospital cells.

10,102. But the allegation was that, however calculated, there was abundant accommodation. How do you reconcile that official answer of the Secretary of State in the House of Commons with the facts?—Well, the actual accommodation is in the return which was furnished.

10,103. I am speaking now of what we have elicited in evidence here, and what you tell us was known to the Commissioners; and I was asking you if you could reconcile that with Mr. Asquith's answer?—On paper there is accommodation. I did not see the answer which was drafted for the Secretary of State, and I do not know on what figures it was based; but on paper, if you take the London prisons at the present moment, there is sufficient accommodation.

10,104. That was scarcely my question. Of course, generally, there would be sufficient accommodation, because the prisoners would not be in very large numbers?—Quite so.

10,105. But when they are in very large numbers there is not sufficient accommodation?—No, I do not think there is.

10,106. That being the case, how can Mr. Asquith have been directed to say in the House of Commons, that, "however calculated, the accommodation was sufficient" ?—I do not know. I was not responsible for the answer.

10,107. Do you know who it was?—No, I do not know who drafted it.

10,108. What is the proportion of staff which you consider sufficient for a prison?—We have 5 per cent. staff in a local prison, and 10 per cent. in a convict prison, and I believe that to be adequate.

10,109. Have you read the evidence with regard to the staff at Pentonville?—No, I have not had the opportunity of seeing that.

10,110. Pentonville has to serve Newgate, I think?—No. Holloway serves Newgate.

10,111. Then I will ask you if you have seen the evidence with regard to the staff at Holloway?—No, I have not seen that.

10,112. Have you seen the evidence with regard to the overworking of some of the disciplinary staff?—No, I have seen no evidence since the 8th of August.

10,113. Were you aware that the warder or chief warder might sometimes be on duty from 6 o'clock one morning until 8 o'clock the next morning?—Yes, if you include sleeping in as duty. That is the point.

* See Question 10,366 for the actual terms of the Home Secretary's answer.

10,114. No, no, not sleeping in; out of bed?—I never knew of a case in a local prison, certainly.

10,115. Will you tell me what steps the Commissioners take to secure that their orders and the law are observed in the prisons; what active steps do they take to watch prisoners, and see that the law is not violated, or that their orders are not violated?—By the two methods of inspectors and visiting committees.

10,116. Is there a vacancy amongst them now?—No, not at the present moment.

10,117. How many inspectors have you?—At the present we have four. The vacancies have not been filled up for some time.

10,118. (Chairman.) Does that include Colonel Garsia?—No, it is exclusive of Colonel Garsia.

10,119. (Dr. Bridges.) Exclusive of Dr. Gover?—Yes. Major Griffiths, Colonel Hankin, and Captain Lennox.

10,120. (Mr. O'Connor.) When was the last appointed?—A long time ago; it was sometime in the seventy's, I think.

10,121. Has not there been a vacancy since?—Yes, we had a vacancy the other day, Admiral Fenwick's vacancy was not filled up.

10,122. How often do the inspectors visit the prisons?—Once a month, as a rule.

10,123. Do you think it is sufficient?—I think it is sufficient. I am not sure it is not more than sufficient; that is, provided that our local justices will come in and help us to keep an eye on the prisoners themselves.

10,124. Then I understand you leave an inspectorship unfilled, relying on unofficial inspection?—Well, it was felt by the Secretary of State that there were more inspectors than were required owing to the diminished number of prisons.

10,125. Was the diminution in number of prisons on the ground of the reduction; or was the ground that there was not sufficient work for all the inspectors?—I should say what practically led to the diminution, was the reduction in the number of prisons.

10,126. Regardless of the fact that the inspectors only inspect now, once a month?—They never inspect more than once a month, I believe.

10,127. With regard to the staff, would you say that the staff of the prisons, generally, is in a contented state?—I think our disciplinary staff is in a contented state.

10,128. Let us take that first. Do you say that the assistant warders are, as a body, a contented branch of the public service?—I should say, as a body they are. I think Lord de Ramsey's Committee removed some of their more specific grievances. There are exceptions, of course.

10,129. I will put it, whether on account of hours, or lodgings, or pay, or leave, or Sunday service, or fines, you would say that there is, or is not, in the disciplinary staff, a considerable amount of discontent, which affects them as a body?—I should say that there is no more discontent in the conditions of the service than is inseparable from all large bodies of public servants. Of, course, we have petitions from time to time, asking for an eight hours' day, and so on; but, from my own personal experience from going to prisons, and seeing the warders, I think that, as a body, they are a contented set of men.

10,130. I do not want to go into details, but what is the general position of the assistant warders in point of prospects of promotion, and rate of promotion?—Well, we hope that in 10 years there will be promotion for a warder. Personally, when I have seen a man with longer service than that, I should try to get him transferred to another prison, where, in ordinary course, a man with considerably lesser service would have been promoted. Ten years is about the time in which it is expected a man may get his promotion from assistant warder to warder.

10,131. Have you any number of assistant warders of more than 10 years' service?—Not a considerable number, but I have some up to 16 years' service in one of my prisons.

10,132. Do you consider that a contented state of the staff is a matter of great importance in the administration of the prison service?—It is of the first importance.

10,133. Do you employ assistant warders anywhere? I mean casual assistants?—Temporary officers, yes; but we have reduced it to a great extent.

10,134. Still the system does obtain?—Yes.

10,135. Do you know the class of men that are got in? You can judge that by the rate of pay they get?—We have to rely on the discretion of the governor, absolutely, as to that. It does not come before us.

10,136. Are they men who are hired at the rate of 4*d.* an hour?—I forget what it comes to now, but I think it is 3*s.* 6*d.* a day.

10,137. Do you find that trafficking is the result of the employment of these men?—No, I should not say so, as far as my own experience goes.

10,138. Trafficking is not unknown, even in the present day?—No.

10,139. You take an establishment for the purposes of the estimate presented to the House of Commons. Do you know how many you are short of that establishment in your actual staff?—At the present moment?

10,140. Yes?—That I cannot say.

10,141. Would it be 238?—I cannot give you a definite answer without inquiry.

10,142. Do the Commissioners ever call upon the governors for a record of the number of hours their staff is worked?—Yes. I should do it myself, if a complaint came from a prison saying that a man had been working above the regulation hours.

10,143. I mean apart from a complaint, what would the Commissioners do to administer their system?—There is no automatic process by which we periodically call for returns.

10,144. You do not spontaneously inspect, for the purpose of seeing whether the rules, with regard to hours, are observed?—No.

10,145. So that, as a matter of fact, a man might be worked 26½ hours without the Commissioners knowing anything about it?—It is not likely to occur.

10,146. But it might. As a matter of fact, we have been told it does, and has?—Really, I was not aware of that.

10,147. Beyond their inspection, what steps do the Commissioners, in their administration, take to ascertain the conditions of prisons, or of any particular prison?—Beyond the inspection by the inspector, they visit themselves, periodically, and there are constantly other authorities in the prison, such as the surveyor or his foreman of works. There is generally somebody from head-quarters moving about the district.

10,148. Were you a Commissioner in January 1892?—I was appointed in January 1892.

10,149. Can you say whether the condition of Wormwood Scrubs, at the end of 1891, was known to the Commissioners?—That is after the trouble we had there.

10,150. I mean before that?—It did not come before the Secretary of State. In those days I was private secretary to the Secretary of State, and it did not come before the Home Office.

10,151. You cannot say whether the Commissioners were, or were not, aware whether the prison was in an unsatisfactory condition?—I was not aware of that.

10,152. Is it the duty of the Commissioners to see that no illegal punishments are inflicted in prisons?—Certainly it would be so.

10,153. If you saw a man's record, would you be able to tell from inspecting it, whether it was a record of legality or not?—I hope I should be able to.

10,154. I will just ask you to look at this record, of a prisoner whom I will call "J. E.," and say whether there is anything about it which would strike you, as a Commissioner, as to its irregularity or its illegality. (Handing record of "J. E." to the witness.) You do not see it at once?—No, I do not.

10,155. You are conversant, of course, with the Acts of Parliament?—Yes.

10,156. I will show you something. Just look at that "19/12/91," and tell me if that is not absolutely illegal. I will refer you to the 43rd section of the Prisons Act of 1877, which says that "It shall not "be lawful for the gaoler to order any prisoner to be "confined in a punishment cell for any term exceeding "24 hours; nor shall it be lawful for the visiting "committee of justices to order any prisoner to be "punished by confinement in a punishment cell for "any term exceeding 14 days'"?—This is by the visiting justices, 10 days.

10,157. He was imprisoned for 42 days?—"10 days' punishment cell, No. 2."

10,158. "Forty-two days' punishment cell" is what I want to draw your attention to?—"No. 3 diet." That "punishment cell" is erased; I do not know who by.

10,159. I made a copy of it when we had it before, in order to check these things. My note says: "10 days' No. 2 punishment diet, to commence at "end of present punishment, 42 days' punishment "cell"?—That is erased, as you see, in pencil. I do not know by whom.

(Mr. O'Connor.) Then I will hand this up to the Chairman.

(Chairman.) You mean there is an erasure in the sense of a scratching out, by a pencil mark being put through an ink entry.

10,160. (Mr. O'Connor.) I do not know when that pencil mark was put on it. Who is responsible for the accuracy of these records?—The governor of the prison.

10,161. That was Colonel Garsia at the time?—I think it was.*

10,162. Under the Act of Parliament that is absolutely illegal?—Yes.

10,163. Under the Act of Parliament the visiting committee has no power to give 42 days' punishment cell, and the governor must be supposed to have known it. The prisoner is undefended, and therefore the prisoner cannot know it?—The governor would know it.

10,163*a*. (Chairman.) There is no mistake about "P. cell," meaning "punishment cell," I suppose?—It must be "punishment cell," I th nk.

10,164. (Mr. O'Connor.) Can we get some other document which will show where this man was during the period covered by these entries? Under the date of the 19th December there would be a record.

(Secretary.) I have the punishment book here. The words "P. cell" have been inserted afterwards.

10,165. (Mr. O'Connor.) The point of my question is, that what steps, if any, do the Commissioners take, or what steps do they adopt to see that these illegal punishments are not inflicted?—It is the duty of the inspector at his monthly visit to go through the monthly journals; the Commissioner would also go through it. It is certainly one of the primary duties of the inspector to check the governor in that way, and not to assume that his duty is done.

10,166. Do you know who was the inspector that visited that prison next after that?—At Wormwood Scrubs, in 1892, I think it was Major Griffiths or Captain Wilson, I am not sure which.

10,167. At any rate it is the duty of the Commissioners to see that no illegal punishments are inflicted?—Certainly, we are responsible for that.

10,168. And I suppose your secretary is the organ by which you communicate?—Certainly.

10,169. And your secretary, when that would come before the Commissioners, was Colonel Garsia?—Well, if it came before the Commissioners, the secretary would not necessarily communicate it.

10,170. He left the prison shortly after?—Yes; but the paper would come before me as Commissioner of the prison, to be dealt with independently of the secretary in the ordinary course.

10,171. If an outbreak or serious disturbance occurs in a prison, what system of inquiry is adopted by the Commissioners?—If it is in the ordinary course an inspector would be sent down to make a report. It would not be necessarily the inspector of the district. In a very grievous case (certainly if it occurred in one of my prisons) I should go myself to inquire.

10,172. Do you know what system of inquiry was adopted in that particular prison where this illegal punishment was inflicted?—I only know that from the papers coming before the Secretary of State. I was not a prison official at that date; but as far as I know the inspector of the prison was sent to report.

10,173. You were a Commissioner within a fortnight of that happening?—I did not take over my duties for some days. I think it was the inspector who reported to the Board, and the Board reported to the Secretary of State. I only saw the report of the chairman of the Board to the Secretary of State. That would be the normal procedure, and I think it was probably followed in this case.

10,174. Is there anything irregular with regard to this man's dietary?—10 days' No. 2; 42 days' No. 3; that is the maximum of No. 3.

10,175. I mean were the intervals duly observed. There are certain prescribed interval?—"10 days' "No. 2, to commence at the end of the present "punishment." It does not strike me on the face of it. I should have to look into it by the help of the statutes and the books to give you an answer.

10,176. Is it the duty of an inspector when he goes to a prison of this kind to check every one of these sentences?—Certainly, he ought to do so.

10,177. You notice that this man was tried and sentenced on the 11th of December?—Yes.

10,178. He was sentenced to No. 1 prison diet?—Yes.

10,179. On the 19th of December, that is eight days afterwards, he got 16 days in punishment cell No. 1, punishment diet?—Yes.

10,180. Was it lawful to give him that dietary?—Without an interval? I must look into the dietaries before I can answer that; I cannot answer it straight off.

10,181. What we are concerned with is to know what system the Commissioners adopt to protect these men who are in the charge of jailers against possibly illegal punishment or improper treatment?—I have already answered that by saying it is the duty of the inspectors to go through the governor's journal and also the visiting justices', who they know have large powers. There is no more check than is ensured by those means.

10,182. You are not conversant with the details of the Wormwood Scrubs inquiry?—No; I saw the official Home Office papers, of course.

10,183. Do you know what the finding was?—Do you mean the finding as to the cause of the outbreak?

10,184. Do you know what the decision arrived at was with regard to responsibility?—No, I was not aware that that question arose in that acute form.

10,185. Was anybody blamed for it?—No, not that I am aware of.

10,186. Everybody was acquitted?—I do not think the question of allocating blame arose.

10,187. At any rate, so far as you know, nobody was blamed at the time?—No.

10,188. Captain Schuyler was not blamed at the time?—Not as far as my memory goes.

10,189. Would the Commissioners know of such a thing as a prisoner being deprived of his attendance in chapel to exercise his religion in common with the rest of the prisoners for several weeks together?—Yes, not for several weeks, I think; but I think, as an ordinary matter of discipline, a governor would keep him out of chapel for a short time, I do not think he would for a long time.

10,190. How would the Commissioner know that?—I think he would ask for instructions; you must rely on the governors, the whole thing depends on that.

* For Colonel Garsia's evidence as to prisoner J. E., see 11,742–4, 11,790–8.

10,191. If, then, a governor kept a person away from his chapel or from the exercise of his religion for several weeks, the Commissioners would not necessarily know of it?—Not necessarily, because governors have a very large discretion and very large powers.

10,192. You were speaking of the Commission of 1878, of Lord Kimberley?—Yes.

10,193. Are you aware that that Commission reported that the then system, at any rate up to that date, had failed to reform offenders? They do report that, do not they?—That is so.

10,194. And I think they attribute it to the contamination in these establishments?—Yes; there is no doubt it has been alleged, with a certain amount of truth.

10,195. They also say that the evil has been diminished, they hope, by the new regulation in English prisons under which male convicts exercise in single file?—Quite so. It was alleged at that time that a great deal of this contamination was due to exercising not in single file.

10,196. And on page 15 they say that all communication has been prohibited beyond what is indispensable at their work?—Yes.

10,197. Do you think that system—I will not call it a silent system, but a system of absolute isolation and enforced silence—has made convict prisons more reformative?—I do not quite understand what you mean by "absolute isolation."

10,198. Each man is by himself, and is not allowed to communicate with his fellows by speech?—He is with them all day, and he can talk to them about his work; he can also talk to his warders who are instructing him, so that he does talk a great deal, as a matter of fact.

10,199. Do you think that the system which has been pursued since this new regulation, has been more reformative than what preceded it?—No, I have got no reason to believe so.

10,200. Have you noticed that the percentage of re-convictions has increased since that date?—I am aware of that.

10,201. And that the proportion of licenses forfeited has also increased since that date?—I was not aware of that.

10,202. It is shown in your blue book?—I have forgotten it.

10,203. In the light of these suggestions would you be inclined to consider that the new system is an improvement upon the old?—Well, I can hardly hold that it is a new system since 1879. The changes which are the result of the Commission of 1878 are not of themselves of such great importance that you could call it the adoption of a new system.

10,204. Has your attention been drawn to the proportion of the death-rate in Irish prisons and the death-rate in English prisons?—No, my attention has not been drawn to that.

10,205. You are not aware that the death-rate in Irish prisons, according to the last book published, is 6 per thousand, whereas in English prisons it is 14 per thousand?—That has not been brought to my notice.

10,206. I mean in English convict prisons?—Yes, and in Irish convict prisons for the whole Irish establishment.

10,207. In Irish convict prisons it is 6 per thousand, and in English convict prisons it is 14 per thousand. The death-rate in the English local prisons is 7·6 per thousand?—Yes.

10,208. And for the five years ending 1894 it was 7·7 per thousand?—Yes.

10,209. The death-rate in the Irish prisons for the five years ending 1894 is 3·9 per thousand?—In the local prisons?

10,210. Yes?—They are very small.

10,211. So that the death rate in the English local prisons and convict prisons is twice as high as it is in the Irish local prisons and convict prisons respectively?—Just so.

10,212. How can you account for that?—I cannot account for it.

10,213. You have a considerable amount of corporal punishment in the English prisons?—To a certain extent, yes, but not to a very large extent. It is practised in both countries.

10,214. Can you account for the fact that, in the Irish prisons throughout a whole year, no case of corporal punishment occurred, either in the convict prisons or the local prisons?—Of course, I cannot. Of course there is a much smaller population to deal with, and if they had as large a population as we have, I should doubt if they could show so good a record.

10,215. Could you say that Irish prisoners are more amenable to discipline than English prisoners are?—I have no reason to say so.

10,216. Or that the Irish staff are men of more tact or intelligence than the English staff?—No; of course I cannot give you an answer with reference to anything without knowing the men. I have never had an opportunity of going over an Irish prison yet.

10,217. You have not seen the 16th report of the Irish Prisons Board, showing that there have been no corporal punishments whatever in any of the Irish prisons?—I have not. That is very remarkable.

10,218. Would you think it an unreasonable thing to say, having regard to the comparatively low rate of mortality and the very much lower rate of punishments in Irish convict prisons and local prisons than in the corresponding establishments in this country, that the Irish prisons are more humanely administered than the English prisons?—No, I should be very unwilling to say that. I do not believe it to be the case. That would be a very bold deduction to draw from these facts. Nobody would contend that our system is so inhuman that we killed men, and that we flogged them unnecessarily.

10,219. But, still, they are flogged?—Yes, I have ordered men myself to be flogged under the greatest possible safeguards, and I have observed no evil results follow; but generally there is a good result.

10,220. Did you ever hear of a prisoner committing suicide from dread of a repetition of a flogging?—There may have been such cases; I have no personal knowledge of it.

10,221. Such a thing might occur without the Commissioners knowing it. Supposing a man was sentenced to be flogged twice?—By the judge?

10,222. By anybody?—I should not sentence him myself to be flogged twice. I should not approve of it by anybody; I think that is inhuman. You mean at intervals?

10,223. Yes. Did you ever hear of four men being sentenced to be flogged, and one of them, after his first flogging, committed suicide?—Yes, I believe I have heard of that case.

10,224. Did you see the evidence of an ex-prisoner that we had before us?—No, I have not had an opportunity of seeing any of the evidence.

10,225. Did you hear of four suicides in one year in Portland Prison?—No. That would be some time ago, would it not?

10,226. I am afraid I forget the year?—I know it was before my time. If it were in my time, of course I should know about it.

10,227. Do you consider it of great importance that your medical staff should be men who are conversant with mental diseases?—Yes, that is most important.

10,228. Can you say, of your own knowledge, whether any of them have had a special training in that respect?—No.

10,229. Do the Commissioners, before appointing a man as medical officer, inquire whether he has had any experience in mental disease?—No, they do not require that; but they do require a general medical and surgical qualification.

10,230. Do you know how much per year it costs to keep a prisoner on the average?—About 24*l.* in the local prisons, and 26*l.* in the convict prisons, I think.

Mr. E. J. Ruggles-Brise.

13 Dec. 1894.

10,231. If a prisoner is sent to a lunatic asylum, do you know how much the prison vote has to bear for him per annum?—No, but it is more than that, I think. I have seen the figures, but I cannot carry them in my head.

10,232. (Dr. Bridges.) Has your attention been much called to the question of lunacy as occurring in local prisons?—Yes; of course that is a question which is always, more or less, before us.

10,233. In your 17th report I observe that, excluding the large number of cases—I will not say that are remand cases—sent for special supervision, and taking only those cases that occurred a month, or more than a month, after the conviction of those which were not remand cases, 50 of such cases occurred in the year included in your last report?—Quite so.

10,234. Is not that number, out of a population of a little more than 10,000, a very much larger number than that which occurs in any class of the adult population as estimated by the Lunacy Commissioners?—That is large, no doubt; but can you compare the prison population with the adult population outside? Of course, there is no doubt that a great portion of the criminal population are morally imbecile or mentally weak.

10,235. You would say that a large proportion of the prison population was mentally weak?—I think that is so with the bulk of the recidivists. I think I should call it "moral imbecility." They are called "half-sharps."

10,236. So that the proportion of prisoners requiring some attention on the ground of mental weakness would be very large?—Yes, I think so, but it is difficult to discover. It is difficult to fix it. We frequently have men under observation in our prisons.

10,237. There would be a certain number of those recidivists placed under medical observation, and certain others who would escape the attention of the medical officer from not presenting any very marked symptoms?—Yes, I think so; I frequently have men before me when I go to a convict prison. A man puts his name to see a director once a month, and they frequently come to you and talk a great deal of rubbish, although the man may be a well-behaved man, and the governor will say to you: "He is a little wanting, you know."

10,238. How, in your opinion, would such a fact as that—I mean the fact of a very large proportion of the recidivists being more or less mentally unsound—bear upon the question of the separate confinement system; I do not mean of absolute isolation, but separate confinement?—I am not sure that I have not gone too far in saying that any large portion of prison recidivists are mentally weak. The percentage is great, no doubt; but I do not think the percentage is enough to affect the general question of separate confinement.

10,239. At any rate, you would be of opinion that, in the case of persons who were mentally, perhaps, not quite sound—I will not put it stronger than that—it might be desirable to modify the system of separate confinement?—Yes, certainly, to that extent. If he is a man of weak intellect, you must certainly modify the system so far as he is concerned.

10,240. And men with the seeds of mental disease in them?—Yes. You cannot apply the separate system to him.

10,241. He might perhaps, under the separate confinement system, be more likely to have those seeds germinate than if he were placed in association with other people?—I imagine that to be the case; but of course, that is more a medical question as to whether solititude does engender disease more than being in company with other people.

10,242. With regard to the larger prisons, I think you have already expressed the opinion that it would be very desirable that medical officers should have some training in lunacy?—I think we ought to make it a sine quâ non that they should have a certain amount of knowledge, not that they should be specialists, of course, because that would exclude a knowledge in the other branches; but I think it should be a sine quâ non that they should have some acquaintance with lunacy.

10,243. And in the larger prisons would you say that the medical staff is sufficient? For instance, take the strongest case of all, Holloway?—I look upon Holloway as a very peculiar prison, requiring very peculiar treatment. As I said before, if the medical officer there says he is not sufficiently furnished with assistants, he ought to have some more.

10,244. With regard to the inspection of prisons, I am not quite clear whether the medical inspector has for part of his ordinary duties to inspect the prisons systematically?—No, not systematically; but as a matter of fact to always inspect them. He has no routine to go through.

10,245. He goes in case of a special occasion?—Yes, and often at other times. If he is not fully engaged he will take a run round, but he has no periodical visitation.

10,246. Would there not be some advantage in a larger proportion of the class of inspectors being medical men, supposing the posts were all vacant now, and that you had to appoint a staff of four men?—I think a doctor would be rather thrown away if he were put to do purely inspectorial work. It is mostly disciplinary work; a great deal of it is disciplinary work. Though I should welcome any addition to the medical strength of the department, I do not think that it could be usefully employed in that way.

10,247. With regard to the question of exercise in the open air, we have been told by several witnesses that frequently, in fact generally, there is no exercise on Sundays?—I am afraid it is the case that there is no exercise on Sundays.

10,248. Is that from a deficiency in the staff?—Yes.

10,249. That you would wish to see, if possible, remedied?—Yes; you see the recent demands for Saturday half-holidays, and the privilege of the Sunday "off," really make it impossible for us to get our full staff there on Sunday.

10,250. With regard to labour for the short sentence prisoners, would it be possible in any of the prisons to employ some of them in digging work?—Yes, I should be very glad if it were possible. I have been personally looking a good deal into that question in my own district, and I find most of my prisons are situated in the towns, and in the densest parts of the towns. I think prisoners ought to go out into the fields, and all governors agree that digging in a garden is the very best form of labour for short sentence prisoners.

10,251. It would be, I suppose, for very idle people, rather a deterrent?—No, I am afraid it would not be that. They like it very much as it is now. In the few prisons where digging is done it is looked upon rather as a reward for good conduct.

10,252. Is not that rather work of the gardening sort?—Yes, it is not the severe agricultural labour like they have at Dartmoor. That is the severest work we have. They hate that, but gardening in the open air they like.

10,253. Yes, but hard digging work in the fields they would not like?—No, and, of course, we cannot get it, unless we attempt to reclaim land.

10,254. I think you spoke of the communication that took place in convict prisons, and I think you expressed the opinion that it was due to talking through the corrugated iron cells?—I am afraid it is so. I have had one or two cases of that sort brought to my notice lately.

10,255. Those cells are condemned?—Yes, lately they have been.

10,256. Have not they been condemned a very long time?—I think it was not until last year that the question arose. It is a big thing, and it will require a tremendous lot of new buildings at Dartmoor and Portland.

10,257. Is it to be done?—Yes, they are going to pull down the old cells altogether, I think.

10,258. When I was at Portland I noticed them?—At Portland it is more difficult, because we have not got the space to build on.

10,259. At Dartmoor, then, it is intended to do it, but at Portland it is delayed?—Yes, many difficult questions arose in connexion with getting the land to build on, because our Board has not power to hold land. That is one of our difficulties.

10,260. (Chairman.) Have the directors no power to hold land?—No, but the Commissioners have, under the Statute.

10,261. Not the directors?—No.

10,262. Then how do they manage about the land at Dartmoor?—We lease that; we under-lease from the Duchy of Cornwall. As a matter of fact, although we have no power to hold land under the Act, the Treasury Solicitor generally gets round it.

10,263. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You are speaking of Portland?—Yes, that is a great difficulty at the present moment; the land outside does not belong to us.

10,264. Who is the owner?—I do not know who it is; I do not know whether it is private property or not.

10,265. You cannot buy it?—No, it is one of the things which has caused delay in dealing with this question of the corrugated iron cells. However, they are doomed, and so far that is satisfactory.

10,266. When you start on a tour of your local prisons, do you do them all at once, or do you do them by degrees?—I generally do them by degrees.

10,267. How many prisons have you got?—18 local prisons and two convict prisons.

10,268. Do you ever communicate with the visiting justices that you are coming?—No, never.

10,269. Are they surprise visits?—No, I generally inform the governor. It is necessary that I should; because I want to see all the authorities, the chaplain, the medical officer, and others.

10,270. Evidently, you are desirous that the visiting justices should take a more active part than they do?—Yes; I look upon the alienation of local sympathies as a great fault of the Act of 1877.

10,271. Do you think if you invited the visiting justices to come on the date of your inspection that it would be as well?—Yes; I should like to meet them, and to make a point of giving them greater power.

10,272. Do you think it is possible for the visiting justices to replace the inspectors?—I do, very nearly; anyhow, I think the proportionate power of the visiting justices and the inspectors is quite inverse to what the intention of the Act was.

10,273. You think if they had the responsibility of inspectors, and felt themselves to be responsible, that they would do more than they do?—I have no doubt about it.

10,274. And, if they were invited to meet the Commissioners and sit with them as part of the body, to whom the inquiries as to what is conducive to prison discipline was referred, that would be an inducement to them?—Yes.

20,275. It would not require an Act of Parliament to do that?—No, it could be done easily.

10,276. With a little alteration of the regulations?—Yes. When the Act was passed the inspectors were high officers, with large salaries, and they overawed the visiting justices. There was a certain amount of irritation with them, and they did not like to be servants where they had been masters. There was a sort of anxiety that the rules would not be carried out unless it was done by our own men. The consequence is that the inspectors are gaining power and the visiting justices are lapsing. That is, I think, the history of the difficulty there.

10,277. Practically they think they have got nothing to do except to see that there is no abuse?—That is so.

10,278. And having no responsibility they do not trouble themselves about it?—No.

10,279. Do you think it would be practical to get that responsibility restored?—I am certain of it, from what I have seen. I am talking of my own district.

10,280. You think you have got abundance of prison room now?—Yes, except in a few centres where there has been congestion. I have had congestion at Birmingham and at Cardiff. Of course, in London the question is always with us.

10,281. Has it been noticed by the Commissioners that one of the principal reasons why the number is so much diminished is due to the shortening of sentences, rather than to the lessening of offences?—That is one of the accepted reasons.

10,282. So that if there was any change in the method of sentencing prisoners, probably you would get your prisons congested again directly?—Certainly, if we were to revert to long sentences again.

10,283. Therefore, great caution ought to be taken in closing prisons?—Yes.

10,284. Especially if they are destroyed; because they would not be available then?—Quite so.

10,285. Has your attention been drawn at all to figures showing that the number sentenced to imprisonment in 1857 was 102,000, and that in 1890 it was 142,000?—Yes, I am aware of that.

10,286. And consequently, if the sentences were as long and as severe as they used to be, the present prisons would be very largely crowded?—Certainly, unless they took a step in the direction of freeing our prisons from a large proportion of the cases which come there now; namely, those cases as to which during the last few years there has been an agitation in Parliament to get certain classes excluded from prison treatment. I mean such cases as those under the Highways Acts and Town Council Acts, which involve the imprisonment of men who are not really criminals.

10,287. That would require classification?—Yes.

10,288. You would have, then, to provide other places to put them in; but they would not be called prisoners?—I think prison is a doubtful expedient for the large number of people who are convicted in regard to social questions, such as the Education Acts, the Vaccination Acts, and so on.

10,289. They are sometimes fined?—They are always fined in the first instance; and then the poorer men come into prison on the second occasion. They are not really criminals; it is an enormous question, which requires consideration.

10,290. Do these returns distinguish that class which is not criminal?—No, and it is a defect. I believe they will be discriminated. It is a very important question. There is the Act by Mr. Channing of 1891, which dealt with this point. There was a debate upon it in the House of Commons.

10,291. So that you would rather look to that as a possible means of diminishing the number of prisoners?—I should; and also that should be so with our hopeless recidivists; all those men and women who are committed for more than 10 times. It is perfectly appalling.

10,292. Are you under the impression that that is increasing?—It is not decreasing.

10,293. There is more recidivism than there was?—It is not decreasing.

10,294. It remains about stationary?—Generally it is thought proof of a good prison system. The question is, whether you can get the first convictions diminished. We cannot help these hopeless cases. That is the general opinion, I think, in the Home Office.

10,295. (Chairman.) I rather understand that is not your opinion?—Yes, it is. It is also my opinion that it is a difficult question, and I hesitate to give an opinion about it.

10,296. Do you think that as much is being done as can be done to get hold of this habitual criminal class when they come into the prison?—I myself look upon the work of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society as the most effectual thing we have to cure recidivism, and I do not know whether that work is being adequately done at this moment, because the Prisoners' Aid Society do not attempt to deal with old offenders. They say in all their reports, "We do not "attempt to deal with recidivism; all our energies "are directed to first, second, and third convictions." The system practically leaves untouched the great bulk of old offenders, that is, men with more than four sentences. The late Lord Derby took a great interest in the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies. He laid down that it was the bounden duty of the Government to see to each man when he went out of prison, that each man's case was considered, and earnest steps taken to prevent his relapsing into crime. That is not done now. You would be perfectly horrified at Cardiff, where the prison is in the lowest part of the town, and these men go out together. There may be no effective aid society there. These men are discharged from the prison in gangs at 7.30. They have only got a few shillings gratuity in their pockets; 10*s.* is the maximum. They herd together; they tumble into the first public house they come to, and the next day, or the same evening, they are back again in prison. We must have a system upon which this work is conducted.

10,297. I rather understood you to say that you did not approve of the proposal of homes for discharged prisoners?—No. I should not like to have homes. I should like to have district committees formed in every town where there is a prison, both for males and for females, so that every case could be referred to them. There is one at Chelmsford.

10,298. Have you any experience of a Home which was started 15 years ago by the Salvation Army?—No; but the Governor of Birmingham is proposing to ask General Booth to take some of his cases on discharge. That is the only way it has come before me lately.

10,299. They take old offenders?—Yes, they would take anybody, I believe, at 4*l.* a head.

10,300. The evidence given to us the other day was, that to a certain extent, and to a considerable extent, their work was successful?—Yes, I have no doubt it is. I certainly encourage the governor at Birmingham to go on with it.

10,301. That is a home for discharged prisoners?—Are the discharged prisoners kept there? They are not necessarily discharged prisoners, are they?

10,302. They are all discharged prisoners, and mostly first offenders and long sentence men?—I was not aware of that. I thought a discharged prisoner would have his conviction lost sight of, and would start life again, and become an ordinary citizen.

10,303. No; they take all classes there. You say there is danger of contamination; but is there not a greater danger of the same kind of contamination, and also of other kinds of contamination, from the sudden discharge of this apparently hopeless prison element into association in Cardiff or wherever it may be?—If they are discharged into Cardiff they are not necessarily associated with their old prison companions. If two men are in prison together, and one of them gets dissipated in Cardiff, they might lose sight of each other.

10,304. Still, if they are bent on crime it is easy enough for them to pick up associates?—Of course it is.

10,305. Then, is it not dangerous from the point of view of contamination to turn that class of men out into association in a very low part of the town where they would naturally be able to find associates more easily. Is it not absolutely as dangerous as it would be to turn out people with a contagious disease into that locality?—Yes.

10,306. And, therefore, is not it absolutely necessary to think of the possibilities of a home as it is in a hospital?—Well, I have got the experience of a great many people who have had practical acquaintance against me. I have read a good deal about these men, not only here, but abroad; and, certainly, public opinion is opposed to that, on the ground that they do not repay the amount of money expended on them.

10,307. Assuming that those homes could be properly managed, and could be made successful, and could be found to reclaim a percentage of the hitherto habitual class of criminals, it would be a wise thing to encourage it?—Certainly, if you could get one per cent. of them.

10,308. And, upon its being proved that these men were well managed and doing good work, it might be even desirable to recommend that they should be given a certain amount of Government grant?—Certainly, anything in that direction is warmly to be supported and encouraged.

10,309. The question of temporary warders was raised, and a question was asked about trafficking. I should like to know whether, in your experience, you have found trafficking more general amongst those temporary warders than amongst the others?—No certainly not; as far as my experience goes it is six of one and half a dozen of the other.

10,310. You express yourself as dissatisfied with the results of the secular instruction of the prisoners. What prisoners are instructed?—Only those who are under a four months sentence, and of course that reduces them to a very small percentage.

10,311. It is not all classes of prisoners, but only the long sentence prisoners?—He gets books, and he can go into arithmetic or anything of that sort.

10,312. I see the extract from the Prisons Acts in the local prison rules says that provision shall be made in every prison for the instruction of prisoners in reading, writing, and arithmetic"?—Quite so.

10,313. Is it the rule that when a prisoner is ignorant of reading, writing, and arithmetic, he should be taught?—Yes, but not unless his sentence is over four months. That is the essence of the thing, and that makes it practically inoperative, because, only three per cent. of the prisoners' sentences are over three months now.

10,314. I rather think that evidence was given the other day by a witness to the effect that only prisoners were taught who could not read or write?—That is not true, it is largely left to the discretion of the chaplain, but the rule is that all prisoners of over four months should be allowed to receive instruction, if they should wish it.

10,315. Do you think there is danger in collecting them for tuition?—Boys under 16 would be taught in classes, and the absolutely illiterate also; but we do not often get a body of illiterates under the present system.

10,316. It would take more schoolmasters to teach them singly?—Yes.

10,317. Is there much danger with that class of prisoners?—No; the cellular teaching is approved by all chaplains.

10,318. I can understand that, given a sufficient number of schoolmasters?—Yes.

10,319. But, if you have not a sufficient number of schoolmasters, are not the advantages of collective teaching superior to the advantages of cellular teaching?—Certainly, I see no objection to teaching in classes.

10,320. I understand that you do not think there is much danger of association during the classes?—No, I do not; it would be association in a small degree. Of course, you would not have large classes; but, if we are going to associate our prisoners for labour purposes, surely we can associate them for educational purposes, also.

10,321. You said that the question of women's work in prison has been to a certain extent neglected?—That is my pious opinion. Since I have been on the Board, I have never heard it suggested, and I have seen no papers where it has been raised.

10,322. Do you think that the question of male prisoners' work has been sufficiently considered?—No, I do not think sufficient prominence has been given to it.

10,323. Who is responsible for the supervising of the general prison labour throughout the country?—We are—the Commissioners are.

10,324. Is any one official told off for that?—Of course, the store accountant is essentially the man who superintends that particular thing.

10,325. But evidence has been given before us which rather goes to show that sometimes it happens that work, which is excellently adapted for local prisons, has been taken away and given to convict prisons where the difficulty of getting work is not so great?—It is quite possible, I think; there should be sufficient supervision over the distribution of the work.

10,326. You think it could be further organised?—I do, most distinctly.

10,327. Do you think that punishments for minute infringement or neglect of rules are too often inflicted?—In local or in convict prisons do you mean?

10,328. In both?—No, I cannot say that I think so. I have no reason to think so.

10,329. There is a recent article which has been written by Mr. Davitt?—I have read that.

10,330. Of course, he is speaking about the convict prisons. He expresses a strong opinion about the worry and irritation consequent upon continual small punishments for breaches of rules which are sometimes accidental and very slight in their character?—Against that there is the remarkable fact of the enormous number of convicts who go through their sentence without being reported at all. That is quite remarkable, and it appeared in a report some years ago. At all events, it is an argument against that view.

10,331. There may be some danger in the cases of prisoners of irritable temperament who come into collision with the warders, and subsequently are frequently had up for small breaches of discipline?—Yes; and it is our duty as directors to guard against that sort of thing. If such a man came before me, I should talk to him.

10,332. Those cases are rather exceptional?—Yes; if I have been told that a man is not a bad prisoner, but an irritable man, I have always talked over the case with the governor, because that is part of my duty.

10,333. Have there been any complaints from representatives of the Nonconformists about a difficulty in getting access to prisoners of the same persuasion as themselves?—No, but I am very much surprised there has not been; I am not aware of any. By "Nonconformists," do you include the Salvation Army, for instance?

10,334. Well, I suppose they are Nonconformists?—I was rather applying the term "Nonconformists" in the usual acceptation of the word.

10,335. I would, speaking generally, include them in my term of "Nonconformists"?—Ministers and different spiritual agencies, in fact?

10,336. Yes?—Yes, there have been. We have had some difficulty lately in the matter.

10,337. Have the prisoners complained?—I am not aware that they have.

10,338. Have you any opinion upon the question of the size of prisons?—Yes, I am in favour of small prisons. I am opposed to large ones.

10,339. What is the limit you would assign?—Well, I think, 500 has been suggested by several people, but, I think, 500 is too many for one governor to be able to have really individual influence on each prisoner. Of course, the object of small prisons is, that each individual prisoner shall receive individual attention, but that is impossible really in a prison with more than 250.

10,340. Would you be inclined then to go back from the present system of large prisons in London and elsewhere?—I am afraid it is a necessity, especially in London, where you have so many to accommodate. It must be so in big towns.

10,341. You would appoint a deputy governor in what cases?—I think, with any prison of over 500, there is ample scope for a deputy governor.

10,342. Whether men or women prisoners?—Either.

10,343. Five hundred, all told?—Of course, if you do appoint deputy governors to a small charge like that (because it is a comparatively small charge under our present system) they must understand that they have got something more than purely mechanical functions to discharge, because the mechanical functions with regard to 500 in the local prison would not give the deputy governor much scope; in fact, it would hardly justify his appointment.

10,344. Are you in favour of appointing principal warders as chief warders in charge?—No, I do not think I am; in fact, I may say emphatically, I am not.

10,345. For what reason?—Well, I think that it rather emphasizes the purely disciplinary point; that is one reason why I am opposed to it. I think the governor has enormous duties to discharge in connexion with the reformation of prisoners; and those reformatory duties are strange to the chief warder. From the point of view of what we have been saying as to the advantages of co-operation on the part of the local justices, I think a chief warder in charge is a mistake. He ought to associate with the visiting justices on equal terms, and he ought to associate with them very closely.

10,346. Then the heads of prisons should be governors or deputy governors, you think?—Yes. I do not want to say that we should not appoint a chief warder to the office, but we should appoint him as governor. A man who is fit to take the position is fit to be called a governor. To have a man in uniform and in a lower position of life than the visiting justices and other prison officials is not conducive to discipline. I should like promotion in a very different way altogether. I should like it as they do it in Scotland. I think we might tentatively adopt the principle of having the clerical staff taken from the disciplinary staff. That is so in Scotland; they promote the disciplinary officer to the clerical staff. They call them "store warders," and they are bright, intelligent men, and make excellent clerks. They say that the ordinary warder in Scotland is a more intelligent man. But, as an Englishman, I am disposed to resist that idea, especially since the extension of education. That was true, no doubt, 40 years ago.

10,347. On the other hand, in England, would you propose to make the storekeepers and the clerical staff eligible for promotion in the general prison service?—Do you mean, would I make storekeepers eligible for promotion as governors?

10,348. Yes?—Yes, I think they have, perhaps, stronger claims than the disciplinary officers.

10,349. I think you said the warders in charge were generally taken from the convict prisons?—Not generally; but if there was a particularly good man in a convict prison, there is no reason why he should not be promoted to a local prison. There is no rule about it.

10,350. As a rule, are they taken from it?—No, it is exceptional.

10,351. Should you be in favour of retaining two prisons, or more, as training prisons for warders?—Yes. It has been adopted with great success in foreign countries, especially at Rome. I was reading of it the other day. It is a great success. They teach the warders in ambulance classes, and so on.

10,352. Generally, do you find that the general staff is adequate, I am speaking more particularly of warders, male and female?—Yes. As a general opinion I should say it is adequate. There are isolated cases where the peculiar construction of the prison may make an addition desirable. There are many such cases.

10,353. The female warders are now of the same relative strength as the male warders?—Yes.

10,354. Is not it the fact that female prisoners require rather closer and more concentrated attention individually?—Certainly, no doubt, where they are congregated in large prisons. I do think our female staff in small prisons can be recruited in the same way. For instance, I can take you where you can see two female warders sitting with folded hands and asking for work to do.

Mr. E. J. Ruggles-Brise.

10,355. But, taking a place like Strangeways, do you think possibly the staff might be strengthened?—I do; but you know what the difficulties are. Where those special circumstances exist, of course we who have practically to do with prisons know that the conditions are peculiar, and we ask for an increase of staff, and often do not get it. We are bound hand and foot by the regulations.

10,356. Have you any views to express as to the regulations of the inspectors, and their duties?—I think their work should be largely done by the visiting committees of local justices, and I think monthly inspections have become quite perfunctory, and are not necessary. But I should always have two or three inspectors to send here, there, and everywhere. Local inquiries are necessary in regard to cases of trafficking or drunkenness, or anything of that sort, and the inspectors should be always available.

10,357. Do you think they should report to the Commissioners, but not to the Secretary of State?—I do not think the latter is a possible plan. You must either revert to the old plan, and make the men higher than the Commissioners to communicate directly with the Secretary of State, or if you appoint the same class of man, and he is our subordinate, it is impossible that our subordinate can report to the Secretary of State over our heads. I do not think the Commissioners could logically exist if that were done.

10,358. Do the inspectors come regularly to the Home Office?—They have no room in the Home Office; they have no clerical duty. As a matter of fact, Captain Wilson, my inspector, always comes and sees me on his return, and when he is in London, he comes every day.

10,359. The inspectors, I understand, live in their own private houses?—Yes. They have got their own districts.

10,360. And they can inspect at their own times and seasons?—Yes, at their own times and seasons.

10,361. Would it be better to have a certain proportion of the Home Office staff employed in that way, and send them wherever and whenever it is necessary?—How do you mean, the Home Office staff?

10,362. I mean that they should be regular officials in the department doing other prison work?—Yes, I think that would be a feasible plan. I do not think this present system of inspectors' districts works very well. It is fixed for 3, 5, or 10 years, but it is practically fixed for ever. I should like to have two or three inspectors, and at the beginning of each month I would tell him what prison he is to go to, so that you would get a constant change of blood, and the thing would not become mechanical in the way it has otherwise a tendency to become.

10,363. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You would rather go down to see whether the visiting committee was working satisfactorily with the governor?—Yes.

10,364. In fact he would inspect the whole of the prison system which would be bestowed upon the governor and the visiting committee?—Yes.

10,365. That is the change you would suggest?—Yes.

10,366. (Chairman.) I think I had better read out the actual answer of the Home Secretary on July 17, 1893, to which Mr. O'Connor referred. It was this: "In order to answer this question it is necessary to "know the precise meaning to be attached to the "word 'metropolis'"; even then it would take a long "time to go through all the details of prisoners, "approaching 4,000, who were in custody on June "1st, to ascertain how many were committed within "the boundary intended within the word 'metropolis,' "and how many from outside it. As there are 4,392 "certified cells, besides others in the infirmaries, and "associated accommodation for special cases besides, "there is obviously ample accommodation for the "prisoners of the metropolis, however it may be "defined." It is clear that the answer has been misunderstood. The Home Secretary's words, "however it may be defined" relate not to "accommodation" but to "metropolis."

10,367. (Mr. O'Connor.) You said what I could not quite catch, but which interested me a good deal; the prisoners cannot be educated in less than three or four months?—They are not liable to receive instruction under the scheme of 1885, which was made with the assistance of the Committee of the Education Department. They made out a scheme for the instruction of prisoners, and that says that "all prisoners, "except juveniles, whose sentences do not fall below "four months, will, on reception, be examined by the "chaplain"; so that it excludes from consideration all those who are sentenced to less than four months.

10,368. Which is the great mass of the prisoners?—Yes.

10,369. A schoolmaster, if he is only a schoolmaster, is employed for eight hours, of which six are to be teaching hours according to the rules?—Yes. You are talking now of convict prisons; because there are different classes in the two prisons.

10,370. I think that is the rule for the local prisons too. But at any rate warders are employed in schools?—They are in the local prisons.

10,371. And in that case, besides the teaching for the six hours, they are employed in other duties, covering eight hours altogether, and then they have two hours besides?—Yes, it is so.

10,372. So that they have two hours work as warders more than the schoolmaster proper has, and they do not get schoolmaster's pay?—You mean the schoolmaster in the convict service is a specially selected officer.

10,373. I mean a schoolmaster warder has more work to do?—Yes, he is worse paid than in the convict prison, and he is appointed on a different system.

10,374. I should like to ask you one question with regard to your estimates and your staff. You estimate for a considerable number of officers of different grades, and you do not have those officers of the grades, but you have men waiting for promotion in great numbers who are not promoted?—That is so.

10,375. We will take the case of Birmingham, where you estimate for 13 warders and 20 assistant warders. As a fact, you have 21 assistant warders, that is over your establishment number, but you have only eight warders, and you have five vacancies in your warder staff, but you do not promote any men?—Yes, I know these estimates are very misleading.

10,376. But you get the money for them?—Yes.

10,377. And you do not give the men the pay?—No, the number of men would be regulated by the population; there are a different set of rules as to that.

10,378. But the House of Commons gives you money for 19 warders in Holloway, and you have only 13?—Yes.

10,379. There are six vacancies?—Yes.

10,380. Whereas the establishment of your assistant warders is exceeded?—Yes. That gives rise to a great deal of discontent.

10,381. Now you have warders of 16 years' service and no promotion?—Yes, that is so.

10,382. So again in Pentonville, you have an establishment of 28 warders, as appears by the estimates, but you have only 23 actually receiving pay?—I must tell you that as a Commissioner, under the system, I have no voice in the preparation of that estimate.

10,383. Who is it done by?—The chairman of the board is also termed the accounting officer, and he himself prepares the estimates, but I think this incongruity between the estimate and the actua practice gives rise to a good deal of discontent.

10,384. As long as you understand that point, I am satisfied with what I was trying to bring out?—Yes, I quite understand it.

The proceedings were adjourned for a short time.

10,385. (Chairman.) Have you any statement you would like to make on any point to the Committee?—

Mr. E. J. Ruggles-Brise. 13 Dec. 1894.

I have gone through all I wanted to say except one or two things which I have hardly touched upon. One was the question of the amalgamation of the two systems; that is a question that is quite worthy of consideration, I think. Of course, I have no definite views on the subject now. I mean the consolidation of the convict and local prisons was touched on by the Kimberley Commission, and they were in favour of a man for three years being kept for that three years in the local prisons. We have not altered our convict system since 1850, when we could not continue to send out our transportation cases. Since then we have altered our penal system, and penal servitude may now mean where they serve only two years and three months. I think it is just as well to consider whether, for a certain class of convicts, you should keep them in the local prisons the whole time, provided that you are going to apply the system of remission in local prisons as you would in the convict prisons.

10,386. What is the main argument for amalgamation?—That penal servitude does not apply to the ordinary conditions of sentence on the part of many criminals who go to convict prisons. It would free our convict prisons to a certain degree. It has been in my mind that it might be well to have certain establishments set apart for hopeless recidivists, and that there are, for instance, men who might be sent to, say, Dartmoor for indeterminate sentences. Anybody who has to deal with these question must be struck with this, that many prisoners are in a hopeless state, and some remedy may be found for it. I have nothing more to offer than mere bare suggestions on this question; but they are great questions, and I feel that the day has come when they ought to be taken in hand.

10,387. The question is rather outside our reference, except so far as it really bears upon the question of classification?—Yes, quite so.

10,388. Was it gone into at considerable length by the Commission?—No, quite parenthetically; it had hardly arisen then. You see we had not three years sentences then, but the system of keeping a man for two years in a local prison and then going to all the trouble and expense of sending a convict under a three years' sentence, after nine months in a local prison, to a convict prison is anomalous.

10,389. Assuming the amalgamation is not taken in hand, are you against sending a convict for nine months to a local prison first?—I see no great advantage in it.

10,390. Except on the ground of economy?—I do not know that it is so, even on economical grounds.

10,391. But it would be an expense to send single convicts?—Yes, on that ground it is true it saves the isolated conveyance of convicts.

10,392. But excepting that, you see no advantage whatever?—There is no great advantage.

10,393. Do you see any advantage?—I see an advantage in this way, that you could make inquiries whether they were fit for the star class while they were in the local prisons.

10,394. (Sir A. West.) A much shorter time than nine months would be ample for that?—Yes, three months would.

10,395. (Chairman.) Are those convicts sent in large bodies, say from Knutsford?—Not from Knutsford in large bodies, but they are from Wormwood Scrubs.

10,396. How many would be sent together from Knutsford?—I cannot say; there might be 6, 8, 10, 12, or 20. There is just one more thing which I was going to say something about, that was the idea of extending (with a view to the classification of prisoners) the first-class misdemeanants. As you know, there has been a considerable agitation in favour of extending the rules for treating people as first-class misdemeanants, and it is held that a large number of people who are not ordinarily criminal should be treated under those rules. The Secretary of State being questioned on the law by Mr. Atherley Jones, alleged that he had no power to alter the rules for the treatment of convicted prisoners, and it was no use his interfering with vaccination cases, because under the rules he had no power to make classification once they were convicted prisoners. I think he said also that if you decide a person is to be a first-class misdemeanant, the indulgence is too great. We want to lessen the privileges and comforts of first-class misdemeanants, and we want to bring a larger class under it.

10,397. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Do you say that with regard to the treatment of the debtors?—I am quite opposed to the present system with debtors. I think it is bad for the discipline of the prison. You see them loafing about in their ordinary clothes, and also frequently there are small children come to the prison gate with jugs of ale for them. It is most destructive of discipline; they ought to be made to work. It is only the dishonest debtor who goes to prison now. There, again, you may classify a few people who will not pay rates, but, as a rule, it is the dishonest debtor and the ne'er-do-well who go to prison, and you should make them work.

10,398. You would deprive them of the privilege of having food from outside?—Yes; I think that a man who, under any circumstances, gets into prison should have the prison food. You must get rid of that anomaly.

10,399. (Chairman.) Would you concentrate them in particular prisons?—It is a great expense. The administrative difficulty of concentrating is, under the Secretary of State's ruling, that you must not take people away from their relatives. It cannot apply to all convicted prisoners, because I cannot send a man from London to Birmingham or Stafford, because they will say the next day, "Send me back to Stafford, so that I may see my wife."

10,400. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) When did the Home Secretary give that ruling?—It was Mr. Secretary Cross; it is not a rule on paper.

10,401. Is that one of the difficulties of removing three months' prisoners from Newcastle to somewhere else?—If they petition to be re-transferred, we have to give way to them; and, as far as debtors are concerned, that applies with more force, because they are entitled to more visits.

10,402. (Chairman.) Then there is the case of the unconvicted prisoners, are you satisfied with that?—Well, I have been told by one of my prison doctors that after being on No. 3 diet, which is the unconvicted diet, for a month or three weeks, they go on after conviction and get No. 1 diet, and he says that he has observed evils arising from that.

10,403. In the case of unconvicted prisoners, if they happen to have money, they can get better treatment?—That is true.

10,404. If they have not any money they are under the ordinary rules, and prison food is provided for them?—Yes.

10,405. That gives an advantage to the man with the money?—Undoubtedly.

10,406. It is a wrong principle?—Yes.

10,407. It acts unequally between the man who is well off and the poor man?—There is no doubt about it in those particulars.

10,408. (Mr. O'Connor.) But any one of those men may be a perfectly innocent man?—Quite so, and he presumably is.

10,409. (Sir A. West.) Do you know what the proportion is of men who are sent to gaol, and on trial, are acquitted?—I cannot give you that.

10,410. I am told it is about 25 per cent.?—(Secretary.) It can be obtained.

10,411. (Mr. O'Connor.) But the diet of an unconvicted prisoner is not so good as the diet of a convicted prisoner?—Yes, he gets No. 3 (b), and that is a good deal better than the first class for convicted prisoners.

10,412. We had it in evidence from more than one that the dietary of a man under remand was even worse than the diet he afterwards got if he was convicted. An ex-prisoner told us he suffered from the dietary when he was only under charge?—The diet of a man under sentence of simple imprisonment is worse than that of a man who is under hard labour.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. R. S. Mitford.

Mr. Robert Sidney Mitford called and examined.

10,415. (Chairman.) You are one of the Commissioners of Prisons?—Yes, I was appointed a Commissioner of local prisons in 1882, and a director of convict prisons in 1892.

10,414. Were you in the prison service before that?—No. I had had 14 years previous service in the Home Office, chiefly as private secretary to sucuessive Secretaries of State.

10,415. It has been brought to the notice of the Committee in connection with the Wormwood Scrubs outbreak of 1891 that there was a certain series of sentences passed on a prisoner "H. E." On the 19th December the visiting justices sentenced him to 10 days No. 2 punishment diet in a punishment cell, to commence at the end of the present punishment; that was a sentence of 14 days. Then 42 days punishment cell on No. 3 diet, crank labour, and to be treated as a prison breaker?—Yes, that was so.

10,416. Under what authority was that sentence passed?—Part of the sentence, I must tell you, was illegal, that is to say, the 42 days in the punishment cell was illegal.

10,417. To begin with, was the 10 days upon the 14 days illegal?—No, that was legal.

10,418. The 14 days had not expired?—The 14 days had not expired, but there were two separate sentences for two separate offences.

10,419. Then may visiting justices for different offences sentence to an indeterminate length of time in a punishment cell?—No, clearly not; 14 days is the limit in a punishment cell.

10,420. For any one offence?—For any one offence. That he got on the 11th December 1891. That was the previous sentence—14 days in a punishment cell on No. 1 punishment diet. The second sentence, which was for a distinct offence, was 10 days in a punishment cell on No. 2 diet.

10,421. How long under those sentences would "H. E." have been in a punishment cell?—He would be 24 days in a punishment cell, but not on No. 1 diet.

10,422. How long would he have been on No. 1 diet?—For 14 days during the first sentence, but he would not get 14 consecutive days on No. 1 diet. He would not get the same diet every day. There is an interval of 3 days No. 1 followed by 3 days No. 2, or whatever the diet may be. It is a stirabout diet, and then it has to be followed again by 3 days No. 1. They go alternately.

10,423. So that the No. 1 diet should not run for more than 3 days together?—Yes, not more than that at a time.

10,424. But it would be 24 days in the punishment cell consecutively?—Yes.

10,425. But the Act provides that visiting justices should not give more than 14 days?—For one offence, but there were two distinct offences.

10,426. Should not you say that the intention of the Act was to provide that the severity of the punishment should be limited by the 14 days, and that it was not intended that there should be other sentences added on for other offences which would make a punishment run to a longer time?—Possibly; but it has always been considered that for distinct offences he might remain in the same cells, but he did not remain on the same diet.

10,427. Apart from the particular point I raised, according to the interpretation of the Act of 1877 that sentence was legal?—Yes.

10,428. Then we will come to the 42 days. That sentence was given on December the 19th?—It was.

10,429. When was "H. E." moved to Wandsworth?—On the 28th of December.

10,430. When he got to Wandsworth was he put into a punishment cell?—Yes, certainly.

10,431. How long did he stay there?—Perhaps you will allow me to read a statement to make it plain to you.

10,432. (Mr. O'Connor.) Was the first sentence at an end by the 25th of December?—Yes, that expired on the 25th. At Wormwood Scrubs he had done two days of the second sentence. The prisoner "H. E." was sentenced on the 11th December 1891 by the visiting committee to 14 days in a punishment cell on No. 1 punishment diet. On the 19th December 1891 he was again sentenced by the visiting committee to 10 days in a punishment cell on No. 2 punishment diet, to commence at the end of the first sentence, and to 42 days in a punishment cell on No. 3 diet at crank labour, and to be treated as a prison breaker. The first sentence would expire on the 25th of December, and the fresh sentence would begin. They were two distinct sentences. The prisoner was removed to Wandsworth on the 28th December, so that he did but two days of his second sentence at Wormwood Scrubs. On the 28th of December, the day he was received at Wandsworth, the governor of that prison referred to the Prison Commissioners as to the legality of 42 days in a punishment cell.

10,433. That was on the very day he got to Wandsworth?—Yes, it was on that very day. The Commissioner replied, "You must act upon the "Statute. The term of 14 days in a punishment cell "cannot be exceeded. The remainder of the term "ordered, if any, should be passed in an ordinary "or separate cell," and the Commissioner thereby told the governor not to carry out what was not legal, and had been awarded, evidently, in error.

10,434. (Chairman.) Was that decision conveyed to the visiting justices who had inflicted the sentence?—No, I believe not.

10,435. Were they left in the same state of ignorance as they seem to have been in when they inflicted it?—As far as I know, but I was not the Commissioner who dealt with that particular case, and I was not dealing with that prisoner at that time.

10,436. Who would have been present when that sentence was inflicted?—No doubt the governor or the deputy governor, or whoever was in charge.

10,437. But the governor must have known that that sentence was illegal?—It is possible, but still he would not, necessarily. I mean he had no control over the visiting committee. If he saw it he might speak to one of them and point it out.

10,438. But the Act is so framed in limiting that kind of punishment to 14 days that his sentence of 42 days surely must have struck upon any accustomed ear as very strange indeed, when the sentence was being pronounced by the visiting justices?—I do not think the practice is for them always to announce it. The sentences are written down. I am not sure that the justices always announce the sentence to the prisoner, but I am unable to speak positively as to the practice.

10,439. Then it would look very strange surely when you saw it on paper?—Yes, certainly; if the governor had noticed it he would probably have referred it, as the governor of Wandsworth did, direct to the Commissioners, for instructions.

10,440. Do you imagine that such a thing has ever been done before, as to inflict an illegal punishment of that kind?—I am not aware of it; I have never heard of such a case. I believe, as a rule, the magistrates know their own powers pretty well.

10,441. Who were the visiting justices on that occasion?—That I am unable to say.

10,442. Perhaps you could find out their names for the Committee?—Yes, I will do so.

10,443. You think that the particular sentence was accidental?—I think it was purely accidental—the insertion of "42 days' punishment cell" must have been purely accidental, I think.

10,444. Of course, the condition of Wormwood Scrubs prison at the time was in a sense unsettled, in the way that the then governor had only just come in, and, in fact, at the end of the month he was made inspector of prisons, so that things were in a state of transition?—That was so.

10,445. And there was some serious question arising as to the discipline of the prison?—Yes.

10,446. And it is conceivable that that may have been the cause of that particular sentence escaping his eye?—It is possible.

10,447. Do you think that this power of inflicting punishment and giving so many days in a punishment cell for different offences without any limit to the time is satisfactory?—The time is limited.

10,448. For the particular offences?—Repeated offences, do you mean?

10,449. But if it is on different occasions, I understand from you he can, under the Act, be given 28 days, or it might be 42 days if there were three offences proved?—Yes, it might be; but then he does not get No. 1 punishment diet. The punishment is hardly so severe as it looks, because he can only have No. 1 punishment diet for 14 days. The 42 days carried No. 2 diet, and if it were a longer period it would carry No. 3 diet.

10,450. But still these cells are partially darkened?—They are partially darkened, but very little.

10,451. And no books are allowed to the prisoner?—No books are allowed in a punishment cell.

10,452. It is a very severe punishment; there is no work?—There is no work in a punishment cell.

10,453. It means that it is a very severe punishment?—Well, it is severe because it is low diet, and he is kept by himself.

10,454. Does a prisoner in a punishment cell get any exercise?—Yes, he would not be kept all that time without exercise. He would get his exercise. We should not keep him in a punishment cell for 42 days without exercise. The medical officer would not allow it.

10,455. In 14 days would he get his exercise?—Certainly, I believe so.

10,456. Still, it seems contemplated by the wording of the Act that the sentence is of such a severe nature that it must be limited to 14 days?—Yes, no doubt, on account of the low diet.

10,457. Do you think it is advisable that a prisoner, even a man who commits serious offences against prison discipline, should be liable to cumulative punishment and long detention in a punishment cell with the penalties which such a cell entails?—Well, I think you must have some means of punishing him if he continues to repeat his offences. It is difficult to see what else can be done with him.

10,458. Do you approve of the No. 1 diet as a punishment?—As a punishment; yes.

10,459. Have you considered whether any fuller classification of prisoners ought to be made?—I think it is essential that juveniles should be kept apart from other prisoners.

10,460. Do you agree with the Committee's Report with regard to habitual inebriates?—Yes, I certainly think so. I think as a general principle that you should classify as much as you can.

10,461. Would you classify habitual criminals?—Yes, I would keep them apart, if we had the means to do it.

10,462. Do you think it would be an advantage to treat epileptic and weak-minded prisoners as a separate class to be put in a separate prison hospital?—Certainly, if you have the means of doing it, in all cases it would be well to classify.

10,463. But at present you get in various prisons a few of those epileptics and obviously weak-minded prisoners who are kept together?—Yes.

10,464. Now, as a rule, the medical officers have not had any special training in lunacy cases, and although they are perfectly adequate for the ordinary discharge of their duties, they are not skilled in the special treatment of such cases?—They are not specialists in mental or lunacy cases.

10,465. Would it be advisable that such cases as require the treatment of a specialist should be concentrated where they could be under the best medical observation?—Yes, I think it would be a very good thing; I quite agree as to that.

10,466. Do you think that the prison staff is adequate for its duties?—Yes, I think it is; it has been recently increased, and I am bound to say that at present I think it is adequate.

10,467. Do you think the women warders are sufficiently numerous? Well, I have never heard any complaints from them about being overworked. I see that is mentioned in the schedule, but I have no reason to believe that they are overworked; I have never heard of it

10,468. Would you say that as women prisoners require more special observation and more independent treatment, that that is rather an argument for giving a larger proportion of strength to the women warders than to the men?—I am not sure that that would hold good everywhere.

10,469. I am speaking now of where there are a large number of female prisoners?—Yes, I have no doubt that a large number of female prisoners give more trouble to officers who are having to look after them than a large number of men, but I have never had reason to suppose that the staff was not adequate to perform its duties.

10,470. Should you approve of the proposal to establish training prisons for warders and discipline officers generally?—Yes, certainly; I think that it would be a very good thing if you had certain selected prisons throughout the country taking a certain group where you could have a reserve of officers and keep them in training, and fill up your appointments from those men as they came on.

10,471. Do you think that the present system of putting chief warders to be warders in charge is satisfactory?—No, I do not like the system; I think we have too many of them now.

10,472. Would you make them all governors or deputy governors?—The present chief warders, do you mean?

10,473. Yes, those who are in charge. Would you alter their classification?—I should not object to seeing them called fifth class governors, the lowest class governors, if they like it; but I would not appoint any more of them at present.

10,474. You think they are not adequate for the discharge of the duties?—It is not altogether that. Some are better than others. But, I think, at the head of a prison it is better to have a man of more education, especially when a chief warder has the doctor and the chaplain under his orders, which is rather an anomaly, I think. I should prefer to see prisons with a population of up to 50 made prisons for chief warders in charge, instead of up to 100.

10,475. In the case of convicts about to be discharged, do they have any special food?—No, I believe not.

10,476. They go on with their prison diet until the day of discharge?—Yes.

10,477. Would you think it was advisable to give them rather more food before discharge?—Well, that seems to me to be a medical question. If the prisoner before discharge is considered by the doctor to be needing any more to fit him for work, he would immediately order it. It is more a question which is in the doctor's hands.

Mr. R. S. Mitford.

13 Dec. 1894.

10,478. Does not the prisoner get into a more excitable state, and would not it be better, as a general principle, to feed him up before he goes out, to break the contrast which must take place in many cases?—I do not know that it would be; I do not think there is anything in that really. I never heard any complaints about it on the part of prisoners afterwards.

10,479. Do you think it would be dangerous to allow convicts to speak to each other for a certain time during the day?—I think it would have a very bad effect on discipline.

10,480. Supposing there was rather a careful classification, and that prisoners who were well behaved and a better class of prisoners, were allowed to speak for an hour, would there be any danger likely to arise from that?—I am afraid there would be. You could not trust them; it might lead to all sorts of trouble.

10,481. But they can speak, as a matter of fact?—They do speak, as a matter of fact.

10,482. Then does trouble arise from that?—They get reported for it sometimes; but there is no objection to a prisoner speaking to an officer about his work. It depends on what he says.

10,483. But a man who is in for 10 years is not according to the rules allowed to speak to anybody except to the prison officials, or when he receives a visitor?—Yes, that is so.

10,484. What danger would there be from allowing him under proper supervision, and after he has earned the privilege by good conduct, to talk as women convicts talk in convict prisons?—The danger of using filthy language and talking in the way that they do. I am afraid that does goes on.

10,485. But I am assuming that those prisoners would be well-conducted men who had earned the privilege by good conduct, and who would not therefore be likely to use filthy language, which would involve a loss of remission?—Well, I think it would be difficult to trust them. I believe that in the old days they used to talk, but that was stopped in consequence of the Report of the Royal Commission which Lord Kimberley presided over.

10,486. Then they were all allowed to talk promiscuously?—On Sundays.

10,487. But promiscuously?—Yes; I suppose it was so. Without being classified you mean?

10,488. What I had in my mind was, that after you had had these convicts under observation for a certain amount of time, the prison officials would come to know what kind of men they were, and they would also know how they had behaved, and an hour's conversation would be a premium on good behaviour?—Yes.

10,489. I want to know what mischief could arise. Surely if they were going to organise a conspiracy they could organise it without this open talk by means of communicating with each other while at work easy enough?—They might, certainly.

10,490. No further danger could arise, then, on that score. Would any other danger arise?—If you could trust your prisoners, I do not think there would be any harm in it, but I think it would be a dangerous experiment in the interest of the discipline of the prisons.

10,491. After all, is not the great object to humanize the prisoners and make them more like rational men?—Yes.

10,492. Is it likely that condemning them to silence is altogether a natural system, calculated to reform them?—Certainly it is a hard system; it is a serious punishment to a prisoner to be condemned to silence.

10,493. Is not it an unnatural existence?—It certainly is; but so is all prison life, I suppose, more or less.

10,494. It is a further unnatural condition in a necessarily unnatural life?—As a matter of fact they do speak, and they do talk, and they are not always punished for it. Many a man is cautioned if he is seen on the works talking to another prisoner, but he is not reported at once. He is constantly checked by the warder and he may be admonished by the governor.

10,495. Would the permission to talk help prison discipline by removing one of the most obvious incentives to breaking the rules?—I do not think it would unless you could absolutely trust a prisoner.

10,496. But I have been trying to ascertain what danger there would be. Assuming you could not trust the prisoners in a matter of honesty and so forth, I am trying to see what danger there would be in allowing them to talk, and even assuming they were not trustworthy, what mischief could arise?—They might make any nefarious arrangements which might lead to an outbreak, or anything of that kind, or to contamination.

10,497. But, as you say, they can hardly do that?—Not nearly to the same extent as if they were allowed to talk.

10,498. Then the men who were arranging an outbreak, or some sort of conspiracy against the authorities, would be the worst class of men, who would be known to the prison officials, and that class could be kept apart?—I think the difficulty now would be to classify them like that to carry it out.

10,499. However, you do not think that anything could be done?—I do not see my way to doing that at present, because I think further classification of convicts is difficult.

10,500. Now, with regard to Prisoners Aid Societies, do you see any objection to allowing a prisoner before discharge, both in local and in convict prisons, to have a list of all societies willing and able to help prisoners. Of course I mean bonâ fide societies, and permission given him to choose one?—I see no objection to that whatever.

10,501. And, further, that if he elects to be helped, or to ask for the assistance of any particular society, that he should see the accredited agent in prison before discharge?—Yes, I think he might do that.

10,502. You see no objection to that?—Certainly not.

10,503. Do you think that unconvicted prisoners are treated satisfactorily now?—I think they are; as far as we can do anything for them in prison, I think they are.

10,504. At the same time the poorer men, who cannot pay for any extra comforts, are in a much worse condition than the man who can pay?—Certainly in the matter of diet they would be.

10,505. But, as a matter of fact, they ought to be treated exactly equally?—I suppose they would be worse off outside in the same way. Probably in very many cases the diet they get inside the prison would be better than the diet they would get at home.

10,506. A poor man might be perfectly comfortable at home with his small and humble comforts, but not having money to buy them in prison he might be put to very considerable hardship while he was there?—His friends can send food into him while he was there. His wife or his friends can do that.

10,507. But it is possible he may have no friends?—Yes.

10,508. Does not the Act say that regard shall be had to his safe custody, and that due regard having been given to that, he shall be treated with as much consideration as possible?—Yes.

10,509. Is he treated with any more consideration, except a little diet, than the ordinary prisoners have?—He gets everything that he can under the prison rules.

10,510. Yes; I am rather wondering whether the prison rules are quite as they should be?—We are quite open to any improvement of them.

10,511. Is it your opinion that the treatment is sufficient and satisfactory for unconvicted prisoners, who may or may not be innocent?—That is a difficult matter to answer; because you must have regard to the different stations of life and the different circumstances of the different prisoners who come in.

10,512. Surely if you do that you must have regard to the different circumstances and stations of all prisoners?—In considering the treatment, when they first come in, they are all supposed to be innocent men.

10,513. Quite so?—But at present they have the power to buy food or to have it sent in for them by their friends. If they can do neither one nor the other they have to submit to taking the prison food.

10,514. I will take a case of a working man with 25*s.* a week, who is charged with crime and who is remanded. In the eye of the law that man is innocent, but he may be living away from home, and he may be earning no money at the time. He may have, and probably has, lost his earning capacity; he may have no resources and no possibility of buying anything. He is cut off from his tobacco, he is cut off from his beer, and he is cut off his meat to a large extent, and he is reduced practically to this prison diet?—Yes.

10,515. But a man who is of independent means can send out and buy anything he likes?—I should have no objection to seeing the diet improved in these cases.

10,516. But do you think that the present system is fair and equal?—Certainly it is. It cannot be equal exactly, of course.

10,517. As between a rich man and a poor man?—No, certainly not.

10,518. There are one or two questions I should like to ask arising out of the local prison code. How often is inquiry made upon oath in connexion with prison discipline?—In the local prisons, do you mean?

10,519. We will take either one or the other?—I do not quite understand your meaning.

10,520. What is the rule governing inquiries upon oath? When are inquiries held?—In inquiring into prison officials or prison offences?

10,521. Where prisoners are concerned, either when they charge a warder with improper conduct or when they are charged with a breach of discipline?—The visiting committees do that in local prisons. In the case of the convict prisons a director would do it, if the prisoner has committed a sufficiently serious offence to be put back and remanded for trial.

10,522. Then are all the directors' inquiries upon oath?—Certainly; the director has the full powers of a magistrate in the convict prisons, in the same way as the Commissioners would have in the local prisons.

10,523. Then all his inquiries are on oath?—All trials of prisoners for offences are certainly on oath.

10,524. And it is the same with the visiting justices?—Yes; they relieve us of trying prisoners in the local prisons.

10,525. Then are all the witnesses sworn?—Yes.

10,526. The prisoners would be sworn?—If necessary.

10,527. But in an inquiry upon oath when other prisoners are called, would not the prisoners be sworn?—The prisoner witnesses?

10,528. Yes?—Certainly, if the prisoner wished to call them as witnesses.

10,529. Is the prisoner himself sworn?—No; the warder witnesses are sworn. I have never yet had a case where a prisoner has called a prisoner as a witness when he has been brought up for a serious assault. I was appointed a director in 1892, and I have never yet had a case where a prisoner called a prisoner witness.

10,530. But supposing a prisoner makes a charge against a warder, and that offence is heard by the director, would that prisoner be sworn before making his statement?—Not necessarily; it would depend upon the director's discretion. He might be able to settle it without doing that, if it were a mere charge; but where a prisoner might be sworn is in cases of trial by the director for a serious offence. The governor would settle the other punishments.

10,531. Are all prisoners examined by the surgeon before discharge?—Yes, always before discharge.

10,532. Every prisoner?—Yes, every man is examined before discharge.

10,533. Have you ever found any difficulty in connexion with the religious instruction of the prison? Have you heard of any application from the representatives of different religious bodies claiming that they have a right of access to the prisons other than the Established Church or the Roman Catholic community?—I never heard of anyone claiming as of right to have free access to prisons.

10,534. Well, not as a right?—We often have applications from a certain minister not of the Established Church to visit a certain prisoner belonging to his persuasion, and in that case we should allow it.

10,535. But no representation has ever been made to you, or, as far as you know, to the other Commissioners, asking that access should be given to those representatives of religious bodies?—No, I have no recollection of it.

10,536. As a matter of fact all chaplains and assistant chaplains belong either to the Roman Catholic Church or to the Established Church?—Yes.

10,537. Are you satisfied with the present system of secular instruction?—I believe it works very well.

10,538. As regards the results, do you think they are satisfactory on the whole?—I think so; I have no reason to suppose that they are not.

10,539. Is it the fact that in most prisons the education is limited to the third standard?—I believe it is.

10,540. That is the general rule?—I believe it is, but I cannot speak positively.

10,541. With regard to prisoners who are sentenced to four months or less, would they be taught?—No.

10,542. Not at all?—Not under four months. My impression is that it is not under three months, but I can verify that.

10,543. But is that satisfactory?—No, I do not think it is altogether, but it was the result of a Committee which was appointed in the early days of the Commission to make recommendations on the subject of the education of prisoners, and I believe it was thought that less than that time really did very little good to uneducated prisoners; and therefore the limit was laid down as four months.

10,544. Are you in favour of teaching in classes, or do you prefer the cellular system?—I do not see any objection to teaching in classes, if there is proper supervision exercised by the schoolmaster.

10,545. Of course it saves time?—Well, it saves the visit from cell to cell. I daresay, in a cellular system, the prisoner gets more individual attention from the schoolmaster than he would in a class.

10,546. Do you think more might be done in the way of organising prison labour?—We should be very glad to obtain more labour, if we could get it.

10,547. Would it be an advantage to make a director or some official immediately responsible for the organisation and supervision of all the prison labour in the country?—We all do that now. Do you mean to concentrate the labour?

10,548. What I mean is to concentrate the labour according to requirements as between convict prisons and local prisons?—Yes, that we do now. We distribute the labour to the best of our ability.

10,549. But is it done satisfactorily?—No, I do not think it is altogether satisfactorily done; but one of our greatest difficulties is to get labour. We want to get labour.

10,550. But even with the labour at your disposal, is it divided up as economically and to the best advantage that it could be?—I think it is divided as well as we could possibly do it now, with the labour and materials we have, but labour in prisons is very apt to vary.

10,551. A case was brought to us the other day of the removal of coal sack making from Lewes Prison, and the transferrence of that industry to convict prisons, and it was pointed out that in convict prisons they have outdoor labour and plenty of labour, or at least much less difficulty than local prisons, in getting labour?—Yes.

10,552. And that since that was taken away it has been found very difficult to get something to take its place?—That is our chief difficulty; if one labour goes we cannot find a substitute.

Mr. R. S. Mitford.

13 Dec. 1894.

10,553. Why was it taken from the local prison where it was suitable, and sent to the convict prison where it was not?—I am not aware what the reason was in the particular case you mention, but it may be that the local prison was unable to complete them for delivery by the time they were wanted, and therefore they had to be sent away.

10,554. Do not you think it would be advisable to make a particular official responsible for the supervision of this work, rather than to leave it generally to the directors and Commissioners?—Yes, I think you might put it in the hands of one man very well, but I do not see that very much advantage would be gained by it, because it comes on all the Commissioners now.

10,555. What prisons do you visit generally? Which of them come into your work?—The local prisons I take are all those in the north of England; and for convict prisons, I am now taking Portland, Borstal, and Dover.

10,556. I think Mr. Ruggles-Brise told us that the board meetings were held once or twice a year; is that about the number?—I am afraid they are not held very often.

10,557. Then do you have your own special work?—Yes, we each take a district, and each take a certain number of convict prisons. If one of us is away, the other takes his work for him.

10,558. Then if you have any particular difficulty you refer it to the Chief Commissioner?—Certainly; we write a minute, and if we think it necessary to refer it to the chairman, we pass it on to him.

10,559. What are the occasions when board meetings are held?—Well, they have chiefly been held about appointments, recommendations for promotion, and new appointments, and then at the meetings anything else may be discussed that it may be thought needs discussion.

10,560. But general questions of prison administration are not considered, as a rule, at board meetings or collectively by the Commissioners and Directors?—Well, they may be, but they are not always necessarily discussed by the board.

10,561. (Sir Algernon West.) I should like to know a little more about the constitution and duties of your board. We have been told that in the letters of appointment your duties and position are identical with that of the chairman of the Commissioners?—Yes.

10,562. And that the chairman, for the sake of convenience, is appointed separately by the Secretary of State?—Yes.

10,563. But this board, practically, does not meet?—Not very often.

10,564. It is a casual meeting, there is no fixed time for it?—No, there is not.

10,565. May any of the Commissioners summon a board meeting?—Certainly. We may always ask for a board meeting at any time.

10,566. Do you always get it if you apply for a board?—I have never applied for a board.

10,567. You do not recollect any instance in which the Commissioners have said it is time to have a board?—No.

10,568. Would you tell the Committee who is responsible for the expenditure of the board?—The chairman, as accounting officer.

10,569. As accounting officer he does not consult his board as to expenditure?—No, that is a matter he is responsible for.

10,570. He has the sole responsibility?—Yes.

10,571. That is because it has fallen to him in practice. There is nothing specially laid down in his appointment or regulations, is there?—He is the accounting officer.

10,572. There is an accounting officer in each office, but he is not necessarily the man in authority. I think he must have all the experience of the other officers; but the accounting officer is not a high officer who says this or that shall be done?—No.

10,573. But in this case your chairman is not only a director and commissioner, but he is first accounting officer in all matters of expenditure?—Yes.

10,574. Supposing a new prison is built, do you consider your chairman is responsible for the policy of building another prison. Supposing another prison has to be built somewhere in London, would you be consulted first of all as to the necessity for that prison?—Not necessarily; but he probably would do so, because it would affect one of our districts.

10,575. For instance, was the building of Wormwood Scrubs, in place of other prisons, a matter which was discussed by the board?—That I am unable to say; I was not on the board when the building was being discussed.

10,576. Have you, since you have been on the board, had a new prison either built or enlarged?—No, we have never built a new prison.

10,577. Or shut up one?—Yes, we have shut up several.

10,578. Has that been a question which has been considered and discussed at the board?—Not necessarily at the board; but it might pass in conversation between the chairman and the commissioner of the district.

10,579. But I want to know whether the matter is discussed by the board, as a board, in those cases; for instance, in your time Liverpool has been shut up?—Kirkdale has.

10,580. Yes, Kirkdale has been shut up, and Strangeways has been opened?—No. Kirkdale was shut up, and Strangeways, and Liverpool, made to receive the prisoners.

10,581. Were Kirkdale and Strangeways both existing simultaneously?—Yes.

10,582. And Kirkdale was shut up?—Yes. There was also the Manchester City prison, which was closed.

10,583. Was that discussed at the board?—I had not that district; but I do not think it was.

10,584. That prison was in a state of collapse, I understand?—Yes; Manchester was in a state of collapse.

10,585. I think we have been told how prison appointments are made; what is the lowest class of official? Is it the prison clerk?—It is the assistant warder or messenger, or night watchman.

10,586. Will you tell the Committee how these appointments are made?—These are made entirely by our chairman and the staff department.

10,587. The staff department means, I understand, one specially allocated clerk?—Yes; he has clerks under him, and there are clerks specially attached to him.

10,588. Is he the head of a department, or is he a confidential clerk to the chairman?—He is clerk in charge of the staff department, and is selected to be private secretary for the chairman.

10,589. Are the two necessarily identical?—No.

10,590. I mean to say, the head of the staff department is not necessarily the man that is in the position of the present private clerk?—No.

10,591. What is his seniority in the office with reference to other officers in the Prisons Department?—He is one of the senior clerks.

10,592. Then I understand that whenever there is a governor appointed there is a board meeting for it?—Yes.

10,593. And also for a deputy governor?—Yes, for promotion as well.

10,594. But other appointments are made by the chairman and the staff department?—Yes.

10,595. Then do you ever work as a committee; does the chairman ever say, "I should like the commissioners to meet and discuss something"?—No.

10,596. He deals with you as if you had a distinct district, and were a distinct commissioner?—Yes, he does.

10,597. Will you just tell us about the duties of inspectors; are they dealt with in the same way? Do they report to the commissioners or to the board?—They would report to the commissioners.

10,598. And an inspector of the northern division would report to you ?—Yes.

10,599. And therefore the commissioner who looks after the southern division knows nothing whatever about the reports of the inspector of the northern division ?—No.

10,600. Having reported to you, do they go up to the chairman with remarks ?—No, we should settle it, and decide what was to be done, unless it were thought necessary or desirable to refer to him.

10,601. Is your secretary the secretary of the chairman or commissioners, separately or of the joint board ?—Of the joint board.

10,602. Would any communications received by him necessarily be sent up to the commissioners ?—Not necessarily, but probably. No doubt they would go to the commissioner who took the prison to which they referred.

10,603. Would any communication about prison discipline be made to the Secretary of State without its being made known to the board. I will give you an instance of what I mean. The other day we had the evidence of Mr. Wheatley, who told us that he had received a communication, which he handed in, telling him he must not go inside the prison; would that necessarily be passed to and be considered by your board before it was issued by the department ?—No, I saw it after it had been done.

10,604. That was written by the order of the Secretary of State in the Home Office ?—It was.

10,605. Of course it would be communicated ?—It was communicated.

10,606. After it was done ?—Yes.

10,607. That is to say it did not go up to the Secretary of State, and on that he gave his order ?—No, I saw the letter from the Secretary of State giving his decision about it, and it was circulated to the Commissioners after it was seen by the chairman, and dealt with.

10,608. In a case of that kind who would put the Secretary of State in motion, because of course he would not personally know that there was some abuse creeping in ?—The chairman is appointed for the purpose of being the medium of communication between the Commissioners and the Secretary of State.

10,609. Then I suppose that that order really emanated from your chairman, that it goes to the Secretary of State who, through his under secretary, deals with it, and that then it is sent to the Commissioners for their information ?—Yes, that would be it.

10,610. The inspector in the north would report to the Commissioners of the northern department, and the inspectors of the southern to the southern department, and so on. Supposing a Commissioner had a matter of grave importance to report, who would he report it to ?—If it were such an important matter that it must come before him, we should send it on to the chairman. The Commissioner would use a discretion whether he could deal with it himself, or whether he would consider it sufficiently serious to send it to the chairman.

10,611. Are you satisfied with the system of inspection as it exists ?—I think they might very often change districts.

10,612. Are they fully occupied ?—They have a great deal of travelling.

10,613. Do you think it at all degenerates into a routine inspection ?—I am not prepared to say it is a routine inspection, but I think where you have men travelling the same round for a considerable period, they are apt to see things done in the same way, whereas another inspector would, perhaps, see things in a different light.

10,614. In a visit to a prison have you found certain things, for instance, take the exercise drill for fire engines, have you found that kind of thing had not been done and should you call the inspector to task for it, or should you call the governor to task for it ?—If I were at the prison, I should speak to the governor about anything I saw there or I should enter a minute in the Commissioner's and inspector's note-book. I should also take the opportunity when I came back here of meeting the inspector and telling him what I had found.

10,615. Have you any observations to make about the system of appointing chaplains ?—I have no special views about their appointment.

10,616. I do not mean about their appointment but about their duties; do you think it is a good system for one chaplain to be appointed to one jail and to go on that round of duties ?—Well, it is rather difficult to answer that. I do not see what else you could do very well; in many prisons we have a chaplain who takes duty in the town, and who is not giving his whole time to the prison.

10,617. You have chaplains who also take duty in the town where they are located ?—Yes, we have many who are not appointed to give their whole time to the service.

10,618. That would be a better way of doing it, would it not ?—I do not know that. What I mean is that they are not appointed to give their whole time to the prison service.

10,619. Supposing classification took place and inebriates or habitual drunkards were separated from prisoners, and supposing the age of juveniles were raised, and supposing paralytic, epileptic, and half-witted prisoners were separated, I want you to give the committee what would be the balance of prisoners remaining ?—I will make a note of it and let you know.*

10,620. Would you be in favour of having any intermediate place of detention, which was half-way between a prison and absolute liberty for prisoners ?—Yes, I think it would be a very good thing.

10,621. You think it might be a practical thing ?—Yes, I think it might be carried out.

10,622. Then do you think it very desirable, with all these women prisoners and convicts throughout the country, that there should be a lady inspector to visit them ?—I do not know that that is a necessity.

10,623. Therefore you are not in favour of it, I may take it ?—I do not think it is required.

10,624. There is one thing I think you would like to alter in your original evidence. Prisoners in punishment cells do not have exercise unless it is specially ordered by the doctor ?—Yes, I am obliged to you for letting me make the correction.

10,625. (Mr. De Rutzen.) Do you and the other Commissioners draw up the report together, or how is the report drawn up ?—The report has always been drafted by the chairman.

10,626. And practically drawn up by the chairman and signed by the Commissioners ?—We have sometimes had a Board and considered the report.

10,627. Is there a Board always held to consider the report ?—Not always.

10,628. Was there one for the last one ?—No, there was not one for the last one.

10,629. I see that in the last report a good deal is said with reference to the practice of committing prisoners who were supposed to be lunatics to be kept under observation, as being a very bad practice and one which ought to be put a stop to; have you any suggestion to make as to how that could be got rid of in any way ?—I do not see how it can be avoided under present circumstances. These people are charged with an offence, and I do not think the magistrate would have any option but to remand them to prison.

10,630. Then, practically, you do not agree with the observation in the report upon that ?—May I ask what is the observation in the report ?

10,631. "The practice of committing persons who "are supposed to be lunatic to a prison, to be put "under observation, has been a great deal too common, "and, as we venture to think, unjustifiable. Would "you agree with that" ?—I agree that it is not desirable to commit lunatics to prison, but at presen they have nowhere else to send them because they are charged with offences against the law.

10,632. You do not go so far as to say that it is unjustifiable?—No.

10,633. With reference to the visiting committee, what is your view with reference to the duties which are deputed to the visiting committee? Do you think that they are performed, or that in many places the visiting committee do not attend at the prisons as they might do?—As a general rule, I believe, they do attend to their duties very well.

10,634. And attend regularly?—Yes.

10,635. One of the rules, with reference to the visiting committee, is that they shall co-operate with the Commissioners in promoting the efficiency of the service?—Yes.

10,636. Have you Commissioners ever given them a chance, so far as you know, to help them to promote the efficiency of the service by making appointments to meet them, and talk with them over the matter of prison administration. If you look at the rule it says that they "shall co-operate with the Commissioners " in promoting the efficiency of the service"?—Yes, I am aware that that is the rule.

10,637. Have you Commissioners ever taken any steps by letting them know what day you are coming, and so on?—Certainly, I have myself. When I was first appointed a Commissioner I used to make a point of writing to the visiting committee beforehand to let them know.

10,638. Do you meet them?—Not always.

10,639. But they always have a chance given them?—They have not had the chance of late years; the custom has rather dropped.

10,640. How has it come about that that custom which you thought was a good one has been dropped now?—Well, I found in some cases that on that particular day when I visited no one came at all, and therefore I dropped it.

10,641. Do you think that their usefulness would be increased by giving them any increased power?—In dealing with prisoners do you mean?

10,642. Yes, and the appointment of some of the lower staff of warders, or anything of that sort?—I think they might have certain powers in dealing with prisoners, such as giving extra letters, and visits to convicted prisoners. I think their powers might be increased in that way, but I am not prepared to say that it would be desirable that they should have a hand in the appointment of the subordinate staff. I think it would be better to keep it as it is. At the same time I should say that any member of the visiting committee can now recommend any candidate that comes for an appointment, and that we should be very glad to have any recommendations of that kind.

10,643. Do you find that they do so?—In some instances they have.

10,644. When they attend, do they attend with a clerk. They have to keep a book and minutes of what takes place?—They keep their own minute book.

10,645. Do they attend with a clerk?—Yes, they have their own clerk.

10,646. Do they always have a clerk with them?—I am not able to say what they do always; but they have a clerk always at their meetings. I think for their monthly meetings they always have a clerk. In many cases there are one or two magistrates who would visit once a week only.

10,647. (Mr. O'Connor.) I suppose in the case of that man "H.E." who was punished at Wormwood Scrubs, and whose sentence you say was, in part, illegal, that if it had not been for the governor of Wandsworth your Commissioners would not have known anything about it?—I cannot say.

10,648. If that man had remained at Wormwood Scrubs and had completed the punishment which he had already begun there, and which apparently was illegal, there would have been nothing to have brought it to your notice?—No, not necessarily; but I think that probably the deputy Governor would have discovered it in time.

10,649. As a matter of fact, he it was who brought the matter before the visiting committee?—Yes.

10,650. He it was who recorded officially his punishment?—No, he would not record it officially, the committee would write the sentence down.

10,651. We have seen his initials. At any rate it was brought to his notice; so far his initials indicate notice. Are you prepared to say that that is the only case of illegal punishment which has occurred since you have been a Commissioner? It is the only record which has been brought before us and it shows an illegal punishment?—I cannot say.

10,652. I should like to ascertain how the Commissioners protect themselves or their department against illegal punishments being inflicted?—First, we have the governor of the prison, and then we have the inspector, who visits the prison every month, and it is his duty to look over all the books and go through the punishment book; we have also the visiting Committee who, it they see anything wrong, would at once call attention to it. They would write either to us or to the Secretary of State.

10,653. But at any rate in this case your attention was not drawn to it until the man was removed to another prison?—That is so.

10,654. Were the Commissioners aware in the year 1891 and during the year 1891, that the state of Wormwood Scrubs prison was more or less unsatisfactory?—In the early part of 1891 I believe there was some little trouble with some of the local prisoners.

10,655. A little trouble more than usual?—At that time there was nothing in the nature of any combined outbreak.

10,656. Did the warders carry obedience in the exercise ground? Do you know that?—I am not able to say.

10,657. I learn from your report of 1890–91 that the convict prison at Wormwood Scrubs was then discontinued?—Yes.

10,658. And the convict staff was dispersed?—Yes.

10,659. You then brought in 37 men who had not been there before, apparently. Do you recollect how that body of 37 men was recruited?—I am afraid I am unable to say at this distance of time.

10,660. Can you say whether any or all of them were already in the service, or what proportion of those 37 men had been in the service before they went to Wormwood Scrubs?—I cannot speak offhand as to that.

10,661. Would you ascertain for me if it is true that 31 men out of the 37 were fresh men?—I will ascertain the fact.

10,662. Perhaps you could give us a statement of the services of the men who were in charge of that prison—of the disciplinary staff for the year 1891?—The whole of the subordinate staff for the year 1891.

10,663. Yes.—Yes, certainly.*

10,664. Do you know whether, taken as a body, the men were unexperienced?—No, I should say not. The older officers were, some of them, very good and experienced men.

10,665. But I am speaking of the 37. At any rate, you knew that there was something requiring special attention in that prison at that time?—No, our official attention was never called to anything of the sort. We heard this afterwards.

10,666. Were the Commissioners, as Commissioners, aware, during the course of the year 1891, that there was something in Wormwood Scrubs which was not altogether satisfactory?—No, that was not officially recorded.

10,667. Let me help your memory. There was a governor there, was there not?—Yes, Captain Kirkpatrick.

10,668. Yes, he was not in the best of health?—No, he was not.

10,669. He was absent?—His health broke down.

* See Appendix IX.

10,670. The staff was in part, at least, new?—That I am unable to say.

10,671. The prison was partly a convict prison and partly a local prison. It was a local prison, with convicts in one wing?—Yes.

10,672. Can you say why the Commissioners sent to so important a prison, under these circumstances, men who were not governors but only assistant governors?—The reason was that there was no one else to send. There was an emergency there in this way: the Governor (Captain Kirkpatrick) was taken ill on the 1st of August 1891, and went on sick leave, Colonel Garsia, the deputy governor taking charge. He, in turn, was obliged on the 18th of September of 1891, to have leave on medical grounds; on the 7th September Captain Kirkpatrick was reported to be unequal to remaining on duty, and the medical officer recommended an extension of his leave for four weeks, which was granted. Under those circumstances Captain Schuyler, who was the only deputy governor available, was ordered to take over the deputy charge of Wormwood Scrubs, in order to meet the emergency, which was not expected to last nearly as long as it did; and it was quite possible that Captain Kirkpatrick might have returned to duty at the end of his four weeks extension of leave.

10,673. My point is this, from an administrative point of view how was it that the Commissioners sent to that prison, which was so important a prison, and so serious a charge, a man who was below the rank of governor when there were many governors in the service?—For this reason, that in an emergency of that kind, if we wanted to send a man in charge at once we should naturally take the nearest available deputy governor; that is the ordinary thing to do in the service.

10,674. To place a prison like Wormwood Scrubs in charge of a deputy governor?—We knew of no reason why he should not be in charge of it for the time being.

10,675. (Chairman.) But is not it common practice, in the case of a prison like Liverpool and Strangeways, where there are 1,000 prisoners, that in the absence of the governor on sick leave, the prisoners are put in charge of a chief warder?—Yes, that is also quite an ordinary thing.

10,676. (Mr. O'Connor.) From an administrative point of view, however common it may be, do you think it is good or right?—I cannot see any objection to it when you have no reason to suppose he will not do it perfectly well. He had been in charge of Wandsworth for a period of three weeks.

10,677. Colonel Garsia had?—No, Captain Schuyler had.

10,678. It was Colonel Garsia who was only a deputy governor?—Yes.

10,679. You sent first one deputy governor and then another deputy governor, and you did not send a governor at all?—Captain Kirkpatrick was on sick leave.

10,680. You did not transfer a governor from a smaller prison to a larger?—No, we took the nearest available deputy governor. Colonel Garsia, I may tell you, was a man of long experience in the prison service.

10,681. A governor going away from a large prison may leave that prison in charge of a chief warder?—Yes, he may.

10,682. Have you seen the evidence which has already been taken before this Committee?—I have not seen the evidence latterly. I have seen the first part of it.

10,683. As an inspector or a commissioner, what would you say of a direction by the governor that a man shall not be allowed to go to chapel for the present, leaving it indefinite in that way. Do you consider that is regular?—I do not see why he should not. That means he would not go to chapel again until further orders.

10,684. You consider that is not irregular?—I see nothing irregular in that.

10,685. Does not the Act of Parliament say that a man shall go to chapel?—But he may punish him if he misbehaves himself in chapel by prohibiting him from going to chapel.

10,686. (Chairman.) In that case, if a governor stopped him from going to chapel it would not be so much as a punishment as it would be in order to put it out of the power of a particular prisoner to misbehave in chapel. Would not that be the object of the prohibition?—Yes, it might be, clearly, either or both, if he had reason to believe he would give trouble in chapel.

10,687. (Mr. O'Connor.) Still it is not a recognised form of punishment to stop a man from going to chapel?—Not for any other offence than that of misbehaving in chapel.

10,688. My point was with regard to the terms of the sentence. You do not consider there is anything irregular in giving an indefinite order that a man is to be kept from going to chapel. I can understand it if you say it is to last for seven days or a fortnight, but I do not understand an indefinite order?—No, I do not see any harm in that.

10,689. Have you had any occasion to consider the amount of punishment given in the English prisons, as a whole, compared with the punishment in Irish prisons?—No.

10,690. According to your reports, I notice that with an average daily convict population of 3,674, your punishments are 9,069; that is to say, there are nearly three punishments for every prisoner of daily average. In Ireland there are 485 of daily average population, and the total punishments come to 439, that is to say, in Ireland there is not one punishment per man of the average daily population, or to put it in another way, your punishments in England are three to every one of the corresponding population in the Irish prisons?—The punishment numbers show this, that the same prisoner might be brought up several times.

10,691. That would occur in both countries?—Yes.

10,692. We are taking it for a whole year, and the punishments in a year for the whole population in English prisons are three times as numerous as they are in Ireland. How do you account for that?—I am unable to say anything on that.

10,693. I suppose the medical officers exercise a good deal of control over the punishments inflicted on prisoners?—Nobody is punished by dietary punishment or other means unless the doctor has certified that he is fit to bear the punishment.

10,694. In many cases the doctor does certify that a man is not fit for this, that, or the other punishment?—Certainly.

10,695. There would be many cases of flogging but for the medical officer?—No; flogging is very seldom resorted to now.

10,696. Have you looked at the number of floggings in the English prisons lately. Do you know what the number is?—I have not specially looked at them.

10,697. What is the number in the English convict prisons for this last year. I fancy you will find it on page 16, at any rate you have flogging in convict prisons?—Yes, it is an authorised punishment, and is resorted to when necessary.

10,698. Of prison punishments you had 39, according to that page?—Yes, but that would include not necessarily all with the cat-of-nine-tails.

10,699. No, but I suppose 39 corporal punishments does mean 39 corporal punishments?—Yes.

10,700. Do you know how many there were in local prisons?—Ninety-eight.

10,701. Then that will be 39 in the convict prisons and 98 in the local prisons?—Yes.

10,702. Can you tell me how many there are in the Irish convict prisons?—There are none.

Mr. R. S. Mitford.

Dec. 1894.

10,703. Will you tell me how many there are in the Irish local prisons?—There are none.

10,704. Can you account for the fact that there are three times as many punishments altogether inflicted upon prisoners in England in proportion to the population as there are in Ireland; and that there is so much flogging in the English prisons, whereas there is none at all in Ireland?—I cannot account for it.

10,705. Can you account for the fact that the death-rate in English prisons is twice as great as it is in the Irish prisons, whether convict or local?—I have not the slightest idea why it is so.

10,706. A very large number of the punishments are inflicted for talking?—A great many of them are; I would not say a large proportion.

10,707. Do you think that an irritating and rather trying rule is calculated to provoke breaches of it?—No, I do not think so.

10,708. Do you think yourself that talking is so serious an offence as to deserve punishment?—I think the rules must be maintained when they exist.

10,709. When they exist, certainly, but the question is, should they exist?—I think it is very much in the interest of discipline that these present rules against talking should exist.

10,710. Can you tell me why it is that your staff, as shown by the estimates, is 2,022, and that your actual officers are only 1,794, showing a deficiency of 228?—That is because of what we call the chairman's 5 per cent. rule of officers, and that, according to our average population, we did not require to use all that were provided for in the estimates.

10,711. Would you tell me why you estimate year after year for this number when you do not want it?—It is necessary to have a certain number of officers provided for; we might have some increase in the population, and we only work up to our number.

10,712. Are you aware that in prisons, for which you estimate a certain number of warders and a certain number of assistant warders, your number of assistant warders is in excess, but your warders are not up to the estimates, and men are kept there who might be promoted, but who are not, but pay is taken for them as warders?—I am not aware of that.

10,713. Do you think that any of the men of the disciplinary staff or watchmen are overworked?—Night watchmen, do you mean?

10,714. Yes?—No, I have no reason to believe the warders are overworked now.

10,715. You have never had any complaints from night watchmen about overwork?—Recently I have had none at all.

10,716. Are you an inspecting Commissioner at Borstal?—Yes, I am visiting director of Borstal Prison.

10,717. Has any representations been made to you as to the work of the staff there?—Not to me, but I believe represention were made before I became a director.

10,718. How long ago was that?—Rather more than two years.

10,719. Would you think a man was rather overworked who never got relief for 15 successive years on Christmas Day?—Yes. I do not know how that can be. I am not aware of the case to which you allude.

10,720. I am referring to the case of Borstal Prison?—I mean I am not aware of the circumstances of the case to which you allude.

10,721. That is only one of a large number of cases that I have received from the staff; for instance, take the case of Holloway Prison; do you know anything about the circumstances of the staff there?—I have not any special information about the staff now.

10,722. You have not heard that the men complained that they had evening work every third day?—I have not heard complaints.

10,723. When these things are complained of how are they dealt with?—Such a complaint as that would come to the Commissioner who took that prison, and he would deal with it.

10,724. Would he deal with it with full authority?—Certainly.

10,725. He would not go to the chairman?—Not necessarily. If it were a large question affecting other prisons it would go to the chairman undoubtedly, but a single question would be dealt with by the Commissioner.

10,726. I want to ask you about the proportion of your convict population. As far as I can make out, you have got a total population of 4,771, and of them only 3,588 are in convict prisons, the balance of 1,183 being in local prisons; that is to say, almost exactly one-fourth of your convicts are in local prisons. Do you see any advantage in sending these men to local prisons rather than to convict prisons. Could not you have a convict prison for the first service for the first nine months?—I should prefer to see a separate prison for nine months men.

10,727. Then you would make that as a practical suggestion, that there should be a nine months convict prison for the first period?—Yes. At the same time I should like to say that, though I see no special objection to keeping these nine months men in the local prisons, I should prefer to see it separate.

10,728. It would simplify administration?—Yes.

10,729. That would be an advantage?—Yes.

10,730. And it would keep the convict population entirely apart from the local prisoners?—Yes.

10,731. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) With regard to the sufficiency of the diets of convicts, it has been stated to us here that the food, although sufficient for men who are working on indoor labour, is not sufficient for men on outdoor labour, that is to say, at Dartmoor, or on the quarries of Portland; have you any reason to think so?—I have no reason to think so. I have heard no complaint.

10,732. Do you know whether the men lose or gain in weight while they are there?—In many cases men gain; in other cases some lose weight.

10,733. There is no general rule about it?—I do not think there is a general rule about it. The doctor has full powers to make up anything to them if they want more diet.

10,734. From your experience you think that the diet is adequate both for the outdoor and the indoor labour?—I have every reason to suppose so; but that is a medical question which I am no authority upon.

10,735. Perhaps you might be able to form some idea if we were to have the weights of, say, 100 convicts on discharge?—I could get you that.

10,736. Will you do so, distinguishing those who were employed on outdoor labour and those who were employed on indoor labour?—Yes, I will get that for you, certainly.*

10,737. And you will distinguish which were on outdoor labour and those which were on indoor labour?—Yes, which men were working on the public works, and which men were engaged on sedentary work.

10,738. Such as clerks?—Yes, indoor labour.

10,739. Sedentary labour as distinguished from outdoor hard labour on the public works?—Yes.

10,740. Perhaps it will be safer to carry it to 200 cases?—It would give a better average, perhaps. Shall we take it for Dartmoor?

10,741. Take whichever you like, and take 100 for each?—Then I will take Dartmoor and Portland.

10,742. (Sir Algernon West.) May I ask to whom this offences and punishment book is referred. I see two initials all round in each case. Is it the governor?—Yes.

10,743. And the inspector?—Yes, he sees it.

10,744. He sees each punishment?—Yes, at each visit.

10,745. Does the Commissioner see to it?—Not unless he goes to the prison. The book is laid before the visiting committee also.

* See Appendix VII.

10,746. Which inspector signed "H. E.'s" punishment?—Those are the two members of the visiting committee.

10,747. In that special case it was the visiting committee?—Yes.

10,748. (Miss Orme.) Then the governor does not initial it when the visiting committee does?—No.

10,749. It is not initialled by the governor?—No.

10,750. (Sir Algernon West.) Is that Colonel Garsia?—Yes.

10,751. Is any summary made at any time of the offences? You cannot look at this for a moment without being struck by this, that wherever you look you find repeatedly "talking in chapel," "talking in chapel," and so it goes on, "talking in chapel," "talking in chapel," again and again?—The mass of these offences are for looking round, looking about in chapel, or talking in chapel.

10,752. I was struck by the enormous number of punishments for that. I should like to know whether there is any summary made of the offences?—We trust to the inspectors, and the Commissioners get monthly returns of officers and punishments.

10,753. Would not an inspector come and say if "there is one rule that is always being broken"?—He might say that.

10,754. And could not he devise some means of obviating it, or altering the rule?—Certainly, it is quite his duty to do that sort of thing, and we assume that he does it. That is what he is sent round for.

10,755 (Mr. O'Connor.) As Commissioners you take stock of the chaplain's service in the prisons and the amount of service that is given?—Yes.

10,756. As Commissioners, would you take any notice of a report by a chaplain, that by reason of overwork he had not been able to visit some prisoners in their cells from one year's end to the other?—Yes, if such a report came before the Commissioners they would deal with it.

10,757. Such a report has come before you, because you published it; it is in your own report. How did you deal with it?—I am not aware of the particular case to which you allude.

10,758. It has been dealt with already in the evidence; but at any rate it ought to have been dealt with by the Commissioners, and presumably it has been?—If there was any complaint of that kind it would be dealt with.

Mr. R. S. Mitford.
18 Dec. 1894.

10,759. Will you kindly let us know what the Commissioners did on receipt of your report, which haa been already referred to before us, and which I think, is printed in one of your appendices for this year?—Certainly, I will. I am not aware of the case to which you refer. I do not remember the prison; however, I will look it up.*

10,760. But it is the case in which the chaplain says that some prisoners were unvisited in their cells the whole year round, and the Commissioners themselves published it in their report. Have you any preference as between military men and civilians for governors, warders, chief warders, or assistant warders?—No, I have no particular views on the subject. Civilians are very often appointed as warders.

10,761. I notice that during the period you have been a Commissioner the governorships of Lewes, Bristol, Reading, Canterbury, Nottingham, and Leicester have all been filled, in every single instance, with military men, and that no civilians have been appointed governor in your time?—No, they have not.

10,762. (Chairman.) Under what authority do visiting justices inflict dietary punishment?—There is none. It has always been done by the visiting committees, but I believe that there is no legal authority for it.

10,763. Was it a tradition which was handed down from the old system?—That, no doubt, was it. There is nothing specially mentioned in the Act or the rules about inflicting a dietary punishment. Corporal punishment and the punishment cells they could give but there is no doubt the intention was that they should have the power of inflicting this punishment, because dealing with prisoners on reports, and the punishment of prisoners was one of the chief duties allotted to the Committee when the duties were taken over by the Government.

* See Appendix VIII.

The witness withdrew.

The proceedings were adjourned for a short time.

Sir Edmund F. Du Cane,* K.C.B., R.E., called and examined.

Sir E. F. Du Cane, K.C.B., R.E.

10,764. (Chairman.) Will you state to the members of the Committee the offices that you now hold?—I am Chairman of Commissioners of Prisons under the Act of 1877, Chairman of Directors, under the Act of 1850, and Surveyor General of Prisons. I am also Inspector General of Military Prisons, which has nothing whatever to do with the present inquiry.

10,765. Questions have arisen with regard to the present staff, perhaps you would give us your general views on the point?—It may serve to explain the present position in regard to the staff if I state what steps have been taken from time to time in fixing the numbers of the staff since the local prisons were transferred to Government. As the intention of the Act was that a great number of prisons should be abolished, there would be a consequent reduction in staff. Before that event took place, we sent the inspectors round to all prisons to pick out the least efficient members of the existing staff, so that the efficient only might be retained, and these were concentrated at the prisons which remained. At that time the total local prison population was upwards of 21,000. After we had actually taken over the prisons we deputed the inspectors who had considerable practical prison experience, to confer with the governors and to propose what staff should be fixed for each prison taking into consideration its population, its construction, and any peculiarities which affected this matter. Besides the permanent duties of the staff there are certain duties to be provided for which are quite temporary, such as watching condemned and specially sick prisoners, escorting, attending assizes or sessions, guarding prisoners employed out of their cells on buildings, &c., and these were provided for by temporary officers, either to perform these duties themselves or to replace those who did, so also were temporary vacancies from any cause, in the permanent staff. The prison population very soon began to fall, and this fall was continuous, year after year. The effect of this was that the staff became, in many cases, disproportioned to the numbers. It was not, however, reduced at once, but, on the occasion of any vacancy, consideration was given to whether it should be filled up, and if the reduction in numbers seemed to warrant it, the appointment of a successor to fill the vacancy was suspended. In the course of time an increase was made to the amount of leave given to officers, and the Saturday half-holiday and alternate Sunday off-duty had to be provided for. This led to an increase in the employment of temporary officers to replace those off duty. After a time a permanent addition was made to the staff of every prison, intended to cover leave, and all ordinary contingencies, but still providing for special duties, which are required only for a short period, by temporary officers. This is how the matter now stands. There is every reason to believe that the present numbers of the permanent staff are adequate for the present prison population and the employment of temporary officers is reduced to a minimum. But it must always be remembered that a very great deal depends on the capacity of the governor for organization and that a bad organizer will complain that his staff is insufficient, while a good organizer, with the same staff and a prison of the same size, will find it ample. What I have said relates generally as well to the female staff as the male; but we have not yet fixed a permanent female staff. This will be taken in hand; but the very small number of prisoners on the female side of many prisons makes it a somewhat difficult matter to arrange satisfactorily. There are several prisons in which at times there are no female prisoners, many in which the average is two, three, and four, and 19 under 10, so that if there were a permanent staff to meet all ordinary contingencies, as on the male side, the staff would in many cases exceed the number of prisoners.

* Owing to the state of his health, Sir E. Du Cane was unable to attend before the Committee. His evidence was therefore taken on Commission, by Mr. H. J. Gladstone and Sir John Dorington on the 13th December, and by Mr. H. J. Gladstone and Dr. Bridges on the 17th December.

10,766. Would you agree that female prisoners require rather more attention than male prisoners, and that their individual cases have to be more carefully watched?—Yes, I think very likely they do.

10,767. That would be an argument for considering the strength of the staff?—Yes.

10,768. Then, in the case of the women warders when they sleep in—in the prison day and night—that is not reckoned as hours of duty, is it?—Not to any warders, male or female, when they are sleeping in.

10,769. But I mean when they have to answer the call bells from the cells?—No, I do not think that is counted as a special hour of duty. I should say that answering a call bell is a very uncommon thing.

10,770. In the male prisons, I understand that duty is generally done by night watchmen?—Yes.

10,771. But in the case of the female warders it would have to be done by the warder in charge?—Yes, by the warder in the hall.

10,772. With regard to the medical staff, do not you think there would be some advantage in providing some special training in lunacy cases for medical officers whose duty would bring them into contact with a considerable number of cases, as, for instance, in Holloway?—I think if we had an officer who was not up to the mark in the matter, it might be desirable to put him into training, but I never have been told by our medical inspector, whom we rely upon in such matters, that there has been any defect in that way, either as regards their practice or their knowledge.

10,773. Then do you think that it might be desirable to concentrate in any one prison or more prisons, according to convenience, the weakminded and epileptic prisoners who are now, in comparatively small numbers, kept in prisons?—If there were any large number of them, I should say yes, and if they were in for a long time; but I do not believe that that is the case. I think, so far as regards epileptics, and so on, that there are a great number of prisoners who are below par mentally, all over the kingdom, and I think the thing to do with them, if their weakmindedness leads them to become criminal, is to put them under control permanently. That, perhaps, is more than public opinion would warrant, but still that is my idea of what it is the right thing to do.

10,774. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Unless a man is sufficiently weakminded to be unable to take care of himself you could hardly put him under control permanently?—I know it could not be done now, because they have to be certified as being lunatic, I am talking of what I consider would be for the public interest if you could do it; that is to say, if there is a man who is weakminded, and his weakmindedness takes the form of being an incorrigible criminal, I should be inclined to put him under control.

10,775. (Chairman.) You would agree as a general principle that provided the sentence was long enough to enable it to be done it would be desirable to concentrate those cases under a specialist?—Yes, I think it would.

10,776. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Do you understand that the number of your warders bears a certain percentage to the number of prisoners?—That is the basis on which it is done.

10,777. But you are not strictly restricted to that?—If we found for any reason, such, for instance, as the construction of a prison or anything else, that that does not provide a sufficient number, we should have to add to it.

10,778. At Holloway Prison, what is the standard?—That is a special prison. There are always so many men there who are going to the sessions, and that sort of thing, that I think it requires special consideration.

10,779. You think it ought to have a larger staff?—Yes.

10,780. Do you know whether it is more largely provided than other prisons are at the present time?)—I think it is. I cannot speak without refreshing my memory, but I believe that it has more in proportion for that reason; it used to have certainly.

10,781. What would you say with regard to the general disciplinary staff would also apply to the medical officers?—There is a question up about the medical officer at the present time, and we have applied to the Treasury for a certain addition. The Treasury very naturally and properly put some searching questions to know whether it is necessary or not, and those questions have not yet been answered. I understand that when the necessity of it is proved the Treasury will concede it.

10,782. Are you so tied to the Treasury that you cannot add officers without their permission?—Yes, certainly; I am bound by the estimates.

10,783. Does not your estimate provide for more officers than you actually have?—Not of that sort, we have got, perhaps, a few more subordinate officers on the estimates than we actually have. Sometimes we make a reduction in one prison and transfer it to another; but as regards the superior officers we have not got one more than we want; we have no margin of any sort.

10,784. (Chairman.) What do you consider to be the best size for a prison in point of numbers?—Do you mean large or small, or do you mean the maximum?

10,785. The best size with regard to capacity?—I should not hesitate to make it 1,000 or 1,200. I daresay it might be better to make them smaller if one had full choice, but I would not say that 1,200 is too much if you have the assistance of a deputy governor.

10,786. But from the point of view of reformatory influence is it not the fact that the larger the number of prisoners a governor may have under his control the more difficult it would be for him to bring his personal influence to bear with them?—Well, I think that may be so if a governor is to be supposed to know every prisoner, and to exercise a personal influence over him, but it is not so much the number of prisoners in the average population as the number who pass through his hands, and I should imagine it was almost impossible for him to attempt to know personally and exercise a personal influence on a great many. If he is to do that I should take the test rather from the reformatory schools, or Feltham, and places like that, in which the governor is supposed to do all those things. I do not think we look upon our governors as taking that intimate personal part in the management of individual prisoners as is done in a case like that.

10,787. Then, with regard to the deputy-governors, the rule, I understand, now is that where there are more than 700 prisoners a deputy-governor is appointed, that is, 700 male prisoners?—Yes.

10,788. But taking, for instance, the cases of Liverpool and Strangeways, where you have over 1,000 total population, is not that too heavy a strain upon the Governor?—At Strangeways we had a deputy-governor once, and I believe they are entitled to it by the population, but when the last deputy-governor went, the Commissioners at that time thought he need not be replaced, and he never has been replaced. I am inclined to think we ought to have one there, and I believe 700 is a good standard.

10,789. Take Liverpool, then?—Well, Liverpool just does not come up to the standard. I do not think there is any particular magic in the number 700 but one must fix some number, and that is what has been fixed. We founded all we did on those things to some extent on what we found when we came into possession. We found there were a good many large prisons in which there was no deputy-governor, such as prisons of 1,000 or more; we found there were a good many prisons where the officers were called deputy-governors, but who were not of the grade we now give that office to; they were a different class of person altogether; and therefore when we formed our class we graded them by titles in that way, and we gave the title of deputy-governor only to a certain class of officer who was in the largest class of prison.

10,790. Then does not a charge of 300 women add seriously to the responsibility of the governor?—I look upon the chief matron in the light of a deputy-governor, and say she takes off the governor's hands a great deal of the charge.

10,791. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) All the personal charge?—Yes, and more, perhaps, than a deputy-governor takes off on the male side. Therefore I say that if a prison has got a mixed population, and there are seven or eight hundred males to two or three hundred females, that governor has got two deputy-governors practically.

10,792. (Chairman.) But still the governor would have to look into questions of punishment?—Yes, he has something to do, but nothing to compare with what he has on the male side.

10,793. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Where there is a male deputy-governor does he take a special branch of the prison, or is he a sort of second in command to the governor?—We let the governors arrange those things as they like. We issue no orders, but the idea is that he has to take off the hands of the governor so much work as he, the governor, cannot do, and also to supply his place when he is absent; and that I take it is the standard on which you fix how many prisoners ought to entitle a prison to a deputy-governor. If the governor cannot do his work without assistance then he wants a deputy of that class—the same class as himself.

10,794. It is not necessary to state how the governor should employ the deputy-governor?—We do not lay it down. We try to make the governors as free as we can make them.

10,795. I suppose you think a deputy-governor is a very useful functionary as training governors for you?—Yes.

10,796. That is a very important point?—Certainly.

10,797. (Chairman.) On that question of training, do you think that it would be advisable to set aside, say, two prisons which should be used as training depôts for warders, and possibly for deputy-governors?—I have often thought that it would be a good thing, but there is a difficulty in the way. Supposing a man down in Yorkshire applies for an appointment, or down in the country, and it is thought proper to give him one, what are you to do? First of all, you have to bring him up to London, or to some large prison, and he and his family have to settle down there. Then, directly there is a vacancy (before he knows what he is about), he is sent off to some other place. I think they would find that a very great grievance. There would be an inevitable expense to the warder, and it would cost these people for moving about in that sort of way more than they would get reimbursed.

10,798. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Are warders, on their appointment, mostly married men?—Almost always, and some of them have very large families.

10,799. (Chairman.) On the other hand, you might select them from younger men, who would be either unmarried, or who would not have large families, and train them, and make up for their comparative youngness by the thoroughness of the training they would get?—Do I understand you mean to take up some young men to be treated in that way?

10,800. Yes, but of course you would provide that the particular prisons would be in the charge of experienced officials, governors, chief warders, and so forth?—You would have the advantage, in that case, of training certain particular young men, but you would not train a very large proportion of your staff unless you have all young men. That is a difficulty that has always come across me when I have thought of that subject, and I have often thought of it. In large prisons, like convict prisons, putting them to learn their work in the prison they are to serve in sufficiently teaches them, but in local prisons, that are scattered all over the place, some of them being very small prisons, they certainly would be better for a certain amount of training in a large prison.

10,801. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) The small local prison does not afford field enough to train a warder in?—No. Furthermore, all the governors are not up to the level we should like them to be; they will come up to it in time.

10,802. Or a governor?—The governor would have received previous training as a deputy governor or chief warder in a large prison.

10,803. (Chairman.) With regard to the appointment of chief warders to be chief warders in charge, do you think the present practice works well?—I do. I cannot think that there is any reason to reduce the number of prisoners, which shall constitute the change of an officer promoted from being chief warder under a governor. It is possible, of course, that some of those promoted may not altogether fulfil the anticipation of those whose opinions were taken on their complete fitness, but this might have happened from whatever source they had been drawn. The charge of 100 prisoners is not greater than that of many workhouses of which the masters are about on a level with chief warders. I look to another method for effecting an improvement in the organisation of these small prisons, which will include a provision for ensuring more effectually the complete efficiency of officers appointed to this post. Every prison, large and small, now has on its staff a clerk who is in charge of the stores, who acts under and is responsible to the governor or other officer in charge. It seems to me that, in a small prison, the head of it ought to be able to take charge of the stores and to do all the ordinary clerical work himself. If, therefore, it should be made a condition of appointment that he should prove his capability for this duty, and should only hold it on satisfactorily fulfilling the duty, it would afford a good educational test, and so improve the standard of officers appointed to the post. The disproportionate cost of keeping the store accounts at the present time will be seen by observing that the pay of the clerk in charge is from 170*l.* to 215*l.*, while the total cost of a small prison may be put at from 2,000*l.* to 3,000*l.* per annum, of which only a small part, say, from one-third to one-fourth, represents the value of the stores which have to be accounted for. With proper provision to preserve the reasonable claims of persons interested, it seems to me that future appointments, at all events, might be made on this basis. Chief warders who show themselves capable might, as now, be appointed to charge of these prisons, and also any clerks, who, besides clerical efficiency, have the particular qualifications necessary to take charge of the discipline duties. The designation of chief warder in charge for the governor of a small prison containing 100 prisoners or under was not new in the Government service. It has the advantage of marking these prisons as being reserved for chief warders who have proved their fitness when holding that office in large prisons under a governor. As these chief warders are men who have entered the service at the bottom, the appointment to charge of a prison is seen to be a prize which all may look forward to as the result of efficient service. The title also implied a closer connexion with the details of working the prison than that of mere supervision, combined with the duties appertaining ordinarily to the governor which by themselves would not afford full occupation to the head of the prison. That thoroughly efficient officers for the position are to be found among the warder class is exemplified by some of the witnesses who have been before the Committee, among whom were two who are now governors of our largest prisons, who commenced their career as privates in the Army. So also did several of the most efficient governors of prisons, who were transferred to us with their prisons in 1878, men who had risen from the ranks of the Army, and, on retiring, had entered the prison service. The practice of the local authorities in regard to the class of persons who were put in charge of prisons will be seen by the following analysis of the antecedents and status of the governors of 110 prisons which were transferred to Government in 1878:—40 had been in the Army, Navy, or Marines; of these, 31 had been commissioned officers, and of these 5 had risen from the ranks, so that 14 began their career as private soldiers; 14 had been civilians of a class corresponding to commissioned officers. The rest were civilians, more or less of the warder class.

10,804. Then, I understand, that you would still keep the head of a small prison as a uniformed officer?—I think, in some respects, he had better wear uniform, but I do not attach much importance to it. I am told, and I think it is natural, that sometimes the chaplain and the medical officer do not get on very well with a chief warder in charge. They do not like a man like that being at the head of the prison. So far as uniform has to do with this, anything that would make them happy I should be very glad to concede; but I think, perhaps, chief warders are not always likely to dress so smartly in plain clothes as one would like officers to dress, and in such respects they are better in uniform; but I do not think it is of much importance.

10,805. Should you object to calling them assistant governors?—I have no objection to calling them "governors," but the reason they were not made governors is, that we found there were chief warders in charge in the military prisons, and that was continued as part of the scheme. Then also, I think, that if they were called chief warders in charge, they would understand that they were not to be mere supervisors, like a governor, but that they were to do, in their higher position, some of the duties of a chief warder under a governor, more detailed duties in point of fact. I do not know whether it much signifies, but I should be perfectly content to call them governors, provided it was understood that the appointments to those prisons were reserved for promotion from the staff.

10,806. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You think it is rather essential to have that sort of opening for your staff?—I do; I think it is of very great importance. I want to introduce something here as to what Mr. Morrison said in his evidence.

10,807. Is it on this particular point?—Yes.

10,808. Then tell us what it is?—Mr. Morrison has made it a charge against the administration of the Prison Department that in making appointments to the office of chief warder in charge of a local prison, the local prison officers have been deprived of a promotion which they have a right to expect, by the appointment of convict prison officers to fill these posts. The same charge has been made anonymously in the newspapers. There is no primâ facie reason why the convict prisons and the local prisons should always be worked as distinct departments. It is only by what may be called the accident that the former were under the Government, while the latter were under local authorities that they were ever treated so distinctly, but now that they are both under the same authority they naturally should be welded together, so far as circumstances permit, and this process of welding the departments into one commenced as soon as the Prison Act, 1877, came into operation, and has been gradually extending ever since. There is, therefore, nothing contrary to principle in making such appointments as are referred to, and in other grades this inter-change has been carried out over and over again. But the point of the charge is that unfair preference has been given to convict officers, and Mr. Morrison not only distinctly asserts the fact, but accounts for it by saying that convict prison officers come personally more under notice of the Commissioners than the local prison officers. There is not, however, a shadow of a grain of foundation for the charge, which indeed is opposed to all the facts of the case, and to the whole tenor of the administration of the Commissioners who have earnestly endeavoured to act with strict fairness to the officers in all promotions or appointments. Since the Prison Act, 1877, came into operation, 25 persons have been appointed to the office of chief warder in charge. There were only two of this number who were not, at the time of promotion, chief warders in a local prison. The first who was appointed from a convict prison was not until the local prisons had been 15 years under Government. For the appointment of the two who did come from the convict service there were special reasons, though, as I have pointed out before, no special reasons are necessary to justify it. One of those appointed was a man who had been lent to a colony to reform its prison system and administration, and had acquitted himself of this peculiar duty with great credit. He is a very superior person, and it was quite natural and right, and to the public interest to make use of him by putting him in charge of a local prison. The other was the chief warder of one of our largest convict prisons, a position requiring very considerable qualities to fulfil it creditably. It happened that this prison was discontinued, and the staff had to be provided for or else to be pensioned. It was a fortunate chance that a vacancy for charge of a small local prison then occurred, and it was, in all points of view, to the public interest that advantage should be taken of it to post this excellent officer where his capabilities could be made good use of. There is not, therefore, the smallest ground for saying that the interests and claims of the local prison officers have been sacrificed.

10,809. Do you see any reason why the convict service and the local prison service should not be amalgamated?—That is our great object all through; I think that is a great object, and we have done so continually.

10,810. (Chairman.) Do you see your way at all clearly towards that amalgamation?—It is gradually being done. If you were to compare our condition now with what it was 10 or 15 years ago, you would see that the welding process is gradually going on.

10,811. That leads to the next point in my mind, which is about keeping convicts for nine months in local prisons?—That is not a new thing at all. That was always done, since Pentonville Prison was established as a model prison. I think you will find it in the old reports of that date, that they always anticipated that there would be local prisons built after the model of Pentonville, in which they would be able to keep their convicts before transferring them, and, as a matter of fact, when I first joined the service, 30 or 40 years ago, there were certainly 400 convicts at Wakefield; and either then, or just before then, there had been convicts at Leicester, Northampton, and five or six other prisons. So that it is quite the old system, and there is no reason against it. I think it is very desirable that it should be understood that convicts have to go through, in that early stage, much the same discipline as the local prisoners, and that they do not go off into a milder atmosphere by going at once to the convict prisons, but they go through the same course.

10,812. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You think that the nine months' solitary imprisonment is more punitive than being placed immediately upon works?—Certainly.

10,813. You are aware that in a recent magazine article the contrary opinion has been expressed?—Do you mean in the "Fortnightly"?

10,814. No, in the "Nineteenth Century"?—Mr. Davitt's article. Mr. Davitt knows something about it; but I do not agree with him if he says that. I do not know that he has said it. I have read the article, but I do not recollect his saying that.

10,815. (Chairman.) I suppose one of the main objects of this is to save the expense of sending down individual convicts?—Well, we began by what we called collecting them in certain central prisons so as to save the expense of sending individual convicts to the distant convict prisons, but after a little while we thought there was no reason why we should send them at all down to the convict close prisons, and we did away with the close prisons there used to be at Pentonville and Wormwood Scrubs and converted them into local prisons. We had a great deal of spare room in the local prisons, and so we have picked out 10 or a dozen, in which we keep all our nine months' men now.

10,816. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) The prisons on the local system, being properly constructed for cellular confinement, are more advantageous for containing convicts in their first nine months than are the existing convict prisons?—Well, they are properly constructed, and as we now have only public works for the prisoners, I say they are better.

10,817. I used the words, "existing convict prisons"?—Yes, remaining—existing—because those "public works prisons" were built for public works purposes.

10,818. The existing "public works prisons" are not suited for the cellular confinement which is the first nine months of a convict's period?—No.

10,819. (Chairman.) On the other hand, it has been represented by some witnesses to us that the convicts in local prisons are the most difficult to manage, and are rather an undesirable element in a local prison?—I quite understand that, but we have got to train our governors of local prisons to manage them. They will learn in course of time how to do it. It is almost ludicrous to see the fear some of them used to have, and that some of the visiting committees used to have, of the convicts; but it is one of those things that one can educate people to understand how to do, I think.

10,820. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Given an efficient governor, there is no difficulty in managing convicts in the local prisons?—Not a bit more than in a convict prison. It has the same facilities in every way.

10,821. With the exception that there is greater difficulty in finding employment?—There is no more difficulty in the local prisons than in the convict prisons, I think.

10,822. Well, in convict prisons you have quarries and reclamation works, and works on fortifications, and so on?—That is the public works stage; but I am talking now of the first nine months' cellular. Now, you have just as much opportunity for working in the local prisons as in the convict prisons, as long as they are in cells in both cases.

10,823. You approve of the convict system being arranged in two stages: one of separate confinement, and the other of employment on public works?—I think that is what has been arrived at as being best. I do not know how I should propose to alter it.

10,824. On the ground of experience, that has been found the most effective way of arranging the convict system?—Yes.

10,825. (Chairman.) Supposing that other hard labour could be provided, should you be disposed to say that it would be good to get rid of the crank and the tread-wheel and the mills?—I dislike all those things very much; but I think they are a sad necessity.

10,826. From the point of view of hard labour or of prison discipline?—The penal effect. I think, if you want to hold out to a man the prospect of improving his condition in the prison, you must begin by severe treatment, and let him work his way up from that. Our present regime in that matter is far less severe than it was 16 years ago.

10,827. But is not it the fact that the punishment crank and tread-wheel give absolutely no occupation to a man's mind?—Certainly, that is so.

10,828. Then, is not it true that he would be more disposed to think unwholesome thoughts, and to produce an unhealthiness in his mental condition?—Yes, I daresay it is excessively disagreeable to him.

10,829. But does not it make him a worse man?—No, not if carried on only for a short time. All punishment is unnatural. Locking a man up is unnatural.

10,830. But if you give to a prisoner punishment which it would be natural for a man to do outside, of his own free will, then it does not debase a man, per se, in prison?—As I told you, I dislike all those things, but I think they are a necessity. I think that if you are going to punish, you must find something that does punish, and that is disagreeable.

10,831. Would not it be better, if it were possible, to find some form of punishment which should not be less a punishment, but which, at the same time, should occupy a man's mind, and, possibly, train him in good habits?—I agree, but let somebody invent that.

10,832. Then you are only in favour of these various machines because nothing better has, as yet, been found?—Yes; the law is that the first-class hard labour is to be crank, tread-wheel, capstan, stone-breaking, or other like kind of industry. Well, there is stone-breaking, and, to an extent, that is employed; but it shows that there is nothing in the law against the first-class hard labour being of an industrial kind; if only anybody could hit upon something else, which would be useful.

10,833. For instance, reclamation work such as you have at Dartmoor?—But, then, you cannot do that in the cell; it must be cellular.

10,834. That, of course, raises the question of cellular occupation as against association. Are you very strongly in favour of the cellular treatment?—Yes, for the commencement of the sentence.

10,835. But for how long?—I may say that all the experience of every country has led up to that, and has been the means of that system being established.

10,836. But is not that rather a reaction from the fearful abuses which grew out of a system of association without any sort of control or discipline?—I would not undertake to say that there was no control or discipline in the days before cellular imprisonment.

10,837. Take the case of Wandsworth. Now, surely there can be nothing but good from those admirable shops which have been erected there?—I think it would be going back if you put them all into shops at once, and I should be very sorry to see that done.

10,838. It would be more expensive?—It would cost money to build shops, but I think all countries have agreed that cellular imprisonment, so far as it can be properly carried out, is the best form of imprisonment and the best form of punishment. I think all countries have agreed on that point; and many have only not carried it out fully for want of money.

10,839. But do not two questions arise, first, the question of punishment, and secondly, the question of reform; and from the point of view of reformation and treating a man as a natural being, is not it rather obviously the best plan to give him as many opportunities in prison as possible, such as he would have outside, for the purpose of improving his mind?—I do not know that mixing him up with other criminals would lead to reform.

Sir E. F. Du Cane, K.C.B., R.E.

10,840. But still that is done in all convict prisons?—Because you cannot help it. You cannot keep him for ever in cells, and therefore you are obliged, at some time, to take him out; but there is a very great distinction between the convicts being employed in that way and any proposal for employing local prisoners. You must recollect that when the convicts are discharged they come out in driblets, and they are discharged all over the country. Your local prisoner is discharged into his own town, perhaps, by the hundred; therefore they would all come out together, men who have been mixed up in workshops, all knowing each other, having made their little plans together, all being acquaintances; so that the evils with regard to the convicts are much less than they would be if you were to introduce the same system into the local prisons, in my opinion.

10,841. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Is not it also the fact that a very small percentage of those who go to prison for the first time return again?—I do not think anybody knows that accurately, but my impression is that about two-thirds do not come back again.

10,842. So far as statistics, which, apparently, you think are not wholly reliable, go, it is a much less proportion than that?—I think it is about two-thirds.

10,843. I suppose you also consider that associated labour could only be carried out for those who have got sentences of considerable length?—Yes.

10,844. That the masses of people brought in to you for a week, a fortnight, or from 10 days to 3 weeks, never could be associated together?—They could not not do any useful work. In regard to that I may say that in many foreign countries their system of employment is that they let the labour of the prisoners to a contractor, and the contractor runs the machine. He has the labour of the prisoners to devote to any purpose he likes, and he supplies all the food, and so on. I frequently asked, in those places, "What employment do you find for your short sentence prisoners?" And they said, "Oh! we cannot find any employment for them at all," so that, practically, they do nothing but idle about.

10,845. Have they anything akin to the treadwheel or the crank in France?—No.

10,846. Or Belgium?—I have not seen anything of that sort.

10,847. (Chairman.) Do you approve of No. 1 diet as a punishment?—If you are to have a punishment diet I do not think you can have anything better.

10,848. It has a lowering effect on the constitution?—No doubt, but it is only employed for a short time.

10,849. Does not it work unequally; is not it bad for some people, while it may not hurt others? Take the case, for instance, of women who are habitual drunkards?—I should look to the medical officer to remedy that. On all questions of diet we always hold that it is entirely a medical question. We wait for the medical inspector and the medical officers of the prisons to say anything they have got to say as to it, and we put the whole thing in their charge.

10,850. Are you satisfied that the convict diet for hard labour men is sufficient?—I believe it to be. The health of the prisoners is always thought to be very good.

10,851. We have had a certain amount of evidence to the effect that men are so ravenous that they are ready to eat candles. That is an old story, I think, which came up before the other Commission?—This question of the diet has been frequently investigated, certainly by two Royal Commissions, and on both occasions there were doctors on the Commissions, but they never recommended any change.

10,852. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You think your convicts who have been at hard labour are discharged in a sufficiently vigorous condition?—I think so; I have never been told otherwise.

10,853. It has been stated to us that the food is adequate for those who are employed at sedentary occupations, such as the shoemaker and clerks, and and things of that kind, but not adequate for those who are employed on public works?—I can only tell you that all the responsible people are satisfied with it as it is, so far as I know; and those Royal Commissions which have investigated the matter have always been satisfied.

10,854. Do you think it would be desirable to give them a more stimulating diet, say for a week, before discharge? I am speaking of long sentence prisoners?—If it is put on medical grounds, with proper medical support, I should certainly do so.

10,855. You think there are no adequate grounds for the statement?—I have never heard so; the diet has been going on now for 30 years odd.

10,856. (Chairman.) With regard to the treatment of unconvicted prisoners, do not you think a certain hardship arises because of the advantage which men with money have as against men who have no money?—I think the moneyed unconvicted prisoner has an advantage from his money, certainly.

10,857. Then the poorer man may be quite innocent of the offence?—So may the rich man.

10,858. Then why should money make the difference in the prison treatment?—It is only the diet. The idea was that a man should not be damaged by being in prison any more than you could possibly help; and therefore the natural inference was that if a man chose to provide his own diet he might.

10,859. Then the Act provides that regard shall be had to safe custody, but that every consideration shall be given to the treatment that is consistent with that safe custody and the discipline of the prison?—Yes.

10,860. Well, that is not done?—As far as I know it is, if I am interpreting you rightly; as far as I know the present diet is not considered a penal diet; it is the diet of a poor man who has to be maintained.

10,861. But he is cut off his beer, he is cut off his tobacco, he is probably cut off his meat and other things which he has been accustomed to have, unless he is a vagrant living from hand to mouth?—Yes; he is cut off his beer and his tobacco.

10,862. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) The rich man is not allowed tobacco?—No.

10,863. (Chairman.) But he can have wine or beer?—Yes, he may have wine or beer. Of course for unconvicted men the official diet by the rules is what is considered necessary to maintain him without any luxuries.

10,864. But in the eye of the law he is an innocent man, and as a matter of fact a certain proportion of unconvicted prisoners are innocent men?—Yes, certainly.

10,865. And do not you think it is desirable rather to level up the diet of the convicted prisoners?—I should give them what is necessary. If the doctors say that beer is necessary, I should give them beer, but if they do not say it is necessary I should not.

10,866. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) As a matter of fact the poor man who can buy beer outside the prison could also buy it inside?—I should have to think about that; I think he may supply a part of his own diet.

10,867. There is no doubt about this, that an unconvicted prisoner may have a pint of beer a day, and a rich prisoner, I think, may have half a pint of wine?—Yes.

10,868. In your opinion the diet of an unconvicted prisoner is adequate food, and it may be modified by the prisoner's own actions?—Certainly, I believe that is the intention.

10,869. And to any reasonable extent?—Yes.

10,870. And you do not see that any other course can be adopted?—I think it is sound.

10,871. (Chairman.) In your opinion is it desirable to extend the powers of visiting justices?—The question of the powers and duties of the visiting committee has frequently been considered and discussed from the time the Bill was introduced in 1876, and there has always been a desire to meet the wishes of those who wished for an addition to their duties, but anything done in this direction must obviously be consistent with their position under the Act.

The great characteristic of that position is that they are entirely independent. If they were to take part in the administration, they could not criticize and pass judgment with entire impartiality on matters which were wholly or partly their own acts.

The Prison Act, 1877, makes the Secretary of State responsible for the management of the prisons, and gives him power to appoint certain Commissioners and others to aid him in doing so. The visiting committee are not appointed by or removable by him, nor in any way responsible to him or under his orders. The nature of their position, therefore, is inconsistent, with their taking part in the management of the prisons, for which the Secretary of State, of whom they are thus independent, is responsible. Still more impracticable would be the position if there were two independent bodies, the Commissioners and the visiting committee, sharing the control of the prison and issuing, perhaps, conflicting orders.

The duties which the visiting committee have, though not those of direct management, are nevertheless exceedingly important. They act with regard to offences within the prison in a similar way to that which they do magisterially in regard to offences outside the prison. They are independent judges to whom any prisoner may complain, and the whole life of the prison is open to their criticism, the food, the clothing, the punishments, the rewards, and the daily treatment of the prisoners.

Their usefulness is much more in the great influence they may exert than in any specific thing they may be given to do, in the knowledge that they are looking on, and that any abuse is liable to be brought to their notice, in the perhaps casual remarks or criticisms they may make in going round the prison with the governor, in their intercourse with the chaplain and doctor.

10,872. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) As a matter of fact the visiting committees are not as active as they were under the old regime, and in some prisons they have nearly ceased?—I am not sure that they cannot do nearly as much as they did. There are certain things they cannot do: they have nothing to do with making contracts, they have nothing to do with appointing officers, but I think the principal duty of the visiting committee under the old regime was to go round the prison and hear the complaints and charges made by the governor and so on. I think that was the principal part of what they used to do.

10,873. Are the contracts for the local prisons made locally?—No; some of the contractors are of course local people, but we make them all here.

10,874. The governor has nothing to do with them?—No, unless it is to report whether a contractor carries out his contract efficiently.

10,875. (Chairman.) With regard to the Prisoners' Aid Societies, is there any objection to providing that a list of all bonâ fide Prisoners' Aid Societies should be shown to prisoners before discharge, and that leave should be given to them to select the society which they would like to ask for help, and upon which they should be able to see the agent of that society in the prison?—I think that certainly any prisoner who asked to go to any particular society should be allowed to see the agent of that society.

10,876. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) In the prison?—In the prison before he goes out; but whether I should offer him a list, like a list of hotels, to choose where he would like to go to, I think is very doubtful. I would rather that somebody who was interested in the matter picked out the places that he should go to or that the chaplain should bring to his notice the agencies which exist.

10,877. (Chairman.) It has been represented to me privately, I am not sure whether it has been stated in the evidence, that the chaplain being invariably a member of the Church of England or a Roman Catholic priest, may be very ill disposed towards such an organisation as the Salvation Army?—I think it quite possible.

10,878. And that therefore the Salvation Army, who have taken up a very practical work, have no opportunity of getting at the prisoners?—I think if the Aid Societies cannot dispose of their prisoners, they would be very wrong not to use the Salvation Army; but if they can, I do not see what place there is for the Salvation Army.

10,879. The Salvation Army, as far as I know, is the only agency that has established an actual home for male prisoners of all kinds, and I think they have now something like 200 of those men at work in those homes, whilst the results of the working are not at all unsatisfactory. That is a solid bit of useful work which is distinctly in their favour?—I certainly think the Salvation Army does good, and that some means of making use of them ought to be available, but I do not know that it is the business of the Prisons Department to do that. I think that our position is to stand outside of these agencies and to say, "You "take the business in hand, it is outside work, it is "not our work."

10,880. But then the question is this as it seems to me: A man coming out of prison, let us say, who is not a confirmed criminal, but a man who has been committed several times, who has no friends amongst respectable people, when he comes out of the prison is sure to go back to his old haunts and his own companions. Is not it desirable if possible to get hold of that man before he comes out?—I think it is the business of the Aid Society.

10,881. But then they must have access to the prison?—Well, the Aid Society has access to the prison by its agent.

10,882. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Would you suggest that the agent should take a sufficiently wide view of his duties as to communicate with any agency that exists, even the Salvation Army?—Certainly, that is precisely the position.

10,883. And that unless they do that they rather fail in their duty?—I rather think so, if for want of it they fail to aid a prisoner.

10,884. (Chairman.) Then do not they fail in their duty, because, so far as I can see, the Salvation Army has picked up those prisoners outside in a very haphazard way, without any facilities being given to them; but it seems that if facilities had been given to them they could very largely have extended their work. Not only that, but they seem to have organised a work which leads to very good practical results, and therefore they have some claim to be specially considered. I am not only speaking of the Salvation Army, but of any organisation which does that kind of work?—Well, there is the "Church Army." These are two, but of course our position has been this: There is the Aid Society attached to the prison, who are the people we hand over the gratuities to, and all that sort of thing, and we cannot properly recognise more than one, because then you get that horrible thing which is called competition for the patronage of the prisoners. How to get over that I do not know, but I think it is a matter which it will be necessary to examine the Aid Society people about themselves, and to say to them, "Why do not you use the Salvation Army."

10,885. But you would agree that any influence which may possibly get hold of a prisoner before discharge and save him from relapsing to bad companions and to his old habits would be distinctly advantageous?—Yes, certainly. All that I mean by that is that you should have one authority for each prison, not competition.

10,886. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You consider that it would be detrimental to the discipline of prisons if more than one agency was admitted inside the prison to manage its affairs?—I say if the Aid Society were to choose to say, "This man shall go to the Salvation Army," I think I should send to the agent of the Salvation Army, and let them send for him. As an example of that, Mr. Merrick, whom you have had before you, is a very active chaplain indeed; he did not send all prisoners to one society, but he sent the women wherever he thought they could be best disposed of. I will not undertake to say whether he ever sent any to the Salvation Army, but as these things grew up he stood at that time in the place of the Aid Society. I say let an agent of the Aid Society, who I had much rather was not the chaplain, do this. I have always been against it, but I was overruled; I want the Aid Society to be people who are entirely independent of the prison. I say it is their business to be outside the prison.

Sir E. F. Du Cane, K.C.B., R.E.

13 Dec. 1894.

10,887. Then, in order to work effectively, the agent of the Aid Society must have free access to the prison?—Certainly.

10,888. Would you allow him as free access as a chaplain has?—I should allow the chaplain and the governor to recommend any prisoner they liked to the Aid Society, then the Aid Society could say, "very well, let my agent go and see that man," and he should be allowed to see him.

10,889. An order has been recently issued abrogating the privileges of the "St. Giles Christian Mission," I believe?—Yes.

10,890. And all societies?—A certain particular privilege. It was not a privilege of entry; it was a privilege of standing under an archway; it was quite a small thing. There was a certain issue of breakfast tickets, which Mr. Wheatley started a good many years ago. His agent was allowed to stand at a certain place under shelter; then the Salvation Army said, "Let us stand under shelter too," but we said, we cannot have two men here touting under shelter and offering tickets, and then the Salvation Army complained that they wanted to be put on a perfect equality with Mr. Wheatley, and therefore it was taken away from Mr. Wheatley.

10,891. You very rightly point, as it seems to me, to a danger of competition, but you just now used the expression "touting for the prisoners." I quite agree with that; but is not there much more danger of competition and touting from allowing different aid societies to scramble for the prisoner when he gets outside the gates than from showing the prisoner a list of those philanthropic societies, and saying, "Now, if you are interested in any of these gentle-"men, they will be willing to help you, and you can "choose, if you like, which it is to be?"—I do not think there should be any scramble outside at all; the business ought to be all done before the prisoner comes out. What you are referring to, I think, refers to the breakfast tickets. I do not believe in the breakfast at all.

10,892. Taking the London prisons, there is the Prisoners' Aid Society's representative, who has access to the prison; there is Mr. Wheatley; and there is the Salvation Army?—In some places Mr. Wheatley is the agent of the Aid Society.

10,893. But take some prison where he issues the breakfast tickets. His agent is outside with the breakfast tickets, and the Salvation Army are looking out, and there may be two or three others doing so also?—I do not believe in the breakfast tickets at all. I do not believe in the work of the breakfast system.

10,894. But my point is this: Is not it better, before a man comes out of prison, that he should be allowed to select the society which he thinks would be most calculated to help him, and to which he is most inclined to go, and that then the agent of that society should be able to have access to him before discharge, so as to bring any influence possible to bear upon him to prevent that man from relapsing into crime?—If any prisoner asked to go to the Salvation Army, the Salvation Army would be told of it.

10,895. Then, again, take the case of an aid society in the country, at the provincial prisons. That society is sometimes chiefly composed of the governor—at least, it is in some cases?—No, it is composed of the visiting committee. The governor is never the aid society. He is on the committee very often, but it is the visiting committee who are the aid society.

10,896. I think it was the governor of York who said that he was practically the aid society, and that they left it all in his hands. Anyhow, however it may be, that aid society is a limited thing. It is limited to a particular locality, and its aid, therefore, to a prisoner must be of an extremely limited kind. When you get to a large society, like the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society in London, or take, again, the Salvation Army, those societies have agents in all parts of the country, and they can follow up prisoners and watch them; they can get them work, and send their friends and agents about, and say, "See to this man, watch him, and help him." Surely societies which are able to do that ought to have the greatest possible opportunity of getting hold of those prisoners before discharge?—I think I would rather you asked the aid society on matters of that sort, and hear what they have got to say on that subject.

The proceedings were adjourned until Monday, 17th of December, at 3 o'clock.

TWENTIETH DAY.

Home Office, Whitehall.

Monday, 17th December 1894.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P. (CHAIRMAN); and
JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, Esq., M.B., F.R.C.P.
JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

Sir E. F. Du Cane, K.C.B., R.E.

17 Dec. 1894.

Sir EDMUND F. DU CANE, K.C.B., R.E., recalled and further examined.

10,897. (Chairman.) Do you think it would be advisable to make any extension of privileges to well-conducted prisoners?—I see no objection to extending those privileges to allowing more frequent letters and visits after the first three months. Perhaps it might be advisable to do so. I am not quite sure whether a great number would take advantage of it, but certainly not of visits, I think. They might write more letters than they do now perhaps.

10,898. Would you be disposed to give greater discretionary powers either to the governor or the visiting justices in the matters of visits and letters?—Well, all those privileges, according to our system, are gained by marks; that is to say, a prisoner earns them; they are the reward of his industry and good conduct, and do not depend on the goodwill of the governor or the opinion of the justices or anyone else. As far as what we call special letters and visits, that is to say, letters which are beyond what he can earn, but which are only granted for some particular personal reason, that, I think, might properly be given either to the governor or the visiting justices.

10,899. Sometimes there are exceptional cases of prisoners who for some reason or other have some wish to write letters?—There is some reason for setting aside the rules in their personal cases. These are the things that we call "special letters." That I should have no objection to if necessary, but, of course, we must understand that they exercise that power in accordance with the system, and not so as to upset the marks system—the stage system.

10,900. (Dr. Bridges.) I merely want to put one point to you about the letters. There is not, I suppose, the same objection in relaxing the rule about the letters as there would be with regard to relaxing the rule as to visits; or would that be so?—Well, I think it is the same thing. Our aim in framing the system is that the prisoners shall be rather kept in good conduct and industry by the hope of reward than by the fear of punishments. There are very few rewards we can give in a prison, because, by the nature of things, a prisoner has got to be deprived of everything in the nature of comfort and luxury. There are, therefore, very few things to be given; but there are the letters and visits, and the same reason would apply to both.

10,901. I rather thought that visiting from the reformatory point of view might be injurious, whereas the letter could not have an injurious effect?—I do not think so; I do not think I should draw very much distinction in that way. It depends entirely on who the friends are, and who the prisoner is, whether the letter or visit would be reformatory or otherwise. I think, generally, a prisoner being visited by his family can hardly have a bad effect.

10,902. (Chairman.) Do you think it might be advantageous to mark Sunday by some small extension of food, and an increase of the food?—I am rather against any food privileges. I have been brought up in that system. It used to exist, and it was put an end to as being rather a low form of reward, and also because the diet was of a certain sort of importance in the eyes of people outside, who are affected by the fear of punishment; and they are apt to say, if they hear of plum puddings on Sundays, "Oh! this is a "jolly place; you get a plum pudding on Sunday;" and they think more of the plum puddings on Sundays than of the six days they go without it.

10,903. Would there be the same objection to enabling them to earn it by good conduct?—It is the same thing; the doctrine on which we have always gone since that time has been that the diet should be sufficient, and not more than sufficient, and should not be made a reward at all; that you ought to give them enough, and that you ought not to give them anything more by way of reward.

10,904. Is not Sunday rather a terrible day for prisoners as it is now. There is no difference in the treatment except that they are cut off their exercise?—I think prisoners would give you very different accounts of that. Some say they do not care about going out to exercise; some dislike it, of course, but as long as they have got books, I do not think there is anything very terrible about having to stop in on Sunday.

10,905. Still, for their health it would be better that they should go out?—Yes; but our medical officers have agreed that stopping in on Sundays will do them no harm, and I think one's own experience will say that in not going out once a week there is no great injury to one's health.

10,906. I suppose the practical objection now is that the staff would not be sufficiently strong to exercise them?—The reason we stopped the Sunday exercise, was in order to let the officers have the Sunday off.

10,907. Therefore, if Sunday exercise was allowed, there would be some increase of the staff necessary?—Certainly.

10,908. (Dr. Bridges.) About the Sunday exercise, in what way was the opinion of the medical staff taken?—It is their order. The present law is that the prisoners have as much exercise as the medical officer shall think necessary. It does not specify any time at all.

10,909. That is as each medical officer shall think necessary?—Yes. I cannot quite recollect whether we first of all consulted them. I think we did,* but, at all events, we consulted our medical inspector, and I think a few at first rather disliked the change, but the great majority were quite ready to fall in with it.

10,910. When you say that the prisoners have just so much exercise as the medical officer thinks necessary, would that mean that in the case of the medical officer saying, "I have changed my mind after experience, "I have seen the results of the deprivation of the "Sunday exercise, and I do not think it advantageous "to the men," that he can order it?—I think we should be bound to give effect to his opinion. It is the law according to the Act of Parliament. "Health of "prisoners. Criminal prisoners, if employed at work "in their own cells, shall be permitted to take such "exercise in the open air as the surgeon may deem "necessary for their health."

10,911. Do you think the medical officers of prisons are at all aware that the responsibility for the loss of this hour's exercise on Sundays falls on them personally? Are not they of opinion that it was the wish of the Department that it should be cut off?—I have no doubt that it was the wish of the Department, and that they assented to it. I do not say they directed it, but they knew it was at the wish of the Department, and they assented to it as being unobjectionable.

10,912. But it would be open to any one of them to modify that at any time that he chose?—I suppose so, but I hope they will not. To think that one man should be able to regulate one prison in a different way from all the rest is rather a flaw. I think it ought to rest on some higher authority; but there it is.

10,913. And from the information that has been given to you you feel satisfied that no harm comes from that?—I think so; I have no doubt about it. In these things I take the opinion of the medical inspector, who is the responsible person, and who has no doubt about it at all.

10,914. (Chairman.) Was the Parkhurst Reformatory existing during your time of office?—It was just being put an end to when I came into the Department in 1863.

10,915. What was the nature of the reformatory?—It was intended for young people who were sentenced to transportation and long sentences of imprisonment. It was a farm. They each of them lived in a little cell opening straight into the open air, and they did farm work, and certain other work, such as shoemaking, tailoring, and so on. Then when the Reformatory Acts began to come into operation about 1863, it was found that it would be better to send them to private reformatories than to Parkhurst, which was a Government reformatory, so that it gradually died out, and Parkhurst was turned into a prison for women.

* Sir E. Du Cane states, in a letter to the Secretary, that he did not remember, on the spur of the moment, exactly what had been done to elicit the opinion of the medical officers, but it should be made clear that they were formally asked their opinion.

Sir E. F. Du Cane, K.C.B., R.E.

17 Dec. 1894.

10,916. Were there any complaints as to difficulty of management or difficulty of controlling the inmates?—Not at all; it was solely that private reformatories were set up all over the country, and it was thought there was no necessity for a Government reformatory.

10,917. You never heard it was a failure?—No, I do not think it was; I think I said all I knew about it in a book I wrote. You know it gradually fell off in numbers because of the other reformatories taking its place. I was out in Western Australia before all that, and they had a batch of Parkhurst boys sent out there, but they did not talk of them with any reverence. Perhaps they did not think they had been reformed.

10,918. Was there any special arrangement for reforming the boys, such as special attention from chaplains or visitors?—I think so, but it was such a very short time that I had to do with it, that I cannot speak very much about it, but I have no doubt about that at all. I think they took great pains with them.

10,919. Do you think that the reformatory schools can be better managed by voluntary agencies than by Government?—I do not know why Government should not manage just as well; but I would rather the reformatories were managed as they are. I would have them as they are.

10,920. But on the general question you see no reason to believe that a Government institution would not be a successful one?—No.

10,921. In the local prisons there is not under the present system much provision for classification, except with regard to the juvenile prisoners?—There are the debtors, the first class misdemeanants, those awaiting trial, and the rest of the criminal prisoners, from whom the juveniles are separated as much as possible.

10,922. But, taking the convicted prisoners, they are kept pretty well together, except that the juveniles are kept apart?—Yes.

10,923. Do you think it would be advisable to have any fuller classification and separation?—I think it would be a very good thing to take away the mentally weak and put them by themselves, and put them into a separate place.

10,924. Do you think it would be advisable to separate the drunkards?—I see no reason for doing that at all.

10,925. You have read the Report of the Committee last year?—On the drunkards?

10,926. Yes, the Inebriates' Committee?—I think I read it, but I forget it.

10,927. It recommends that in the case of habitual drunkards power should be taken to compulsorily detain them for a lengthened period?—Yes; they proposed to lock them up perpetually, did not they, or something of that sort?

10,928. Well, for a long period, and to treat them medically. Should you be generally in favour of that?—Not in prisons; I should say that to lock them up as drunkards and keep them away from drink might and probably would be a very good thing, but I certainly should not be for keeping them in prison. I should keep them in an institution more corresponding to an asylum.

10,929. However it might be done, should not you be disposed to say that drunkards being essentially different, as a rule, from criminals, it is desirable to treat them somewhat distinctly from criminals?—I think if they were kept for a long while, and a specially long while, I should not be inclined to treat them as I should a criminal who was under a penal sentence. I should like to keep them under restraint for their good, and for the good of the community, but not for punishment, and on that ground I should say treat them differently.

10,930. If an Act was passed providing that men and women under the definition provided might be convicted of being found to be habitual drunkards, and this class was practically removed to a place of separate confinement, it would relieve the prisons of a very large portion of their inmates?—I think it would of a large proportion, and of a troublesome portion, I should think; such as those who are continually coming in and out.

10,931. It would save a great deal of expense and worry, I suppose, in that way?—I am not sure about the expense. One would have to think over that; but it would save a great number of frequent commitments, and all that trouble which comes from receiving a large number of prisoners over and over again, and turning them out to come back again. If they are received and many times locked up, they might, some of them, be almost as well locked up altogether.

10,932. The idea, I suppose, is, that that class should be treated medically?—Yes; my impression is that by treating them medically for some time they might be cured. That is my opinion.

10,933. If such an Act was passed, of course provision would have to be made for detaining them, and probably the best plan would be to take one of the existing prisons and to devote that entirely to the habitual drunkards?—Well, it would be very difficult to say that you could do that. It would be taking a few people out of each existing prison, and turning out those that are in the prison you select into some other prison.

10,934. But taking London, for example, there would not be very much difficulty about it?—I do not know that we should get so many as would fill any one prison in London. That is a question one would have to consider. It would be largely women who would be the inmates of such a prison. It would be women far more than men. I think we have got something about that in our last report.

10,935. However, generally speaking, you would approve of the plan of treating the drunkards in that way?—Yes, I think so.

10,936. Well then, coming to the younger offenders, should you be prepared to approve of the age for admission into reformatories being raised from 16 to 18 on the understanding that a special system of classification was adopted by the reformatories so as to prevent the intermingling of the younger boys and older boys, and the very vicious ones from the less vicious ones?—I think that the test of age is a very rough and uncertain one. It is the best there can be, perhaps, but I think what you want to get is the uncontaminated who may be 16, 17, or 18. You do not know much about their age, except what they tell you, and if any change in that were made, I think it would, perhaps, be right to make it permissive to send prisoners who are older than 16 to a reformatory; but I think it should be only in cases in which they were fit for it, it might be settled by some authority, say the visiting committee, that they were proper subjects for that treatment.

10,937. It was in my mind that discretionary power should be given in the first instance to the court to send these lads to a reformatory up to the age of 18?—Yes; but how the court is to ascertain whether the subject is a fit one I do not know. One boy may be a very proper person to send, although he is 17, and another may be a very bad one.

10,938. I can see that that is a difficulty. Would not it be possible to meet that difficulty by rather going back to the Parkhurst idea, and providing a Government penal reformatory which should be half prison half reformatory, and should be out in the country, with plenty of opportunities for hard agricultural labour, or reclamation of land, to which these lads could be sent, either directly by the court, or after they had been to a reformatory and proved too vicious and too criminal for such an institution?—A reformatory for the older and the bad lads, I think, is a good idea.

10,939. It is true, I suppose, to say that the class of habitual criminals is formed, as a rule, before the subjects reach the age of 20; and probably, before they reach the age of 18?—Yes, it is so. I have got some figures in connexion with that question of the ages, which I had got out to show what number there were in different prisons under these different ages over 16. I took seven of the largest prisons, and they contained among them 1,175 prisoners who were under 21, and I found that between 16 and 17 there were 97; between 17 and 18 there were 195. Now you come to a great step, and between 18 and 19 there were 291; between 19 and 20 there were 297; and between 20 and 21 there were 295. That total number 1,175 is something like half of the whole of those that were in the local prisons of those ages. Therefore, you may assume, I suppose, that the numbers of each age in those prisons represent half the total of all prisons.

10,940. Perhaps you will kindly hand that in to the Committee?—Yes, I will. (The document was handed in. See Appendix III.) That shows if you select a certain particular age what number of prisoners you would have, supposing the population is what it is now; but of course if they were in for longer times, they would accumulate, and you must vary those numbers in proportion.

10,941. Presumably a good many of these young criminals go in for a life of crime, because they find that after all prison now and again, say once every two years, is not such a bad place?—Yes, I am afraid they get familiar with it; they used to call Cold Bath Fields "Bates's farmyard"; and chaff about it.

10,942. If they found that instead of just being put in for three or six months they were laid hold of and sent to a penal reformatory (whatever you might call the institution) for detention for three years, that might have a more deterrent effect than the present system?—I think it is quite likely.

10,943. Do you think it might be provided that in the event of boys,—that is to say, the older boys,—being admitted on the increased age under this proposal to reformatories, that they might be transferred in some way to the penal reformatories if the voluntary reformatory found itself unable to do with them?—That there should be penal establishments for voluntary reformatories to send bad boys to; I do not see why they should not, because the sentence of the visitors is a magisterial sort of sentence.

10,944. You might provide that such cases should be brought before a magistrate?—Certainly.

10,945. And obtain a magistrate's order for removing them to a penal reformatory?—Certainly.

10,946. Then, with regard to the general class of habitual criminals, does your experience lead you to favour cumulative sentences?—I am in favour of their having longer sentences than those who have only committed themselves once or twice. Cumulative sentences have got a particular meaning in the way these things are talked of, which has been taken to mean that you add a certain portion on every time a person is convicted. I think that is rather too ingenious. I would say generally give a longer sentence to the person who has been frequently convicted, but I should not add any particular amount. I should not do it by rule, I should do it with some discretion, but it ought to be remembered, with regard to this, that something of that kind was tried by the Penal Servitude Act of 1864, which enacted that a ticket-of-leave man or a person who had been convicted before and had a ticket-of-leave, if he was convicted again, should not have a less sentence than seven years, that is to say, two years more than the least sentence which could be inflicted on a first conviction. Well, it was found that the judges and the justices would not act upon that; they would rather send them to imprisonment, and would not send them to penal servitude at all. The result of that was that that clause was repealed in 1880, and then they began sentencing them as before to the shorter sentences.

10,947. Should you be in favour of having indeterminate sentences?—No, I am not at all in favour of that. I do not believe in that at all.

10,948. For what reason?—Because the idea of an indeterminate sentence is that somebody has got some power of telling when a man is reformed, and that he is to let him out then and not before. Now, I do not believe in that man. I never knew such a man as that. I think you cannot trust anybody's judgment to that extent.

10,949. You would sooner have an automatic system of cumulative sentences of some kind?—I would rather have a system depending upon the judge. I think I should bring great pressure upon them to make use of their powers. I think the present system by which a man on being convicted half a dozen times for serious offences gets off as if he were a first offender, is contrary to policy and reason; but I should not like to have a mechanical system of cumulation; I should rather bring it about in some other way, but I think they ought to have longer frequent offenders' sentences. There is no doubt about that in my mind.

10,950. Then there is another alternative, which is that you might sentence an habitual prisoner after he has been convicted several times to a certain period of imprisonment followed by a period of detention in an establishment such as they have in Belgium; it is a sort of prison farm?—Yes, but I have had no experience of those things; I think a prison must be a prison. You must lock them up for the same reason that you lock prisoners up, in separate cells in a prison, you would have to lock them up in separate cells in this farm; you must treat them all as if they were in prison. I think the only thing like that is our ticket-of-leave system.

10,951. From what you have said, I think you would be in favour of treating the mentally weak in a separate prison?—Yes. I should either gather them all together in one prison or have a separate place for them. I should like to send them to be treated as weak people. I think if they are mentally weak they are just as much subjects for being taken care of as if they were mad; I see no difference in that respect. But a great deal depends on the length of their sentences. If a man is in for a week you cannot shift him off to a different prison.

10,952. Then supposing that this classification, such as we have been discussing, was carried out, it might help very materially the question of prison labour by concentrating certain classes under long periods of detention together?—You mean the penal boys?

10,953. There would be that class, then there would be the drunkards?—Who would be in a sort of farm prison.

10,954. Who might be in a sort of special prison for themselves, and then, if there were a system of cumulative punishment—we will call it by that name—there again the habitual offender, who very often now keeps coming in for a few months, would be kept in for a long period, and he could be taken in hand and set to some profitable work?—Taught trades?

10,955. Yes, taught a trade?—Yes. I do not know that it would settle the prison labour question, because the prison labour question is more a question of finding employers. It is not sufficiently looked at in that point of view. The difficulty is not to find employment, but to find employers or customers.

10,956. It is also the question of actual work to be done in the prison, for instance, in my own Department of the Office of Works, I have asked questions about that, and they say that the work done in prisons is too rough; there is not enough finish about it?—I think that is very likely. I do not quite know to what work you refer, but that would probably be the characteristic of working people who were only learning a trade.

10,957. I am referring to the furniture of public buildings of all kinds?—You could not expect to make any good furniture except by long apprenticeship; furniture is too refined and difficult a thing.

10,958. They also speak of baskets and mats as not being quite perfect?—Yes, we make baskets and mats, largely.

10,959. I notice that the Office of Works at present gives very few orders indeed to the prisons?—Well, we always bombard the public offices, and sometimes we succeed, sometimes we do not; but I have no doubt that if there are such things as baskets wanted, we could do it. We make them very largely for the Admiralty and the War Department.

Sir E. F. Du Cane, K.C.B., R.E.

17 Dec. 1894.

10,960. Under the present system in the Department the supervision of labour rests generally with the Commissioners?—Yes, in the way we supervise everything. We expect the governors to find employment; that is one of their primary duties; but I am afraid it would be found that the greater part of the employment is found by us by getting it from the public offices, by making our own things, and by getting the public departments to employ us, and so on. I cannot say that we want to do more in this department of our supervision than in others, but we want the governors to find employment.

10,961. Do you think it would be desirable to give that particular class of work to a single official in the "Prisons Department"?—Well, we have got a Store Accountant's Department, and we have got Mr. Whiteley, whose special business it was when the Department was formed to look after the manufacturing business.

10,962. Is Mr. Whiteley now in the Office?—Yes.

10,963. What is his exact post?—He is called a clerk. He was manufacturer, or something of that sort, at Wakefield. When the present Department was formed we brought him up here to do the same sort of work for us. He works under the store accountant.

10,964. That is Mr. Duncan?—Yes.

10,965. Then does Mr. Whiteley go about the different prisons to look after their work?—Yes, he does everything he can do by the way of starting afresh, giving hints to governors. Anything he can do in the way of promoting work it is his business to do.

10,966. Do you think the best arrangement is now made as between the convict and the local prisons with regard to the work they are doing?—I think so. They send to the convict prisons that which requires the longest training, such as tailoring, shoemaking, and so on.

10,967. Of course, the great practical difficulty arises partly from the difficulty of finding work and partly from the short sentences?—The short sentences are an almost insuperable difficulty, but, apart from that, the difficulty is to find somebody who will consume our work.

10,968. (Dr. Bridges.) With reference to the question of the weak-minded prisoners, whom we have been speaking about, I think the question of insanity in prisons is one that has given you a great deal of trouble and anxiety?—Well, we have had a great deal of attack about it; but I do not know that it has troubled me very much.

10,969. We have had a great many exaggerated statements in the papers with regard to that, but, it would appear from your last report that, leaving out from the cases of insanity there reported the great mass of the cases which were remanded there simply for observation, and where many of them were in a state of insanity when they were admitted into prison, leaving all those cases out, there would appear to be about 50 cases out of 350 in which insanity broke out after removal to prison, and about a month, or more than a month after imprisonment. Now the first question I would ask you is this, is not that a very much larger proportion than occurs amongst 10,000 of the adult population of almost any class in the country?—I am afraid I am not very well up in those figures.

10,970. If you look at the last report of the Lunacy Commissioners I think you will find that among 10,000 adults of various classes, you may expect a number varying from about 5 to 15 cases of insanity to break out, which contrast rather with the 50 that you have here?—Well, I am not prepared to say anything about that, but I should say that they ought to be compared with the same class of people from whom criminals are drawn. Are the people who supply the criminal population of the prisons up to the level of all the rest of the population generally? I think perhaps they are criminals, because they are not up to the level, morally, mentally, or physically.

10,971. Your impression would be that the class from which criminals are drawn is a class mentally below the average of the population?—Certainly, mentally, physically, and morally.

10,972. And, therefore, you would expect reasonably a larger number of cases of insanity to arise from 10,000 of them than from 10,000 of any other class?—Certainly.

10,973. That would be most natural to expect, of course. Assuming that to be the case, assuming that the prison population, which we will take as 10,000, contains a very large proportion indeed of people below the average of mental health, would it not follow that the prison system should be rather directed with a view, at any rate, not to intensify that morbid predisposition?—Yes.

10,974. I was going to ask you further how far you considered that certain features of prison life may possibly develop the seeds of insanity previously existing, and principally the separate system. I do not mean the system of isolation, because I am aware your system is not "isolation," but, I mean your separate confinement as it is carried out?—I think if separate confinement is combined with occupation and with some sort of variety from the visits of officers, and so on, it ought not to have any effect in the way of developing insanity.

10,975. In the case of local prisons, where you have prisoners suffering the ordinary sentence of ordinary prisoners, it is not, I believe, the rule that a man should be under separate confinement for more than about a month?—He has separate confinement during the whole of his sentence of imprisonment, but, practically, they, most of them, come out, if their sentences are long, after a time to do work about the prison.

10,976. I mean to say that in such a prison, for instance, as Wandsworth, we saw a great number of the prisoners employed at associated labour under careful supervision?—Yes, a certain number.

10,977. There were workshops which were carefully supervised at which the people were in association, and so far, of course, you can hardly say that they were placed in separate confinement except during the night; but I was rather asking with regard to the prisoners kept for their first nine months?—That is convicts.

10,978. Yes. Relaxations of that kind, of course, are not permitted with regard to that class. The convicts during their first nine months do not work in association?—No, they are all in separation entirely.

10,979. They are entirely in separation?—Yes.

10,980. Therefore, in their case the nine months is passed as a degree of separate confinement very much more rigid than anything that exists in the local prisons?—I think it is very likely that a number of the local prisoners are brought out from their absolute separation sooner than nine months, but it is not necessary that they should be. It is not part of their regular defined order or system, but it is because they are selected to go to the kitchen, or they are selected to go to building work, or something like that. But with the convicts it is a rigid nine months, and during that nine months the separation is equal in both cases. I mean to say that the separation in the convict prison case is no greater than the separation in the local prison case so far as it lasts.

10,981. Except that association is never permitted in the case of convicts, whereas it is permitted in the case of local prisoners?—Yes, with reference to the first nine months.

10,982. Has the Department taken the opinion of what I may call mental experts with regard to the possible injurious effects of separate confinement?—There has been a great deal of discussion and correspondence on it 40 or 50 years ago. There was an immense deal of discussion at that time, and in the year

1888 Dr. Gover analysed all the reports that were made, in order to test by subsequent examination what there was in them. It was at that time that they came to the conclusion that no more than nine months ought to be enforced. Subsequently to that the local prisons were established on the separate confinement system, and, theoretically at all events, prisoners have passed two years in separation, and nobody has ever found any harm to come of it. In fact, I think Dr. Gover's figures tend to show that the insanity rate decreases the longer they stop in the prison; that is to say that they are more liable to become insane, taking the figures, during the earlier months, showing that the length of imprisonment has nothing to do in inducing insanity.

10,983. In the case of a prisoner with regard to whom there is any suspicion that he is mentally unsound, the doctor, I understand, has the power, and also the duty, of modifying the system, has he not? I I mean he places him under special observation?—Yes, and when he has come to any conclusion he calls in the justices, and they certify him if he is insane.

10,984. Insanity, of course, is a very well-marked thing, and even mental imbecility, you may say, is a very well marked thing; but I should suppose there are a great number of cases in which the degree of mental unsoundness may be so slight as to take a great deal of skill to find it out?—Yes, it must be so.

10,985. What would you say to a proposal that has been suggested to us several times, that the prison medical officer should have had some amount of special training in lunacy, and that it should be a condition for his appointment that he had spent something like six months in an asylum, with a view of familiarising himself with insanity?—Well, I do not know what effect that would have in our getting candidates to come forward. It might possibly be done in cases where we have got a medical officer solely in our own employ. That, I think, would be possible, but in all the other prisons, where we have got a local practitioner, we could not expect him to do so.

10,986. But at any rate such a proposal might apply to the larger prisons?—Certainly, it might apply to the large prisons.

10,987. You would not see any objection to it?—That requires consideration. The difficulty about it is this: You will first of all have to take a man into your service as being a fit man. Then you must send him to this lunatic asylum and pay him as medical officer to be there whilst he is being educated. You could not make it a condition that nobody should be appointed who had not been in a lunatic asylum, because that would limit the area of selection so much.

10,988. Are medical officers appointed in the way in which other people are appointed to the public service; that is to say, do they apply and put down their names?—They apply and put down their names, and we send them forms to fill up to show their career. Then we do our best to select the best men, and the Secretary of State appoints whom he likes.

10,989. Is there generally a pretty fair competition for the appointment of medical officer to the large prisons?—Medical officers of large prisons are appointed by promoting assistant medical officers who are already in the service. There is a large competition sometimes among the local doctors for appointment to other prisons, sometimes for ridiculously small amounts. We have sometimes 17 or 18 people applying for an appointment of 200*l.* a year.

10,990. I was rather going to ask you a question on that, which is, whether you think that the principal medical officer is sufficiently well remunerated?—These questions have been under consideration very often. Of the medical officers in the convict prisons, the largest one gets 450*l.*, rising to 550*l.*, and a house. The smaller, or third class man, gets 300*l.* a year, rising to 390*l.*, and a house.

10,991. And in the local prisons?—In the local prisons they vary; in the largest ones we will say, one has 400*l.*, rising to 500*l.*, and in the others 300*l.*, rising to 390*l.* There is another who has 250*l.* Altogether, there are six more who have 250*l.*, and five more who have 200*l.* I do not think it is very much.

10,992. Would not it be the fact that in a prison, like Holloway, where such a very large number of people are sent for observation as to their state of mind, the position of a medical officer somewhat resembles that of a superintendent of a lunatic asylum?—We lately got the Secretary of State to give us a higher class officer at that prison for that reason; we got what we call "a first-class medical officer." The medical officer there is paid 400*l.* a year, rising to 500*l.* There are six of that class who receive 400*l.*, rising to 500*l.*, and a house.

10,993. Coming for a moment back to the question of the convict prisons, and the health of the prisoners there, I observe that in the last report the average number of sick throughout the year was 176, taking the whole of them?—Yes.

10,994. And that there were 2,000 infirmary cases. Is not that, perhaps, rather a large proportion out of the 3,400. I will not say the "infirmary" cases, because I do not know what that means?—That means that so many people applied on one day or another.

10,995. Yes, for infirmary treatment?—I do not know whether it is large. I have always understood that the health of our prisoners is very creditable.

10,996. The report from Parkhurst says, that of the 430 prisoners received nearly all were invalids?—Yes, it is an invalid prison.

10,997. The system is to take the convicts that come from the local prisons, who are invalids?—Not the local prisons—the convicts. All the convict invalids are concentrated now at Parkhurst.

10,998. But at Dartmoor also?—A certain number at Dartmoor also. There are certain classes at Dartmoor, but Parkhurst is the principal invalid prison now.

10,999. I was not quite sure whether that meant that people had come down from the nine months in the local prison at Parkhurst?—Well, if they were invalids when they were received, or when they were in the local prisons, they would go to Parkhurst at once; but they might develop some malady or some constitutional ailment during the course of their sentence in the other prison, and they would be sent to Parkhurst. Parkhurst is, in fact, the invalid prison. It used to be at Woking, but Woking, which held 700, was given up, and we established Parkhurst in its place.

11,000. I suppose I may take it that you would hardly see your way to encouraging any modification of the separate system in the case of convicts throughout their first nine months, even though the doctor may be of opinion that some modification of it would be advisable?—If he thought they ought to be in association, I think he would put them in association. There is no doubt about it, but the rule, I hope, will not be altered (and I think that it is a very successful rule), to give them nine months first of all in separation.

11,001. (Chairman.) A case was brought to the notice of the Committee at Wormwood Scrubs in which the visiting justices had inflicted an illegal punishment. As a matter of fact that was actually never carried out; but have you ever known in your experience of a punishment being carried out which the visiting justices had no power to inflict, other than the dietary punishment, which stands on rather a different footing?—I do not recollect anything about such a thing.

11,002. Except in the Wormwood Scrubs' case?—I do not know that I recollect that.

11,003. It was a case in which a man named "H. E." was sentenced to 42 days in a punishment cell?—I have heard of H. E.'s case, but I forget the details of it.

Sir E. F. Du Cane, K.C.B., R.E. 17 Dec. 1894.

11,004. He was removed to Wandsworth, and the governor then drew attention to the fact that it was an illegal punishment; and I think an instruction was given to the governor that he was to observe the law. With that exception you do not know of any cases that have arisen?—Yes, I think there was something else; because there was something about ironing prisoners, and we had to do something to prevent it. There were irons put on to two prisoners for some other reason than to restrain them, in fact, for punishment. We heard of that, and we asked the Secretary of State to make a rule upon it.

11,005. That was done two years ago, I think?—Yes.

11,006. With regard to the authority of the prison commissioners, a regular board meeting is not often held?—Not very often. It is held just when it happens to be wanted; not so often as it used to be, because it is less often wanted now than it used to be.

11,007. The system works automatically?—Yes, each Commissioner has his own district, and disposes of what he can; and what he cannot he sends on to me, or consults with the other commissioners upon; then whenever anything has to be done which requires discussion, we meet and settle it if it is anything of importance.

11,008. That is only when occasion arises?—That is only when the necessity arises, and when anything of importance has to be settled.

11,009. Do you see any disadvantage in arranging for criminals to be preached to by the outside clergy now and again?—It would be a good thing to do, I think, and a very good thing. I heard a sermon preached by an outside clergyman yesterday. I was in a prison chapel, and I heard one from the Dean of the Chapel Royal, St. James' Palace.

11,010. The sub-Dean?—Yes the sub-Dean. It is a very good thing, I think.

11,011. Do you think it would be advisable to have anything in the shape of lectures for prisoners?—I see no harm in it at all; it might do good, perhaps.

11,012. I suppose you would agree generally that anything which would elevate a prisoner's mind ought to be encouraged?—Certainly. Of course one has got to consider all sorts of things in connexion with that. You must have the time for it, and warders do not like to be kept away from their recreations, and so on; but in the abstract I am in favour of it. I should like to teach them singing and music, it would do them no harm. I do not know that I should dare to propose it, but I should like it.

11,013. If they had any aptitude or qualification for it, you would like to teach them music or anything like painting or wood carving?—You cannot teach painting in a class, I think; but you might teach them music if you were to pick out your men. Still I do not put this forward as a practical proposal.

11,014. Still you would if you could?—Yes I would if I could.

11,015. With regard to the schooling, are you satisfied with the general working of the present system—are you satisfied with the results?—Well, I think we do as much as it is necessary to do; we have always found that if you get a lot of prisoners in a class together, they abuse the position. They talk and they traffic, and they do not use it for the purposes of education; therefore, we have always for a great many years in the convict prisons, and the local prisons too, had the education cellular; that is to say, that a man practically teaches himself, except when he is in the very lowest stage of education, with the occasional assistance of the schoolmaster. What we think now is that, as there is compulsory education outside, there is not so much necessity for teaching in the prisons as there was 50 years ago when the question was started. Moreover, we found that prisoners who had been taught in prison, and had made some progress, when they came back under subsequent sentence were just as ignorant as they were when they came to us first of all. So that it is a waste of labour as to a great part of it, because they go on being educated for two, three, or four months, as the case may be, and then they go out and do not keep it up. It is gone, and is no use at all to them.

11,016. And you think it is advisable that schoolmasters should be uniformed officers?—I think so. We copied that from the practice that existed in the local prisons before. The greater part of them were warders, who were paid something extra for teaching and doing the schooling business. We adopted the same principle, only we added very largely to the number, and we made them go through a certain course of examination to show their fitness.

11,017. Are there great advantages in a female prison being governed by a member of the medical profession?—I think so; at our old establishment that we used to have at Woking, there was a lady superintendent at the head of the female prison. We found it very difficult to get a really good woman at the head of a place like that. There are very few women who know how to do it. We found that whilst she was in charge she always used to go and consult the medical officer on the other side, who was the head of the male prison, and therefore, when she retired, we thought it was a good opportunity of putting a governor at the head of both the male and female prison, and for myself, I think it has been a very good move.

11,018. Have you formed an opinion as to how many women a matron can exercise a sufficient moral control over?—Well, there were 700 women at Woking, with a matron at the head, and a chief superintendent under her. There are regular grades for the matron, and so on. I do not know that I have ever heard that there was any difficulty in managing to exercise a crotrol over them.

11,019. Nothing has been bought to your notice in particular in connexion with that?—No; I have no doubt at all that the larger the number the more difficult it is to get a woman to do it properly.

11,020. Are you in favour of appointing lady visitors?—"Lady visitors" has two meanings. We have got lady visitors to all our prisons now, who come in and look after the prisoners with a view to when they go out; but if you mean by "lady visitors," ladies who do what the magistrates do, that is another thing.

11,021. No; I rather mean ladies to see the women prisoners with a view to exercising some moral influence over them?—I think in the local prisons we have adopted that plan, and it is very good. We did not find it very successful when we had lady visitors in the convict prisons. They never seemed to get on with the staff, and they were not thought very much of. People talked to me of them who were independent of the matter entirely, and they did not seem to think they did any good, or very little good, at all events.

11,021*a*. There has been some evidence to show that there has been a considerable amount of crowding of women on their first reception, where the reception cells are insufficient in number?—At what particular place?

11,022. I think Strangeways was mentioned in connexion with women?—I know there has been some difficulty at Strangeways; but if there is any difficulty we must get over it somehow.

11,023. You agree that it is not desirable they should be together on reception?—No. That is a matter on which a great deal depends on the organizing power of the governor. Sometimes they will put them in there, and not examine them, and let them wait and not pass them into the ordinary cells until they become crowded. Another governor will keep the place clear continually. Then they cry out that there are no more cells, and they are starved for room, when it is their own want of organization.

11,024. At present it is rather difficult to draft prisoners off at short notice. Governors have no discretionary power of their own to draft them off?—Well, we cannot send a prisoner from one prison to another without the Secretary of State's warrant.

11,025. Does not that make it rather a long business?—We act on the faith of the Secretary of State's warrant coming to us quickly. But if we had the power to act directly ourselves it would be a very reasonable and proper power to give. I see no reason against it, and it would save the Secretary of State an immense deal of trouble in signing warrants.

11,026. A governor would then telegraph up to you, supposing there was an emergency, and he expected a large accession of prisoners, and you would telegraph down?—What we expect the governor to do is, when they are at all getting into high water, to send us up a list of prisoners for removal, and then we send down to him to remove those prisoners if he finds it necessary, but not to remove them unless he does. He has got that list in his possession, but he must have a personal warrant for the removal. We could not telegraph to remove 15 prisoners, but we must give him a warrant to remove individuals. There must be a warrant or authority for the removal of particular individuals, but there is no difficulty at all about doing that with proper foresight.

11,027. If it was possible to establish a home for discharged prisoners, and if it were shown that this home worked satisfactorily; that trades were taught which enabled the men to get places; and also that it was a sort of break between prison life and a free and honest life, I suppose you would approve of such homes being started?—I am not favourable to the homes at all. I would like to see these people come from the prison to an employment, and they ought not to be collected together any more. I think it is a disadvantage to bring them together again. We have been taking an immense deal of pains all the time we have had them in prison to keep them apart, and I think it is a mistake, if it can be avoided, to bring them together again. I think the thing to do is to get employers to take them from the prison almost. What you are speaking of is very like what used to be the intermediate system in Ireland. That had a great deal of vogue at one time, but I did not think much of it myself.

Sir E. F. Du Cane, K.C.B., R.E.

17 Dec. 1894.

11,028. I quite follow you in saying that you ought to prevent association after coming out of prison, where you can get employment directly for the men, but a large number of men cannot get employment directly, and then they go into the common lodging houses and associate there under very unfavourable conditions with ex-prisoners?—In the choice of two evils you must choose the less, and, I dare say, the regulated home would be the less. I believe there was one like that at Wakefield. Lord Houghton, I think, established something of that sort, and it turned itself at last into a mat making establishment, and finally became a rival to the prisons in mat making; so that those things are liable to occur. Mrs. Meredith's laundry is something of that sort, and people differ in opinion of that laundry.

11,029. The Salvation Army, I believe, have got a home for about 150, now?—I have never seen it. I think it may be the less of two evils, but I think it is a thing to avoid.

The witness withdrew.

The proceedings were adjourned sine die.

TWENTY-FIRST DAY.

House of Commons, No. 14 Committee Room.

Thursday, 7th February 1895.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P. (CHAIRMAN); and

SIR JOHN EDWARD DORINGTON, Bart., M.P.
JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, Esq., M.B., F.R.C.P.
ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Esq., M.P.
ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis; and
MISS ELIZA ORME.

JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

Mr. J. J. RUDGE and Mr. J. H. WALKER called and examined.

Mr. J. J. Rudge and Mr. J. H. Walker.

7 Feb. 1895.

11,030. (Chairman.) I think, Mr. Rudge, you are the general secretary of the National Flint Glass Makers' Trade Union?—(Mr. Rudge.) Yes.

11,031. And, Mr. Walker, I think you are the secretary of the Manchester District Flint Glass Makers' Union?—(Mr. Walker.) Yes, I am the Manchester district corresponding secretary and president of the executive for the whole trade.

11,032. May we take it that speaking generally on the particular point that you have come to give evidence upon, that you represent the views of the trade unionists?—(Mr. Rudge.) Well, in particular on that point I may say that we had a resolution that was passed by the Trades Union Congress relative to foreign prison labour. They passed that resolution. We also have been requested by the Parliamentary Committee to attend here.

11,033. That resolution was passed this year I understand?—Yes.

11,034. At Norwich?—At Norwich.

11,035. A debate took place last year at Belfast?—Yes.

11,036. Do you happen to have the amendment that was moved on that debate?—Yes.

11,037. Could you just give us the terms of it?—The amendment moved was as follows: "And this "Congress further considers it desirable that the "Industrial Act should be amended so as to effectually "check the practice of placing upon the public "market in competition with the products of skilled "craftsmen articles manufactured in reformatories "and industrial schools, and also to prevent the "partial training of youths in skilled trades for the "purpose of sending them out to supplant qualified "adults." That is the amendment. I may say at once distinctly that we do not approve of this amendment. We quite approve of a technical training for juvenile prisoners provided that the products should be utilised in the institutions, that is, in the reformatories or industrial schools, so that eventually they should come out into the world and be useful citizens. We do not object to that at all.

Mr. J. J. Rudge and Mr. J. H. Walker.

7 Feb. 1895.

11,038. Can you tell me what happened to the amendment—was it carried?—No, the amendment was defeated, and the resolution as originally moved was agreed to.

11,039. Then will you read the resolution?—The resolution was: "That in the opinion of this "Congress it is highly desirable that so much of "the Industrial Act, 1886, as compels magistrates to "commit children to prison prior to being sent to a "reformatory should be repealed; and it be an instruc- "tion to the Parliamentary Committee to take such "steps as should bring this about."

11,040. Then I understand you do not object to the training of juvenile prisoners, and you do not object to the production by prisoners generally of articles which would be consumed by the prisons or by the reformatories?—I am speaking now distinctly with relation to juvenile prisoners. With adult prisoners of course it would be entirely different.

11,041. Then let us limit it to juvenile prisoners. You do not object to their being trained in skilled trades and to their producing what is necessary for the reformatories and prisons?—Providing the products are utilised in the reformatories or in the industrial schools. We think that they should have an industrial training. I believe I can say that as trade unionists we distinctly approve of it.

11,042. Then passing to prisoners generally, what is the objection to them?—To adult labour?

11,043. Yes, to adult labour?—Well, formerly, of course, you know as well as I know they used to manufacture mats and brushes and different kinds of articles in the prisons, but that has been stopped; and since it has been stopped of course it has benefited free labour in various industries. Now if we are to go back and to allow prison labour to produce these articles and to bring them out and place them on the market in competition with free labour, I am quite confident that it will be destruction to many of the minor trades in the country.

11,044. You say that the cessation of mat-making and brush-making in prisons has benefited free labour; but, as a matter of fact, I do not think the wages in those industries have risen. It is rather the contrary during the last few years?—Yes, I should be prepared to go with you on those lines and say what you are saying; but, as a matter of fact, it would find employment for free labour although wages have not gone up.

11,045. Do not you think that the whole question of prison labour so far as the outside markets are concerned, has been very much exaggerated?—Well, I do.

11,046. Do you know the estimated value of the prison labour?—Of English prison labour?

11,047. Yes, of English prison labour?—No.

11,048. I think it is under 120,000*l.*?—Yes, it would not be very great.

11,049. That is very small, do not you think so?—Yes.

11,050. Assuming that I am correct in that, that is an almost infinitesimal proportion of the labour of the country?—Yes, it is.

11,051. Then that being so the main consideration would be the welfare of the prisoners in relation to the community?—Yes.

11,052. The great question and the most important question that we have to consider in regard to the prison system is the prison punishment as a deterrent from crime, and prison discipline as a reformatory influence on the prisoners confined?—Just so.

11,053. Then if it can be shown that certain branches of labour are essentially desirable and almost necessary for the proper industrial training of the prisoners, how far is it right to interfere with that consideration on account of the very small proportion which prison labour bears to outside labour?—Well, it is a very important point that you have raised, sir. I may admit at once that morally and physically labour is beneficial to the prisoners; but at the same time that I assert that, I assert that the same thing applies to free labour.

11,054. Certainly?—Well, it is a very delicate point to decide. If all the consideration is to be granted to prison labour and none at all to free labour, then I think it is a very serious matter indeed; because as workmen we have to consider this: in the first place we have to maintain these prisoners. They are maintained out of the taxes of the country. Well, if we are going to maintain them and at the same time deprive ourselves of the opportunity of a livelihood it would be a very serious matter indeed for free labour. But I do assert that there ought to be some means of labour provided for prisoners, believing that it is both morally and physically beneficial; but if their products (which is entirely a different thing altogether) are going to be placed on the market and deprive free labour of the opportunity of a livelihood, then from my idea and my opinion respecting prisoners at the present time, the sooner all free labourers become prisoners the better it will be for themselves.

11,055. I do not think they would find it so when they got into the prison?—Well, I look at it in this way, there is a great consideration for the prisoners; there is greater consideration to-day possibly than ever there has been for prisoners. They are sure of a maintenance; they are always sure of a bed and lodging. They are sure of medical attendance; they are always secure from the elements we have to face. They are pretty well secure even against the present severe weather. They are always certain of their breakfast. Now it is not so with free labour.

11,056. Do not take me as saying that I consider that prisoners should be put into direct competition with free labour. What we have to do is to find suitable labour for the training and occupation of prisoners with the least possible interference with free labour outside. That is our object. But take for example this question of mat-making. All expert witnesses agree that that is an industry which is pre-eminently suitable for prisons. There are various questions which we need not go into now in connexion with prison discipline which make associated prison labour difficult, and which preclude altogether various industries; but mat-making is, from a prison point of view, a pre-eminently desirable occupation for prisoners. Well, the question is, whether that being so on account of its coming into competition with outside labour, that that very desirable occupation is to be taken away altogether from prisoners?—Well, I must admit that it is a very awkward thing to decide, because at the same time as I admit that labour is beneficial both for prisoner and outside, what means you would adopt to bring about the least possible harm that could possibly occur so far as outside labour is concerned, I cannot say. I really do not know any means at all.

11,057. I think it was the fact that the mat-making was developed as a prison industry when it hardly existed in the country, and that the mat-making industry outside grew up under, and in spite of, the competition of the prison labour?—It is suffering to-day seriously from the effect of the prison labour; I do not say English but foreign.

11,058. But is not it the fact that the industry so far as it is suffering from competition is suffering much more from foreign competition than from prison competition?—Yes.

11,059. Or to put it more exactly, it is suffering more seriously from competition than it had to face a few years ago?—Yes.

11,060. I rather understood from your letter that you were not prepared to go quite so far as to say that it is not desirable that any prison products should be put upon the outside market. I was under the impression that your view was that no products of prison labour should be put upon the outside market except at the fair market price?—Well, that is a means of controlling it. If it has to be so, then of course if you could rigidly draw up some regulations so that this labour shall be put into the market at a market price, and at a trade union rate, then I do not think the trade unions would fall out with you.

11,061. Of course it would be possible to carry on the manufacture in prisons with a minimum disturbance of outside labour; for instance, outside mat-making of course is carried on in certain centres. If two or three prisons were selected at the furthest points from those centres, the output, I suppose, would not do any harm?—No, but it would not be just to allow the products to come into the market and compete; that is by competing at a less price.

11,062. But I am assuming that they were put into the market at a standard price?—At a standard rate, a trade union rate, I do not think we could very well fall out with that.

11,063. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Providing in fact they do not work on the cutting system, you do not object?—It is reasonable, taking into consideration the moral and physical welfare of the prisoner; but at the same time that I admit that, you know it is very dangerous indeed unless we have rigid regulations to the effect that they should be put upon the market strictly at the market rate, and as if the work had been done at the trade union rate of wages, and all things of that kind in connexion with the trade. There should be no underselling in any way.

11,064. (Chairman.) We could not give the trade union rate of wages to the prisoners?—No, but you should sell as if you had.

11,065. You have no objection from the trade union point of view to the practice of supplying the Government Departments with the articles produced by prison labour?—Now that is another very important question, because if you do that in the same way it is free labour that is going to suffer. If these prisons supply the Government, then it must take the work away from free labour.

11,066. But then the case stands rather on a different ground, does it not? In the case of supplying Government Departments the articles supplied are probably of a special character, and the demand for those would constitute a special class of work, which would have to be set up in consequence of that demand; and if the Government, instead of putting that demand upon an outside manufacturer, confined it to the prisons or to its own Government Departments, you would not have outside manufacturers set up at all. They would not be in existence?—No.

11,067. Therefore the prison labour would not come into competition in the sense that it might come into competition with an industry such as mat-making, which would be established outside and for the general public. There is that difference?—Yes.

11,068. You are aware of course that, for instance, taking the Post Office, a great deal of work is done in prisons for the Post Office, such as the pouches, belts, and bags?—Yes, but as a matter of common justice again, if the prisoners have to manufacture these things, the Government get the benefit of the products of the prisoners. We think also that we ought to have a share by way of reduction in taxation with respect to their maintenance.

11,069. Of course you do get a certain reduction in the cost of maintenance by the value of their labour?—Certainly, when it is purely and simply for the Government, but if you put it out in the open market you get a profit on their labour.

11,070. But any profit that you get either on that class of labour or on the labour given for Government purposes would really go towards the reduction of taxation?—Would it go to reduce that?

11,071. It would go to reduce the cost of the maintenance of the prison?—Well, if it would do that then we should get the benefit of it.

11,072. In the old days some of the prisons were made perhaps not actually self-supporting, but they paid a very considerable amount towards their cost?—Yes.

11,073. If that was done you would get a very considerable reduction of the present charge. However, I think I quite see the main point of your evidence. You are fully possessed with the importance of giving to the prison population the best possible training?—Yes, juveniles.

Mr. J. J. Rudge and Mr. J. H. Walker.

7 Feb. 1895.

11,074. From the point of deterrence and reform, but you want the least possible interference with outside industry?—That is so.

11,075. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) With regard to the reduction of taxation, supposing the Navy wanted 1,000 or 100,000 hammocks, and are supplied with them from the prisons, they possibly pay the prisons nothing for those hammocks, but it correspondingly diminishes the cost of the Navy, and so you get a reduction of taxation because not so much money is wanted for the support of the Navy?—Yes.

11,076. Is not that a proper use of the prison population?—Yes, but in the same way you are taking the means of the opportunity away from free labour.

11,077. But then you say it is morally necessary or morally good for the prisoner that he should be employed?—Just so, in the same way as it is for free labour.

11,078. But if he is employed he must be either employed on productive labour or on unproductive labour?—Well, I believe it is possible to find productive labour that will not interfere at all with the free labour that is outside.

11,079. It is very desirable to find that. Will you suggest anything? Supposing they cultivate land they would compete with the agricultural labourer?—I do not know that I possibly can suggest anything; but there is picking oakum for instance.

11,080. Do you call that productive labour?—Well, I suppose it is, because there are the old rope and fibres that become useful.

11,081. In former days, the days of timber ships, it was a valuable product. Now it is a waste article, and is practically done as unproductive labour to give them employment. What is desired is to escape from unproductive employment, which is supposed to be rather deleterious to the moral fibre of the prisoner, and to employ him usefully. Then the difficulty is that the moment he is employed usefully, he undoubtedly competes with free labour?—Yes.

11,082. And the only way out of that which appears to be equitable, is that the prison labour being cheaper in consequence of being supported out of the taxes, the product of it should not be put upon the market at a less price than the trade price at which it is being produced outside?—That would mean destruction to the various trades if you did that.

11,083. Is not it rather a question of degree. Supposing, for instance, the prisons could take all the cotton manufacture of England into their hands, they would destroy the cotton manufacture?—Just so.

11,084. But supposing they took one millionth part of the cotton manufacture, would it be worth talking about?—Well, it would; because if you put that minimum part on to the market, and undersold the other, you would naturally undermine the industry.

11,085. By my previous question, I think I put it that it should not be put on the market at an under rate?—I did not notice that.

11,086. I agree with you that it is a sine qua non that the prison product should not be put on the market at a cutting rate, as compared with what it is outside. But supposing it is put on the market at the same price at which the free product is produced and sold, then considering the very small quantity that is really produced by the prisons, and the necessity, I may say, of employing prisoners productively, is there any objection to it?—No. I do not see any serious objection to that.

11,087. The statement which has been made here to-day is that the prison product is about 120,000*l.* a year, a large part of which is produced for prison purposes. Compared with the great trades of the country, is not that insignificant?—Yes, but all adds, when we know that these industries are literally wiped out as it were, and are throwing a great number of unemployed men on the streets who cannot get work. It is a very serious consideration.

Mr. J. J. Rudge and Mr. J. H. Walker.

7 Feb. 1895.

11,088. But are not you referring to some other cause than English prison labour?—There are many causes which go to make up and bring it into this position. If we can only find them out one by one, and erase them, and wipe them out, we shall then be able to get out of the difficulty. We cannot find them altogether.

11,089. Do not we come to this with which we started: that there is a necessity for employing your prisoner productively owing to moral reasons?—Yes.

11,090. Then, if that is so, must not the trades put up with that productive labour considering its necessity, provided that it is put upon the market at a proper price, namely, at a price which is not below that at which it is produced by free labour?—As I have said before, there is nothing unreasonable in it; that is, provided it is put upon the market at a fair rate. There is nothing at all objectionable in that, but still it is as desirable as possible for the benefit of free labour for the Government not to become too extensive manufacturers.

11,091. We do not want too many criminals?—No.

11,092. Do reformatory schools compete seriously. Is there any valuable output product from reformatory schools;—Not that I am aware of.

11,093. I mean that that amendment which was defeated seems to point to reformatory schools seriously competing. I was going to ask you whether there is any foundation for that?—I cannot say there is. It was moved by Mr. Simmonds, of Dublin. The amendment was: "And this Congress further consiers it desirable that the Industrial Act should be "amended so as to effectually check the practice of "placing upon the public market, in competition with "the products of skilled craftsmen, articles manufactured in reformatories and industrial schools, and "also to prevent the partial training of youths in "skilled trades for the purpose of sending them out "to supplant qualified adults." Of course we do not approve of that—quite the reverse.

11,094. You say they should not be partially trained, but properly trained?—Yes, believing it is morally beneficial for them and that there is an opportunity for them becoming useful citizens.

11,095. In fact it is the purpose of the reformatory to train them up as useful citizens?—Yes.

11,096. (Chairman.) Have you any other points you wish to put before us which you think material?—No, I have not.

11,097. I think we have elicited your general view on the subject?—Yes.

11,098. I may take it, Mr. Walker, that you concur in what has been said by Mr. Rudge?—(Mr. Walker.) Yes, I quite concur with Mr. Rudge.

11,099. And you have nothing further you wish to add?—There is just one little remark I should like to mention. Mention was made of the small quantity of goods which were formerly made, such as mats. That was before the stopping of the mat trade, but I will just mention that the mat trade is a very small trade in free labour outside, so that the small amount produced in prisons only affected a small trade, and it almost wiped that trade out.

11,100. You mean that relatively to that trade, at any rate before this industry was practically put an end to in the prisons, the prison mat-making formed a very considerable proportion of the total mat-making trade of the country?—I was referring to when the mat-making was in the prison. Before they ceased making mats in the prison the mat trade was almost gone as free labour, so that when it ceased in the prisons it increased outside.

11,101. I understand you to say that because it was a comparatively small industry in the country and at the same time was a considerable industry in the prisons there was a much greater danger of its being seriously interfered with and put an end to by prison labour?—Yes.

11,102. In addition to the mat-making industry, is there any other industry carried on in the prisons which you think specially interferes with outside labour?—(Mr. Rudge.) No, I do not know of any.

The witnesses withdrew.

Mr. J. Collett.

Mr. JOHN COLLETT called and examined.

11,103. (Chairman.) I think you are the director of contracts?—Yes, director of contracts for the Admiralty.

11,104. Can you tell the Committee what work was done for your Department by the prisons?—Yes. I have here copies of the agreements with the Prison Departments, showing everything we order from them. The chief items are coal sacks and bags, seamen's bags, hammocks, haversacks, baskets, mats, matting, and making up clothing for the Royal Hospital School at Greenwich. Those are the principal items. Of course there are a great many others of minor importance.

11,105. Do you make those contracts directly with the Commissioners?—Yes.

11,106. Do the Commissioners themselves see you on the subject?—No. The detail is done by some one from the Store Accountant's Department, and one of the gentlemen from my own department. Of course all the arrangements come under my supervision. I have seen Sir Edmund Du Cane upon the matter, but that was some time ago.

11,107. What is the value represented by the work done by the prisons?—I am afraid I have not worked that out, but it is some thousands of pounds a year.

11,108. Has there been a tendency to give more work, or the contrary, of late years?—Well, as far as I am concerned, there has been a tendency to give it when I can, but the tendency on the part of the prisons has been to refuse it.

11,109. What work have they refused?—In 1889 they were doing the tailoring work for Greenwich Hospital School, as I mentioned, and I offered to give them the supplying of the uniforms for the messengers at the Admiralty. They took it for one year, but an immense amount of delay and inconvenience was caused, and they would not undertake it again. Then in May 1891 we gave them a small order for hampers, which was basket work, and they would not take that. They said there was too much prison work for them to do it.

11,110. What was the nature of those hampers?—It was all rough work, such as they could do easily.

11,111. Unskilled work?—Yes; ordinary basket-makers' work of the roughest description. Then again in February 1892 we were taking away from the workshops in the dockyards the making of canvas dresses used by men when working in the inner bottoms of ships, where their own clothes would be spoilt. I offered them to the Prisons Department, and they said they could not take them, they had so much work in hand.

11,112. When you make a contract with the Prisons Department you know nothing, I suppose, about where the work is to be undertaken?—Yes, we do; because every year before we give them the order for the coal sacks, bags, &c., we send them the quantities and ask them where they will be made up, and this information we communicate to the different dockyards, so that they may know from which prison to receive the consignments. This paper will show exactly what I mean. It gives the quantities for the last year of the haversacks, and so on, and the initial letter against each denotes the prison where the quantities will be made up, as shown at the foot of the page. It also gives the quantities for the previous two years. This document also gives the quantities for the minor articles, such as mats and matting.

11,113. Then I understand the prisons consign direct to the dockyards?—Yes. We supply nearly all the materials from Deptford. Deptford is our receiving yard for most of the materials, and they are sent thence direct to the prisons, where they are made up and sent straight to the different dockyards.

11,114. Have you noticed any difference between the quality of work as between one prison and another?—No. It is very rough work, but I do not think there is anything to find fault with.

11,115. It is good enough?—Yes.

11,116. It is strong?—Yes; especially the coal sacks. It is simply sewing them up strongly, and putting the ropes round them.

11,117. Have you found that there has been much delay in the delivery of these orders?—There has been in this way. The system they want to work upon is totally different from the system we want to work upon. Their object naturally is to have the work distributed over the whole of the year, our orders being given for a year's requirements, whereas we desire to have it sent in as quickly as possible. Of course, the only way to meet relaisons is to keep a larger stock than is necessary, and that is what we have been in the habit of doing.

11,118. Do the prisons keep any of the stocks?—No, none at all, because we have to issue the material, and only do it to the extent of our requirements of the made up article. We have to buy the material year by year for the annual requirements.

11,119. Would it not be possible to make arrangement by which so much material should be issued to enable the prisons to keep a store?—We prefer to keep the store ourselves. It is available then at any moment, and I do not think it would suit them to store the articles at all. It is quite satisfactory as far as it goes, for it enables us to keep a larger store, say a six months' store instead of a three months' store, in order to have plenty of articles in hand, and not to be obliged to urge the prisons to complete the orders more quickly than they are supposed to do.

11,120. Then your keeping the stores makes it unnecessary for the prison to do it?—Yes, and they are enabled to work their labour more evenly throughout the year.

11,121. You are satisfied on the whole with the way the work is done?—Yes, it is done very well indeed, as far as I have heard. I have heard of no complaints.

11,122. You say you are quite prepared to give them more work if they would take it?—Of the nature they could do; but there is much work I think they could not do.

11,123. But you have specified one or two things which have been offered them and refused?—Yes.

11,124. What proportion of the hammocks used in the Navy are supplied by the prisons?—The whole of them. They do all that work. All the articles you have in that list are supplied entirely by the prisons. Mr. J. Collett. 7 Feb. 1895.

11,125. The hammocks for ships in foreign stations?—Yes, everything.

11,126. Do you find that it is necessary to reject many of the things made?—No, from my observation it very seldom happens.

11,127. Have you any suggestions to make with regard to the further development of the prison labour?—No, I do not know that I have. This work was given to them first more than 20 years ago, and we have added to it from time to time as opportunities occurred which we thought were suitable for their means of production. There are things, such as tinware, which they could do—and we do give them a certain quantity of that; but it is not entirely satisfactory, because it is all made by hand. Nowadays scarcely anything in tinware is made except by machinery. It is all stamped or pressed, and, of course, is much stronger, neater, and cheaper. Really it would not pay the prisons to set up machinery for that, as great expense would be involved, and we might change our pattern; but the little that is still done by handwork is given to them.

11,128. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) In your accounts with the prisons, is there any cash entry between you and the prisons?—Yes, there is a cash payment made by the Admiralty to the Prison Department, at the rates stated in the contracts, which are the rates for making up, we supplying the material without charge, or for supplying the material also in some cases, as in the tinware and mats and matting.

11,129. You buy the materials?—Yes.

11,130. Then the making up is also charged to the estimates?—Yes.

11,131. And you actually pay from that account?—Yes.

11,132. (Chairman.) There are a certain number of highly skilled prisoners. Would it be possible, do you think, to give any special orders for skilled work to this small class of men?—Of course we do not know what they are skilled in, and we do not know how long their skill will be available, which is a matter of great importance. I think myself that the simpler the articles are that they undertake the better.

11,133. And that it is hardly worth while bothering over a small number?—No. These things are so very important that unless you have very skilled superintendents the chances are you will get them all wrong.

11,134. An instance was given to me that at Portsmouth or Dartmoor the prisoners were engaged in making what was necessary for the Kreigspiel for the War Office, which is work of a highly skilled nature?—I have never seen the game. I had in my mind electrical apparatus.

11,135. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You would not like to trust the making of chronometers for the Navy to Portland?—Certainly not.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Primrose called and examined. Mr. Primrose.

11,136. (Chairman.) I think you are Secretary in the Office of Works?—I am.

11,137. That department gives at the present time very little work to the prisons?—Well, there are only at the present time two kinds of articles that we get from them. They are tin paper-trays and baskets for the Post Office. Formerly, until comparatively recently we also got mats from them, but in 1892 we gave up getting our cocoanut mats from them, such as door mats and things of that sort, because of the great delay in supplying them. I have here the paper on which we finally decided to give up getting these mats from the Prisons Department. There had been a great many complaints, as I heard from Mr. Bailey, who manages that part of the business, and who I think the Committee might like to ask some questions on details. He has studied this question a good deal. He gave three special instances, and they are very interesting. One was the case of an order for a single mat 4 feet by 3 feet, which was given on the 28th of August 1891. The mat was not supplied until the 18th of December, that is, nearly four months. Another order was given on the 10th of August 1891, which was also for a small mat, 2 ft. 9 in. by 1 ft. 5 in., and that was not supplied until the 16th of October. Another order which was given on the 5th of August 1891 was not supplied until the 18th of October. That is, two of the mats took two months, and one took nearly four months. That was after a great number of complaints, so that we decided to give up getting mats from the prisons, but we did not make any formal communication to them. Mr. Bailey, I think, communicated with some officer of the Prisons Department. They raised no objection, and they have never raised any complaint, nor asked us to resume obtaining these supplies from them. There was another service which they used to perform for us for some years. I think it began in the year 1884. That was carpet beating. In the year 1889 it was not very satisfactorily done. At the same time we were prepared to go on with the system, but they said there were so many objections to it, partly I think on the score of the health of the prisoners, and the noise and the dirt, that they gave it up. The matter came before the Home Office, and also before the Treasury, and we regretted very much their giving that up. We thought it might very well be done at Wormwood Scrubs, and that it would save us a considerable sum per annum. However, it was decided, principally in view of the medical officer's opinion, that it should be given up. Now we do that work by contract, which costs us 450*l.* a year, which is less than what we estimated at that time. We thought that they were doing work that would have cost us 600*l.* or 800*l.* a year. However, we have got a very cheap contract, and we do it for 450*l.* now. I do not think that at any time we have got brooms or brushes from them. At the time we gave up carpet beating they asked that, while we should give up sending them our carpets, we should obtain brushes from them. We said we were quite willing to do that for certain brushes, but we did not think they would be able to supply us with the better qualities of brush, an article of manufacture which we think is rather a specialty. We were quite willing to do that, provided the prices were not in excess, but were about the same as we were obtaining from the contractor, and the article was fairly good. At that time we told the Treasury that the total cost of brushes and brooms to us was about 1,600*l.* a year. That was, I think, only for the London supply. I do not think we took it over the whole country. Of these I think that about one half might be supplied by the Prisons Department. That would be about 800*l.* a year for the commoner kinds of brushes. Nothing, however, was done on that. Our reply was communicated to the Home Office, I suppose, but no further communication was made to us.

Mr. Primrose.

11,138. Has any special communication been made to you by the Prison Commissioners on the subject of prison labour?—No, I am not aware of any. I know of no general communication, and most of our communications with them have been of rather an informal kind; that is to say, either verbally or by notes. We have had very little direct correspondence with them; and except in this particular instance when they specially asked that we should get our supplies of brushes from them, I do not remember any case in which they have asked us specially to take articles from them. With regard to articles that we do get from them, namely, the tin trays and the baskets for the Post Office there is very considerable delay very often, I think partly owing to the fact that the particular prisons where these things are made are very remote from London; for instance, I believe the tin trays are made at Portland, and the Post Office baskets are made at Dartmoor, so that it is extremely difficult for us to get at them as it were, and to spur them on when there is delay.

11,139. You have no control as to where the things are to be made?—No.

11,140. That rests with the Prison Commissioners?—Yes.

11,141. There has never been anything in the nature of conference on the subject of prison labour between the Prison Commissioners and the Department?—No. Certainly I can speak for over eight years and I do not find any trace of that in the papers. I notice, for instance, that in 1884, which was in the time of my predecessor, Mr. Mitford, that Mr. Bailey begins a memorandum about carpet beating in this way, "In accordance with your "instructions I have communicated with the Convict "Prisons Department with a view to their under-"taking more work for the Board than they now "execute." Therefore presumably there had been some representation, although not an official one, on the subject of our employing the prison's labour to a greater extent.

11,142. Mr. Bailey has been the head of the Furniture Department for some time, I think?—Yes, for 10 years.

11,143. He has had the direct negotiations, I suppose, with the Prisons Department?—Yes.

11,144. Have you formed any general ideas as to whether this is work which could be extended?—I think it could to a certain extent. I think there are certain things.

11,145. Well, you have mentioned brushes to the amount of 800*l.* a year?—Yes, and there are such things as dusters. There is one matter in which by arrangement with other Departments I think a good deal of work might be given to them, and that is the laundry work of the Government. We do not do that for the different Departments now, but each Department makes its own arrangements. In some cases the office keepers merely contract, I suppose, for the washing; in others it is given out; for instance, in the Houses of Parliament the Serjeant-at-Arms has a very large amount. Some five years ago we had an idea of making a suggestion, not that we should take over the laundry work exactly, but that we should make a contract with some large laundry that they should undertake any work sent to them from any Public Department at a certain price, but we also had at the same time some idea of employing the prison labour. We understood that the prison at Manchester would be very willing to undertake all the washing there, and that there would be a considerable amount in the Post Office and so on. Well, if that work could be arranged for, that would represent in London alone something like 3,500*l.* a year, the present cost of washing to the Public Departments? in fact I think it would be really more than that, because when we made these inquiries in 1889 we sent a circular to each Department and asked what their arrangements were and what the charge on their vote was; and while some said there was no charge because it was done by the charwomen as part of their work—no charge at any rate that they could estimate—others gave it out at so much a piece, and the total of these came to about 3,000*l.* For instance, I remember that for the Houses of Parliament the washing is 300*l.* a year, principally towels and things of that sort.

11,146. You say mats were given up in 1892 because of laxity in delivery. Were the mats badly made?—I do not think we had any complaint. Perhaps Mr. Bailey can say about that, but I do not think we had any complaints; it was more the great delays. I think Mr. Bailey will tell you that he very often urged upon the Prisons Department to keep a stock of all those common articles that we were constantly asking for, so that when we sent in a demand it should be complied with immediately.

11,147. But we have just heard from Mr. Collett that with regard to the articles they have made for the prisons they have a store of their own, and therefore the necessity for a store in the prisons is not so necessary. The Office of Works has a number of things in store, I suppose?—Well, quite recently we have started a store for household articles, such as soap, candles, and small articles; otherwise we have had no store before, except we had something in the nature of a carpet store; but those are both rather innovations. The principle on which the Department has been worked until lately has been to avoid stores so as to avoid the stores accounts.

11,148. The Department which gives the orders to the prisons is not responsible for the raw material, I think?—No.

11,149. That is all found by the Prisons Department?—Yes. I ought to say that the total amount of the mat business is not very large. It is not as large as the Committee might imagine. Taking it out roughly, I find that it seems about 100*l.* a year for London. In these figures I am dealing only with London because it is extremely difficult to say what it is, taking it all over the country. There is one other industry in connexion with the laundry, that is the needlework. For instance, the sewing and hemming of dusters and towels, and things of that sort, which if there was a female prison in convenient range might be done. There is another thing, that is firewood. We might very well get bundle-wood from the prisons, I think. As a matter of fact we do not use a very great deal of that. We use faggots principally, which are a little more expensive, but I think there is a good reason for that, which is that they light the fires so much more easily in a large office where a great number of fires have to be lighted at the same time. You get the fires much more quickly, and better lighted by faggots than by bundle-wood as it is called, or split wood.

Mr. Primrose.

7 Feb. 1895.

11,150. Bundle-wood is split wood?—Yes; it is what is usually used in private houses, I think; but that requires a little care in laying, and of course in the public offices there is not very efficient service of that kind. You have not very good housemaiding, as I daresay you know.

11,151. (Miss Orme.) Would there be any objection to giving that laundry work or needle work to some of the large Rescue Homes, like for instance the East Finchley Home, the Roman Catholic Reception place?—I do not know that there would. The difficulty I foresee in regard to the laundry work is that at present each Department manages its own laundry; and unless it was with the authority of the Government generally, we should have no power to arrange with anybody of that kind. But assuming it was desired to concentrate it in one hand I do not know, provided it was well done, and an economical contract could be made, that there would be any more objection to putting it with a home of that kind than with a big laundry.

11,152. But with regard to the work you yourself have to get out in your own office you see no objection to employing a place of that sort if it is a good contract?—Well, our own is extremely small. It is not a large office.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Rowland Bailey called and examined.

Mr. R. Bailey

11,153. (Chairman.) You are the head of the Furniture Department of the Office of Works?—Yes.

11,154. And you have had personally to deal with the Prisons Department in any orders that may have been given?—Yes.

11,155. You have given some consideration to this question for some years past?—Yes, for the last 11 years.

11,156. Perhaps you might state your views generally to us, in the first instance?—Well, I may say that when I went to take charge of the Furniture Department 11 years ago, I was perfectly enthusiastic upon the subject of utilising prison labour for the purposes of our Department. I may say, perhaps, that I held, and I still hold, the view that prison industry should be confined entirely to meeting the wants of Government establishments, and as an experiment when we asked them to do our carpet beating—I do not know whether Mr. Primrose mentioned this——

11,157. Yes, he did?—I found every possible help from the Chairman of the Prisons Commissioners, and from the officials at headquarters who had direction, or supposed direction, of this business. But in a few months difficulties began to occur, and at the very moment when we were most busy we were asked to stop sending carpets, which was obviously impossible; and, although we were helped on that occasion, yet, after three or four years, the Prisons Commissioners decided that they could no longer do the work. I visited many of the prisons, and saw all the industries there. I was for a very long time in communication with the heads of the Prisons Department, and it was arranged that they should make more mats for us than hitherto, if possible; that is, different sorts of mats, and that they should make some of our baskets, as well as one or two other kinds of articles. Several things which I suggested they should make, they declared themselves unable to do.

11,158. Of what kind?—Tinware generally, pails and so on. I do not know why they should not do that, because they make something of the same sort for themselves. However, one article after another had to be given up, simply on account of the heavy delay in supplying the things. For instance, we found out at one time that we had to wait on an average rather more than two months for a single mat, although these were all of precisely the same pattern, and the prisons had been asked to keep a stock of them.

11,159. They did not keep a stock of them, I think?—They were asked to do so, and they arranged to do it, but in fact they did not.

11,160. We have been told they do not keep stocks at the present time?—I can quite understand that from the delay that takes place with our orders.

11,161. Do you think that this inability to supply the articles is due to the inferiority of prison labour or is partly due to want of organization in the Department?—I should say it is chiefly due to want of organization. One can understand that the prison product must be inferior, as it is undoubtedly inferior to the product of free labour; but it was quite clear to me that the prison warders did not like it. I understand that they got nothing extra for superintending the manufacture. It was a nuisance which interfered with the discipline. The Governors could have no object in keeping the manufacture, and so the thing has died out to a very great extent, so far as we are concerned.

11,162. Do you think from your observation that there is an efficient placing of such orders as the Prisons Department might get among the right kind of prisoners or the right kind of prisons?—I think there should be no difficulty whatever in allocating the industries to the proper centres.

11,163. You think that is done?—I think there should be no difficulty about it.

11,164. But do you think it is done?—In my judgment it is not. I cannot understand, for instance, the wisdom of making baskets for the Post Office at Dartmoor, nor of making the tin paper-trays which we want in London at Portland. It seems to me that industries of that kind might very easily be conducted in some London prison. Again, I think that it was not perhaps the best possible thing to do to propose to do the washing for the Public Offices of London at Manchester.

11,165. When you are brought into relation with the Prisons Department what officials do you see?—I first saw Sir Edmund Du Cane, that is some years ago now. I also saw the store accountant, Mr. Duncan, who gave me every possible assistance. There was no question as to the desire of the Prisons Commissioners to manufacture for us.

Mr. R. Bailey.

11,166. But there is not any special Department, is there, in connexion with the Commissioners which is responsible for looking after the general question?—No. It seems to me that the present state of things could not exist if the prison industries received the attention or had the weight, for instance, at the Board that other things have. Everything is subservient to discipline. For disciplinary purposes, the parties who were beating carpets were marched back several times in the day during the busiest season, and so it is with other things.

11,167. With regard to that carpet beating, had you any reason to think yourself it was an unhealthy pursuit?—Not at all. There is a certain amount of dust, but not very much, and the beating was carried on in the open air. The prisons authorities did not find it was an unhealthy pursuit for several years.

11,168. I think Mr. Primrose stated that he imagined it was abandoned chiefly on the report of the medical officer?—The report of the medical officer was produced, it is true, but that was produced very late in the day.

11,169. Do you think that the staff rather might have objected to it?—I feel sure it came from the staff. After all the staff is only human; they get nothing for it. The work is unpleasant, and if not properly done it may lead them into trouble. What inducement has a warder to get his prisoners to work at an industry of this or any other kind? Then again there are no instructors for the different industries, as far as I can see.

11,170. Have you had much personal talk with warders on the subject?—Yes, from time to time I have seen a good many of them.

11,171. Taking these articles that have been named, there is no reason surely why prisoners should not make ordinary mats?—There is none whatever, but the thing broke down because for some reason or other the stock of mats was allowed to run right out. Under our old system it was necessary the prisons should keep the stock of mats. They made no difficulty about it, and I am quite sure the Prisons Commissioners were anxious it should be done. Afterwards came the period when the average time for supplying a mat was about two months.

11,172. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Originally then there was no difficulty in getting the mats. It was only for the last few years?—I cannot say that, because in 1883, before I knew anything of it personally, I find that our office was writing to the Prisons Commissioners complaining of the delay in supplying the prison mats, and stating they must cease to give orders if they did not get them more quickly. However, a sponge was drawn over all that, and a new start was made.

11,173. I suppose your demand was in excess of their means of production?—No, I do not think it was that at all. I think it was simply that the prisoners were called off to other industries or to no industries at all.

11,174. Were they selling mats outside at that time?—I cannot say that, but they have been making mats for us since 1857, when Sir Joshua Jebb wrote.

11,175. Did you have any mats in those days from the local prisons, before the prisons came under the Government?—No; from convict prisons only.

11,176. You are aware that mats were made in the local prisons?—Yes, I believe that was so.

11,177. (Dr. Bridges.) Have you paid any attention to carpet beating?—Yes.

11,178. I suppose you would say there was a great difference in carpet beating, whether it was carried on in a close court yard or in an open place?—When I say an open place, I mean a court-yard, a prison yard, which is fairly extensive.

11,179. A small prison yard, with high walls on each side, might produce an amount of dust which would be very disagreeable?—Yes, it might.

11,180. (Chairman.) You would say, I suppose, that it would be desirable to have a highly responsible official in the Prisons Department who should be primarily responsible for the organisation of labour?—Certainly I should regard that as of paramount importance in dealing with the things.

11,181. And with a sufficient authority to control the labour as between one prison and another, and one governor and another?—Quite so.

11,182. Then I also gather that you think it is of great importance for the development of prison industries that first the warders should have some further interest in the work of teaching and supervising the industry?—Certainly.

11,183. And that there should be a better supply of skilled artizan teachers?—Quite so, but whether they would be required temporarily only, or permanently, I should leave to the requirements of the service.

11,184. But you think there would be great advantage in having one official who could take a bird's eye view of the whole of the prisons throughout the country, and could organize the labour according to the local requirements and the individual capacities of prisons to produce certain articles?—Quite so.

The witness withdrew.

Adjourned to Saturday, the 9th instant, at 11.30 a.m., at the Home Office.

TWENTY-SECOND DAY.

Home Office, Whitehall.

Saturday, 9th February 1895.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P. (CHAIRMAN).

The Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B.
JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, Esq., M.B., F.R.C.P.
ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Esq., M.P.
ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis; and
Miss ELIZA ORME.

JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

Mr. Michael Davitt.
9 Feb. 1895.

Mr. MICHAEL DAVITT called and examined.

11,185. (Chairman.) Mr. Davitt, the Committee, of course, has had the opportunity of reading your evidence given before the Kimberley Commission, also of reading various publications of yours with regard to prison treatment, so that there will be no necessity for us to take you through all the details of the subjects which you have already given your opinion upon before the Kimberley Commission or otherwise?—Yes, I would wish to practically hand in the evidence I gave before the Kimberley Commission in 1878, in which I dealt with my own treatment and personal experience in penal servitude; and, in addition to that, I also hand in the article which you have been kind enough to say the members of the Committee have read in the "Nineteenth Century." That evidence and that article practically represent what I have got to say, only I wish to make this observation with reference to my article in the "Nineteenth Century." Of course, I say in that article that some 15 or 16 years have elapsed since I was in prison, and possibly since then there may have been some modification of the rules and regulations of which I am not now aware. Subject to those possible modifications of the discipline which I have experienced, I tender the evidence and the article to which you have kindly referred.

11,186. There are some rather material points upon which we should like to examine you to-day, and to ask you some questions more or less in detail upon. First of all, what was the term of your imprisonment, and where was it passed?—My sentence was 15 years' penal servitude. I was tried in London at the Old Bailey, on the charge of treason felony. Previous to conviction, I had experience, as an untried prisoner, of Clerkenwell House of Detention and Newgate. After sentence, I had experience of Millbank as a probationary prison. Then I was sent to Dartmoor, where I was detained for two years. I was then transferred to Portsea convict prison, where I remained only six weeks. I was then sent back to Dartmoor, where I was incarcerated until I was discharged upon ticket-of-leave on the 19th December 1877. Then in 1881, I was re-arrested and sent back to penal servitude by Sir William Harcourt, who was at that time Home Secretary, and I was detained in Portland Convict Prison for 15 months, so that I have had something like eight years and nine months' experience of penal servitude altogether, and about six months' experience of Irish prisons as a first-class misdemeanant.

11,187. Before that sentence, I understand you were detained in Clerkenwell and Newgate?—Yes, and with your permission, I wish to say a few words as to the treatment of untried prisoners, a subject I did not touch upon either in my evidence of 1878, or in my recent article. I think it is very harsh and very unjust to treat untried prisoners as if they had been already convicted for some offence. The theory of the law in England, of course, is that a man is held to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty, but my experience as an untried prisoner leads me to this conclusion, that prisoners before trial are subjected to very unjust treatment. They are put in what are practically punishment cells, they are denied access to newspapers, they are denied visits from friends, except in the presence of prison officials, and almost all other privileges which I think presumably innocent people are entitled to.

11,188. Of course, if unconvicted prisoners like to pay for certain things they can have them?—Yes, if they like to pay for their food it will be sent in to them, but I was not allowed to see any newspapers during the two months that elapsed from the time of my arrest until the time when I was convicted. I was not allowed to see any of my friends except in the presence of a warder, and when my solicitor came to have interviews with me, the warder was practically present. I do not know whether these things have been changed since then; possibly they may have been. Then, again, untried prisoners are roughly handled by the police, and jostled about in a very unwarrantable manner, when being taken from the cells to the magistrate's court.

11,189. When you say you were confined in what was practically a punishment cell, did you mean a cell that was at all dark?—The ordinary cell in which prisoners are undergoing short sentences is a cell into which the untried prisoner is put for a location. I do not say it is the real punishment cell, or, as we in prison called it, "the chokey," but it is the cell men are detained in when undergoing short sentences in these respective prisons.

11,190. What about the diet?—If untried prisoners do not provide their own food they have the same diet as a prisoner has who is undergoing punishment.

11,191. That is a diet which they call No. 3 B.?—The diets in my prison experience were not numbered in that way, and, therefore, I am ignorant of diet number 1, 2, or 3. We had probationary diet, the ordinary diet, and punishment diet.

11,192. In point of quantity, was it sufficient?—No. I think I expressed myself strongly upon that matter in my evidence in 1878.

11,193. I mean the untried prisoners' diet?—I could not eat it while other food was obtainable. I had my own food brought in. I had it in Newgate for two days, but I could not eat it.

11,194. You underwent the nine months' solitary confinement after sentence?—Yes, in Millbank. Millbank has now ceased to exist as a prison, and it is therefore useless to criticise it.

11,195. Then, excepting your experience in Clerkenwell, Newgate, and Millbank, you have had no experience of imprisonment in local prisons?—No, except in Ireland.

11,196. When you were re-imprisoned in 1881, and served a further period of 15 months, were you put to solitary imprisonment, or did you go straight to labour?—No. I was taken at once to the infirmary on being received in Portland Prison. I was not well at the time, and I was located in the infirmary during the whole of the 15 months. I was not subjected to any harsh treatment or any labour. I was exceptionally treated during the 15 months I spent in Portland Prison, as compared with my experience in Dartmoor. That is, I had practically any diet I cared to ask the doctor for during the time, and I was not allowed to associate with ordinary prisoners.

11,197. I understand from your article in the "Nineteenth Century" that you have a very strong opinion on this nine months' imprisonment?—Yes; I think it is a punishment that ought to be entirely abolished. As I say in my article, I believe that if old offenders were sent at once to public works prisons after sentence, and put immediately to some useful manual labour, it would be better for them, and it would be a more humane treatment. Then, with reference to prisoners who are sent to penal servitude for the first time, I think there is a greater reason for abolishing the nine months' solitary confinement in a probationary prison. It tells doubly harsh upon those who have not been in a convict prison before to be confined in a cell for 23 hours out of every 24 for months.

11,198. Evidence has been given before us to the effect that the old hardened offender is very much afraid of those nine months?—He is very much afarid of anything like hard manual labour.

11,199. The evidence is, that he is very much afraid of the nine months' imprisonment?—That is not at all my experience.

11,200. May I ask you if you can speak of the experience of other people in this matter. Have you had any conversation with different classes of prisoners on the subject?—Certainly; with all classes of criminals you have in your convict prisons, because up to 1875 or 1876, I think, we were privileged to talk at exercise and on a Sunday, and I made it a point, while I was in Dartmoor, to get into conversation, whenever possible, with every kind of criminal that I could get to talk to; and invariably I found that those prisoners who were sent to penal servitude for the first time had a horror of the nine months' silent confinement in the probationary prisons, while the "old lags," as we called them, had nothing like the same fear of it. They used this period for malingering purposes; they resorted to their favourite plans during the nine months in Millbank, in trying to induce the doctor to send them to some invalid prison, such as Woking. I do not know whether there was any other invalid prison beside Woking; but it was generally during that period that they resorted to their well-known dodges and plans to get free from those prisons where they would be put to hard manual labour for the main portion of their sentence.

Mr. Michael Davitt.

11,201. Then, if I follow you, you can speak from having a wide experience in this matter, and you have no hesitation in saying what you have done?—Not the slightest, in re-affirming what I have said in my article; and I speak now from seven years' almost continuous intercourse with all kinds and classes of criminals. I would suggest that, if there should be an objection to doing away entirely with the nine months in solitary confinement, that it should be reduced to one month or two months in the beginning of the sentence, and one or two months at the end of the sentence, so that at the end of the sentence the prisoner would be amenable to the attentions and services of the chaplain and the schoolmaster, and every such reformatory influence as could be brought to bear upon him just before he comes out into the world again. One other very strong objection to the nine months' solitary punishment in probation is, that I think it produces insanity. I have seen several men in Millbank Prison go insane during my nine months' experience there, and I attribute it to the terrible punishment of being shut up in cold silent cells for 23 hours out of every 24 during that period.

11,202. With regard to the warders generally, did you yourself have any grave reason to complain of their conduct to you?—Yes, as being a political prisoner, that is, a Fenian prisoner, I, of course, was subjected to greater surveillance, and, I may say, to harsher treatment than the ordinary prisoners. This may have arisen from political bias, or something of that kind, in the minds of these warders. Mind, the warders of whom I had most experience in penal servitude were old soldiers or old sailors, and naturally they may have had a prejudice against me in consequence of my having been convicted of some conspiracy against the authority of the country.

11,203. Then did you observe any special harshness towards other prisoners?—Oh yes, frequently. I think I gave evidence in 1878 about prisoners being knocked down in Dartmoor by warders, when in my judgment no such treatment was at all deserved It frequently happened in Dartmoor that prisoners were felled by warders, and in punishment cells, where I was detained for several months in 1875 and 1876, prisoners have been frequently beaten underneath me in punishment cells in the night time by visiting warders. That happened often.

11,204. I suppose in those cases complaints would not always be made by the prisoners?—Well, it is all but useless for a prisoner to make a complaint in a prison against the warder. Of course he is at liberty to do so, and to see the visiting director, but if a prisoner gets the character or reputation of being a complaining prisoner, and reporting warders, then the warders are down upon him. They are troublesome prisoners, and they get run in in consequence.

11,205. We asked the directors for the return on the subject with regard to the total number of complaints against warders for the year 1894 in Dartmoor and Portland, and they only come altogether in Dartmoor to 13, and in Portland to 30?—That is in 1894?

11,206. Yes?—Well, I wish to repeat again that there is a strong disinclination amongst all prisoners to get the character of complaining of warders, because the warder has all power in keeping from the prisoner his remission of sentence. It is the warder who is in charge of a prisoner when at work who has the giving of the number of marks to the prisoner, by the earning of which he shortens his sentence. If a prisoner, therefore, complains of that warder, he fears the warder will refuse his marks and thereby prolong his punishment.

11,207. Having regard to the pay and the duties and the general conditions of service of the warders, do you think that there is any more harshness or more unsatisfactory conduct than you would reasonably be led to expect from your knowledge of human nature?—No; taking into account the training and antecedents of the class of warders you have in your convict prisons; recollecting that they are old soldiers and old sailors who have themselves undergone a very severe discipline, and who find themselves invested with a little authority and power to inflict discipline upon others, I think you explain what I would consider their harsh treatment of the prisoners under their charge. I have found in Dartmoor and in one or two other prisons a difference in the treatment of prisoners between military warders and civil warders. In Dartmoor we had a number of warders who were recruited from the population round about, men who had some agricultural training, and a few who were artisans. I found that they got along better on the whole with the prisoners than the old soldier warders. They appeared to be a little more considerate and more humane.

11,208. You were never brought into contact with the civil guard?—No, because I was not allowed outside Dartmoor Prison during the whole time I was there. Other prisoners were sent out to work on the moor to reclaim land, and others to the quarries to get stones, but I was not allowed outside the walls at all.

11,209. I understand the civil guard are not brought into contact with the prisoners?—No, they are kept at a distance. When prisoners go outside the prison walls to work, the civil guard is about 50 yards away from the ranks with his rifle to fire if a prisoner should attempt to escape. Then there are civil guards who perform the duty of sentinels round the prison walls and in the exercise yards.

11,210. Now taking this question of warders in connexion with the views that you have expressed about trifling offences in prison, do not you think that the best way of avoiding those trifling punishments would be by as far as possible improving the general status and character of the warders?—Decidedly. I would be in favour of increasing the inducements for a better class of men to go into the prison service. I would increase the pay of the warders and lessen their hours of labour, and thereby invite or entice a better class of men, with some special training, than the ex-soldier or the ex-sailor to go into the prison service as warders.

11,211. I have not got the figures of the punishments for 15 years ago, but probably you are aware that at the present time a very large proportion of the convicts go through the whole of their period without any punishment at all?—Oh yes; I think I dealt with that, if not in the article, in the book I wrote, and amongst those you will find a very large per-centage of the old hardened criminal class. They are not the worst offenders, so far as the prison rules are concerned, at all.

11,212. You say in your article, "Good behaviour "offers little if any test of the influences for moral "reform which punitive justice exercises upon "criminal character"?—Some of the most unconscionable scoundrels I met in all my experience of penal servitude were well-conducted prisoners, who defended stealing as simply a natural instinct in man, that was bound to exercise itself unless it was controlled by early moral influences and training. Upon that point which you have raised, that is, with reference to the large per-centage of prisoners who are not reported for any breach of the prison rules, what I complain of is that men who are not hardened criminals and who show exemplary prison conduct should be subjected to the same rigorous prison discipline that is prescribed for the incorrigible prisoner.

11,213. With regard to that particular class of prisoners you were just now speaking of, what you call the "irreclaimable class, who are thieves by conviction," do you see any way of dealing with those from the point of view of the community other than by long periods, not so much of imprisonment as of detention?—Well, I am not at all in favour of long periods of imprisonment. My experience, of course, forces me to take the opposite view, but I think that some special treatment is required for the incorrigible thief. I favour them being sent to some prison to be practically a prison for these hopeless cases of criminality alone. I am not prepared to suggest what would be an effective scheme for dealing with that class of criminals. It is a very big question. But I would strongly urge that that class of criminal be kept entirely apart from men less innoculated with crime. Then again, I think that these incorrigible criminals become in process of time men of very weak intellect, and I think it will be found even in the statistics issued by the prison authorities, that the prisoners who become insane are largely those who have been in prison before. Therefore I do not think it is a question of long or severe punishment, but one of detention, and, added to detention, such treatment as experts in mental disease and kindred ailments would suggest.

11,214. There are of course a considerable class of criminals who do not go in for the higher grades of their profession, so to speak, but are content with larcenies, petty thefts, pocket picking, and so on. Would you treat that class as an irreclaimable class?—Yes, if you find them beyond the age of 30. Under that age, at all events, I think, under 25 or 30, it is possible to reclaim young thieves who may have been entirely neglected in their early years, and whose thieving propensities may have been due to misfortune, bad parentage, vicious surroundings, and other circumstances.

11,215. Would you favour anything in the way of cumulative penalties for this particular class of offenders?—No, I do not believe in cumulative penalties at all.

11,216. Cumulative penalties of imprisonment, that is to say?—No, I do not.

11,217. Or cumulative penalties in the way of detention?—In the way of detention and such other treatment as would be suitable for such cases. I think that most of these hardened criminals are practically insane, and that special treatment is what is re uired for these cases.

11,218. I see you say in your article: "The day "will come, however, when a more humane and more "enlightened spirit will discover that imprisonment "based upon industrialism, and tempered with a "human sympathy that shall be guided by a deeper "knowledge of comparative criminality, will be made "more effective for reformatory ends than the de-"humanising system which at present obtains"?—Precisely. Well, in such a prison as I suggest where these reclaimable and semi-reclaimable thieves might be detained it would be possible to put into operation such influences as I have referred to.

11,219. With regard to sentences, do you think the comparative criminality of the offender, generally, and not only with regard to the specific offence that he has committed, should be taken into consideration by the judge in giving the sentence?—Certainly, in cases where he is dealing with undoubted hardened criminals, but with a view to subjecting them to such special detention and treatment as I have already referred to.

11,220. Had you any reason to find fault with the punishment awarded by the directors?—Well, I do not know what change may have taken place since I was in Dartmoor 16 or 18 years ago, but during my seven years' experience of that prison I know that floggings were very frequent, and generally, in my opinion, without being deserved. A flogging of 24 or 36 lashes is a fearful punishment to inflict for even striking a warder, and if a prisoner only knocked off a warder's hat, and did not injure his body, he was flogged.

11,221. Should you be in favour of the amalgamation of the convict and local prisons, and the application to the convict prisons of the system which now applies to local prisons in respect of the punishments of visiting committees?—Well, I cannot speak as to local prisons because I have no experience of local prisons in England at all, and upon the question of amalgamating local prisons with convict prisons I have not given that subject very much thought, but perhaps you will allow me to put it in my own way.

11,222. Certainly?—I would strongly urge the re-institution of local control as much as possible, and the decentralization of the present system. I think a great deal of what is unnecessarily harsh in the present system of penal servitude is due to a too centralized control.

11,223. Of course there has been practically no change in the convict prisons since their establishment, but you are thinking, of course, of the local control in the case of local prisons?—Yes.

11,224. I gather you would like to extend that as far as possible to local prisons, and to apply that system to convict prisons, at any rate so far as the operation of local influences in connexion with prisons is concerned?—I do not think I could go so far as to say that each convict prison should be under the government of the local authorities. I think county prisons ought to be under the government of local authorities, but with reference to convict prisons as well, I am not going to say whether it would be better or worse to have them controlled locally or by centralised officialdom here in London. I would favour independent inspection of all prisons, and would give the privilege to all magistrates and members of Parliament and county councillors to visit any convict prison or any county prison, and send an independent report of what they have seen to the Home Office.

11,225. But assuming that the supreme authority of the Government as represented by the Home Secretary and the Prison Commissioners is maintained with regard to the general prison system, so that they would be able to keep a list of the local prisons or the convict prisons, do you think that it would be advantageous to bring the convict prisons under the purview of visiting committees?—Certainly.

11,226. Do you see any reason, assuming that you keep that central control, for drawing the hard and fast line which is now drawn between the local prisons and the convict prisons?—No, I do not. I would be in favour of more lenient treatment of prisoners in all prisons, whether local prisons or convict prisons. I would strongly favour independent inspection of all prisons, and as I say in my evidence before the Kimberley Commission and in my article, of course I would favour in all prisons the cessation of that unnecessary punishment of complete silence on the part of prisoners from the time of conviction until they are discharged.

11,227. You had experience of the old system when talking was allowed in convict prisons?—Yes.

11,228. Was it allowed indiscriminately?—Only during exercise.

11,229. But there were no restrictions between one man and another?—No.

11,230. And no warder listening?—Well, there would be a number of warders walking round the exercise ring, and if they chose they could hear what was going on. Still, on the other hand, a great deal of conversation might be carried on on such occasions without being heard, but if a warder or warders wished to hear what prisoners were talking about generally there was nothing to prevent them.

11,231. Would you be in favour of allowing talking in convict prisons without regard to the character and behaviour of the prisoner?—No; I would of course prohibit conversation about thieving projects outside, obscene talking, and conversation of that kind. That is one thing. But I would be altogether against prohibiting all kinds of talking at all times, amongst prisoners, which is, I understand, the rule now.

11,232. You would make talking a premium on good behaviour?—Well, seeing that you have abolished talking altogether, I would now give it as a reward for good behaviour and observance of the prison rules. That is to say, when a prisoner has gained his 3rd class after he has undergone 12 months' experience of penal servitude I would allow talking as one of the privileges, to be forfeited for a time through misconduct.

Mr. Michael Davitt.

9 Feb. 1895.

11,233. Take the case of one of these old offenders, the "old lags" as you call them, whose behaviour is irreproachable in prison, and who thereby would earn the privilege of talking, it is quite conceivable that that man might do a great deal of harm to various classes of prisoners?—Precisely; but what I propose is that that class of prisoner shall be associated together, and kept entirely apart from those who are in prison for the first time. The evil to which you refer, and which might result from allowing indiscriminate talking, could be remedied if you put all the "old lags" together.

11,234. Then it is really a question of classification?—Yes.

11,235. And you are in favour of some relaxation or privilege on Sunday?—Yes; I would increase the inducements to real good behaviour on the part of the prisoners. I do not use tobacco myself, but nearly all the prisoners that I have come across were tobacco-users, and would give anything for it. I have frequently seen them part with their dinners in order to get a small piece of tobacco, and I think if when prisoners get into the 3rd, or 2nd, or 1st class they were allowed a small pipe of tobacco on a Sunday it would be a wonderful inducement to good behaviour.

11,236. Should you say that there was more danger of contamination among the younger class of prisoners than the old?—Certainly; because the young prisoners of whom I have any experience were boys who had practically no care in early life, brought up in workhouses or in places of that kind, and then thrown out upon the streets afterwards to graduate in crime. They go through short sentences in county prisons, and they graduate into penal servitude. In my time in Dartmoor the "old lags" made it a point to get into the exercise file with these young criminals. Then the "old lag" would enlarge upon his achievements, all the great things he did in his time, and in recounting his exploits he would be simply educating the younger thief into the higher class of criminality. Therefore I would strongly urge the entire disassociation of all young prisoners from all "old lags" who had been convicted a third time.

11,237. As a matter of fact a good deal has been done for that by the establishment of what is called the "Star class," which consists of first offenders, who are kept apart?—I am glad to hear it. Are the first offenders kept entirely apart in working and in association?

11,238. Yes?—Well, that is undoubtedly a reform in the right direction, but I do not think such a classification as I have over and over again suggested would in any way interfere with prison discipline. I would think it would rather further the ends of prison management.

11,239. Now with regard to labour, do you think that a convict who is, say, a skilled tailor, or a shoemaker or an artisan should be allowed on admission to work at his own trade?—Certainly, if such a trade is being carried on in the prison. I think that an artisan should not be sent to a prison where the trade in which he has earned his living is not more or less practised.

11,240. Of course it sets up a certain inequality of treatment, because it is impossible to provide that all prisoners shall be set to work at the trade with which they are familiar, but they have to be sent to some trade which is distinctly hard labour to them; and by sending men to their own trade an inequality is set up, as they are set to what they are accustomed to do?—I think you will find the number of trained artisans in the convict prisons is a comparatively small number.

11,241. No doubt, but still it is a question which does arise very often?—Well, I have never found in my experience that a shoemaker being sent to the shoe-making shop caused any jealousy amongst prisoners who had not been trained to any particular avocation. In Dartmoor the prisoners who were not artisans, and who had never learned a trade, if physically able for the work, were sent out to reclaim the land, which I thought an admirable industry for them. Then, again, in Portland prison, you have an industry which is practically local to the prison, that is the getting of Portland stone.

11,242. I think we are familiar with your views upon the question of prison industries?—I go in very strongly for putting all prisoners to some useful work, both for the purpose of making their detention more humane and for reforming them. I think if anything will reform men of that class who have gone wrong it will be to give them some training or some opportunity of earning their livelihood by industrial effort when they come out into the world again.

11,243. Just a word upon the view taken by certain trade unionists that all interference with outside labour should be avoided. How far do you think you ought to carry that principle?—I think that view on the part of trade unionists is very narrow, and unworthy of educated working men. I do not think that the trade that would be carried on in your convict prisons or your local prisons by say shoemakers or bookbinders or tailors would be of any such extent or volume that ought in any way to interfere with trade unionist or free industry outside the prison walls.

11,244. Would you approve of underselling as compared with the local outside trade?—No, I would not approve of underselling the product of skilled industry outside; and precautions against that would, of course, be taken by the representatives of trade unionists in the House of Commons.

11,245. Let us take the test case of mat-making, which is a very suitable prison industry and undoubtedly the manufacture of mats for sale outside does to a certain extent (though I hardly think it is an appreciable extent), interfere with the outside trade?—But not so much as the products of industry on the Continent and other countries interfere with the general industry of this country.

11,246. Certainly not?—Really, the competition of prison mat-makers to mat-makers outside would be infinitesimal as compared with what it is from abroad.

11,247. You think they ought not to interfere at all. The first thing is to give suitable industries under proper conditions to the prisoners?—Certainly.

11,248. To what extent do you think first-class hard labour is desirable?—First-class hard labour?

11,249. I do not know whether you have thought of that. That is really a question which is more confined to local prisons. When a man is sentenced to hard labour he has to perform a certain class of work which is described in the Prison Act, and for the first month he has as a rule either to work on the treadmill or the crank?—Well, I am totally opposed to what I call the abominable and inhuman punishment of treadmills, cranks, and all that sort of thing. I do not see how that can benefit any human being, whereas if the energy that is wasted and the time that is lost in this treadmilling and crank winding were only devoted to some useful industry producing something, it would be altogether better for the prisoner, it would be altogether better for the prison, and it would be better for the general community. I do not think they have got treadmills and crank winding in any other country in the world except here. I have never heard of it, and consequently you have in those countries where prisoners are treated more humanely a far less percentage of re-convictions than you have in England.

11,250. Do you think that education is sufficiently provided for in the convict prisons?—No, not the education that I think ought to be given in convict prisons. I would certainly give more power and more latitude to the prison schoolmaster, and I would make the teaching as largely manual or technical as possible.

11,251. Do you think it would be advisable to improve the status of the schoolmaster?—I think so, undoubtedly, because I think the schoolmaster could be made a very powerful reformatory influence, especially in the convict prisons, if he was allowed more latitude Now, or rather during my time, he was really one of the prison officials. He was not, I think, permitted to visit the cells of the prisoners except in their absence, when book days came round. I do not see why a prisoner should not have the privilege of sending for the schoolmaster in preference to the chaplain if he wished it, and I would give the schoolmaster the same privilege that the chaplains have of going round from cell to cell in the evenings and endeavouring to improve the education of the prisoner, to reform him, and to lighten the burden of his imprisonment somewhat by such intercourse.

11,252. Would you prefer teaching them in classes to avoid the repetition caused by going from cell to cell?—The only class of convicts who were taught in classes in my time were the illiterates; those who could read or write did not attend the classes. We got books once a fortnight. A prisoner would have the privilege of writing down on his slate when going out in the morning what book he wished to have. The schoolmaster goes round in the absence of the prisoner, sees the request on his slate, and copies it into his diary. Then, if the book is in the library it is brought round; if not, the prisoner must wait for it or ask for another. That is about all the intercourse that there is between the schoolmaster and the prisoner who is not illiterate. The illiterate prisoner goes to school once a week for about an hour or an hour and a-half in the winter time and for about three quarters of an hour in the summer. I am referring, of course, to a period now 16 years back.

11,253. Do you think any form of higher education should be attempted in the prison?—In the direction of manual or technical industrial education, yes.

11,254. By way of lectures, perhaps?—Well, I would advocate Sunday evening lectures in the chapels for prisoners during the last year of imprisonment. This is a practice in some of the American prisons; in fact, in many of the American prisons they go so far as to occasionally organise concerts. That is condemned in England, but while I am not prepared to advocate concerts in English convict prisons, I should strongly urge that there should be lectures by the Protestant and Catholic chaplains, the Governor, or Deputy Governor, or any competent person approved of by the Governor during the last 12 months of the prisoner's sentence, of such a character as might be considered serviceable to the future of the prisoners, I mean lectures on industries, thrift, sanitation, health, and so on.

11,255. You mentioned music. Now, Sir Edmund Du Cane, the other day in giving his evidence, mentioned music as something which he thought it very desirable to introduce, with due regard to prison discipline?—I am very glad to hear it, but in my time if I dared to whistle he would have sent me to "chokey" on bread and water.

11,256. Well, this is Sir Edmund Du Cane's answer, "I should like to teach them singing and "music, it would do them no harm. I do not know "that I should dare to propose it, but I should like "it"?—I am very glad to learn that the world progresses. In prison, you know of course, that to sing or to whistle or to make any noise, musical or otherwise, is a high crime and misdemeanour against the rules.

11,257. I understand that you think that under the age of 25 at any rate young prisoners are reclaimable?—There is hope up to that age, and up to 30, but not much when they become second or third timers. For third timers especially I do not think there is much hope. Still I would not advocate anything like perpetual detention even for these incorrigible cases.

11,258. But with regard to the younger men, you would agree that every effort ought to be made and ought never to cease being made until it is practically a hopeless task?—Undoubtedly, and I would make the effort as far as possible industrially so as to train them to some trade or some means of earning a livelihood outside.

11,259. Should you be in favour of raising the age of admission to reformatories to 18?—Certainly I would.

11,260. Should you be in favour of the establishment of something in the nature of a halfway house between the reformatory and the prison, where the younger and not hopeless offenders could be sent for a special training, special reformatory influences, and special opportunities for industrious and agricultural work, such as land reclamation and so forth?—I would undoubtedly. Such an effort was made, I think, at one time in Ireland. It was during my imprisonment. Probably Mr. O'Connor would know all about it. It was the prison of Lusk in the county Dublin, I think. I think some effort was made, but I do not know with what success.

11,261. Are not you thinking of an intermediate prison?—Did I gather from you it was an intermediate prison you suggested?

11,262. No, this would be something between a prison and a reformatory to which these young offenders could be sent for periods of detention?—I would decidedly favour the establishment of such a place.

11,263. That is to say, if a lad of 16, 17, or 18, or up to a certain age showed that he was in danger of becoming an habitual criminal, that that lad should be laid hold of in some such establishment, and that every effort should be made for four or five years by a proper system to turn him out a good citizen?—Certainly, I would strongly favour the establishment of such a system.

11,264. (Sir Algernon West.) I want to ask you a little about what you think of the chaplain system as it exists at present. That is the only thing that I think Mr. Gladstone has not asked you about?—Well, in my experience I would say that the chaplains in Dartmoor had practically no influence whatever upon the reformation of prisoners. The services were perfunctory, and the chaplains did not, in my opinion, visit the prisoners in their cells often enough, and did not converse with them in a manner to impress the prisoners with the idea that they were really wishful for their reformation. Of course we had sermons on a Sunday, admirable in their way; religious services too, which were admirable; but it struck me that the chaplains did not exert their influence for good upon the prisoners sufficiently; and moreover I think that the class of chaplains, like the class of doctors in convict prisons, should be of a higher standard. I think a chaplain should know something about mental disease, that he should know all about criminal law, and that he should have the fullest latitude to bring to bear in his teaching all the influences he could wield for the future reformation and moral welfare of the prisoners under his charge.

11,265. Do not these faults arise, do you not think, from the monotony of the work of the chaplain. It must be very dreary and monotonous work for the chaplain to go round day by day to the same cells. Could not that be remedied by a change of chaplain occasionally?—I would say that in the vocabulary of a Christian minister of religion there should be no room for the word "monotony." I think that where extra spiritual effort is required, that men willing to undergo hard work in the service of Christianity ought to be found, and could be found.

11,266. You think they could?—Yes, and I would recommend young chaplains rather than older men. The young ministers have more enthusiasm than the old ones. Of course I admit that it is rather a monotonous life, but still it ought to be a very acceptable field of operation for any zealous Christian minister.

11,267. I think they are divided into two classes. One, those who really go into it with the Christian object of reforming, and the other class, those who have not much object in going there, but who goes there as a chaplain because he cannot get anything better. Would you approve of having different preachers to preach to them—men who are well known in preaching and in the ministry?—Yes, I would thoroughly concur with that. Occasionally at Dartmoor we got a new preacher—perhaps for about a week once every year. I know it always had a very good effect upon the prisoners' minds; they looked forward to it with a great deal of pleasure. Then I think if the prison chaplain would vary his discourse occasionally it might be all for the better.

11,268. I have one other question only to ask you now, and that is about talking. From the experience you gained from other prisoners do you say there was not only the talking which you were allowed at exercise on Sundays, but that there was also a regular organized system of communication going on always?—Yes. That results largely from the prohibition of talking. Of course man is a talking animal, and no matter what rules you adopt to prevent talking, if you have a thousand men congregated in a prison they will insist on exercising this natural right to speak.

11,269. And you think they did it?—Undoubtedly they have systems of telegraphing by knocks, communicating through books, and sending what are called "stiffs," or letters, from one part of the prison to another. But if talking was allowed, that is, such talking as I referred to a little while ago, at exercise and at work, I think these dodges or subterfuges would largely cease, and the prohibition of talking is, of course, an incentive to the breach of the rules. I think that the vast majority of prison offences would be made up of breaches against that particular rule. That was the case I know during my experience.

11,270. (Miss Orme.) I think you said that you are in favour of untried prisoners seeing visitors without the presence of a warder?—Certainly.

11,271. Do you not think that sometimes there would be the danger of their giving them injurious things, such as the means for committing suicide, and so on?—No, I do not think the desire to commit suicide or to help others to commit suicide is as prevalent as all that. Then, again, reasonable precautions could be taken by the prison authorities against allowing well known disreputable characters going in to see a prisoner.

11,272. You do not think there would be any great difficulty in making such a distinction if there was once the rule established?—I have no doubt that if my suggestion were carried out contraband things would be taken in occasionally by some people, but the fear of that ought not to operate in favour of denying to an untried prisoner, who is an innocent person until he is proved guilty, access to his friends and to his newspapers, and what he might feel it necessary to have in the preparation for his trial.

11,273. Instead of trying to keep out these disreputable people (which might be a difficulty), should you approve of allowing an untried prisoner to see a class of visitors, such as solicitors and persons who would be very little likely to act against the prison rules?—They are allowed to see solicitors now, not absolutely alone, but in a small room with a glass door, outside of which the warder stands, to see that nothing is passed between the solicitor and the prisoner of the nature and character you apprehend.

11,274. Would you think it an improvement to allow them to see certain classes of visitors, such as solicitors, absolutely alone?—Yes.

11,275. Would that meet your difficulty?—Yes, along with the other rights I referred to awhile ago, which ought not to be denied until guilt is established by the due process of law.

11,276. Without giving that freedom to all visitors?—Well, I would not give absolute freedom of access by all people to all prisoners. Presuming a man is arrested for a burglary, the presumption is that he may be visited by some of his associates who are also criminals. There greater surveillance would be required, and some supervision would be necessary. But assuming a man is arrested for the first time for an offence against the law, I think the assumption ought to be that those who would come to see him would be honest citizens who would not do anything against the prison rules.

11,277. Then, in the conversations that in the old days you used to have with so many prisoners, did you ever find out at all what effect the Prisoners' Aid Societies had had upon them. Did you come to any conclusion about that?—Well, I can only give you the prisoners' own views about these Aid Societies, and those views are not at all complimentary. I have no knowledge of the personnel of these societies, nor have I inquired since I came out of prison as to the working of their organization. I read occasionally about them in the press, and learn that they do a great deal of good; but the prisoners themselves, chiefly reconvicted men, told me they went to these societies, and that they were simply under the control of Scotland Yard, and that these societies were inimical to them. I believe that is an unfair view to take, but I can only give you, in answer to your question, the views of the prisoners themselves, because I have no knowledge of the actual working of these societies in London.

11,278. You were speaking of the services held in the prisons, and the duties of the chaplains. I suppose a large number of those prisoners to whom you used to talk really had been brought up as Nonconformists, and not as members of the Established Church?—No, most of the prisoners I had experience of in Dartmoor were never brought up to any religion at all, if I except the Catholics. Real religion, I am sorry to say, has very little interest for and very little influence over the vast majority of the prisoners.

11,279. Should you say it is an evil of the present system that there are only the two sorts of services held in prisons, the Catholic and the Protestant?—In Dartmoor there was no other service. In Millbank, I think, there was a Presbyterian service, but of that I am not sure.

11,280. That is of course the Established Church of Scotland?—Yes.

11,281. Should you think any good might be done by introducing Nonconformist ministers to influence those prisoners who were in early life trained in Nonconformity?—Certainly. I would give the fullest liberty to Nonconformist ministers to visit prisoners who may in their early days have belonged to the Nonconformist religion; and in addition to that I would also give permission to select qualified officers of the Salvation Army to visit the prisons and endeavour to reclaim by their well-known methods and means some of these men. I think that carefully selected officers of the Salvation Army would be likely to do far more good with certain classes of criminals than either Protestant or Catholic chaplains.

11,282. Should you say that that ought to continue during the whole sentence or only for a term before they are discharged?—I would continue it during the whole term of imprisonment. I believe in Belgium, but I am not sure, and possibly in parts of France, there is free access to prisoners by Catholic priests; and the Redemptorist Fathers (an order which has for one of its objects the reclamation of criminals) visit prisons constantly; and I am told by those who are familiar with this work that it has the best result. These priests go and sit down in the cells with the prisoners and talk to them and teach them crafts, and give them the best possible advice for their future life. I think if something of that kind were resorted to in our prisons, and if the Salvation Army were included in the privilege with the churches, that good results must necessarily follow.

11,283. Rather than a mere formal service?—Of course I would keep the formal service, because that after all is one of the reformatory influences operating for good on the prisoner, but I would add to that what I have recommended in reply to your question.

11,284. (Dr. Bridges.) I think you have had nine months' experience of the silent system at Millbank?

—Of course the silent system is now extended throughout the entire imprisonment. I had nine months' experience of solitary confinement.

11,285. During that time to whom did you speak?—To the warder who would visit my cell several times during the day when bringing in work, or in letting me out to exercise; to the chaplain when he came round; and to the schoolmaster when he came with books, once a week I think it was in Millbank; once a fortnight in the convict prison.

11,286. And the chaplain you would see how often?—Well every prisoner is at liberty to send for the chaplain when he wants to see him. If the prisoner does not send for the chaplain, he goes round on the average once a fortnight or once a month. In Dartmoor poor old Father Green, who is now dead, and who was an old man, seldom came round; but where you have a young chaplain, such as I found in Portland, in Father Matthews, the Catholic chaplain; he was almost constantly in the prison, and all the prisoners spoke well of him.

11,287. Then practically for most days of the week the only person to whom you spoke was the warder?—That is so.

11,288. You were out for one hour for exercise?—For the first six months I had only one hour's exercise in the morning. Then I complained to the doctor that my health was suffering from the confinement and he gave me an additional hour for the remaining four months.

11,289. You expressed the opinion, I think, that that solitary confinement tended to the development of insanity in certain cases?—Yes.

11,290. How were you able to know that in the individual case, seeing that you were yourself in solitary confinement and could hold no communication with other prisoners?—Well, the fact that I did not become insane in consequence of my nine months' solitary confinement is not a reason why men who have been in prison repeatedly do not become insane when subjected again and again to this treatment. I believe that solitude must necessarily tend to injure all minds. To be shut up for 23 hours out of every 24 for nine months, and not allowed to speak except in the instances I have given, is a fearful ordeal for any human being to go through.

11,291. I rather wanted to ask whether you had knowledge of any individual cases in which in your judgment insanity was either developed or promoted by that confinement?—It was quite a common occurrence during my nine months in Millbank to hear of prisoners being sent from there to the lunatic prison at Broadmoor, and I have several times seen men at chapel and in the exercise grounds show symptoms of insanity, but I think it will be found that these insane cases are largely from among the habitual criminal class.

11,292. With respect to this habitual criminal class, I think you expressed the view that in many of them the criminality was to a certain extent the result of insanity?—Well, I would really call irreclaimable criminality a form of insanity.

11,293. That is what I mean. You mean irreclaimable theft, or at anyrate some irreclaimable theft is like dipsomania or the tendency to drink?—I will give you an illustration which I got from a well educated burglar in Dartmoor on that point. I was trying to point out to him, apart from the immorality of the thing, the stupidity of running the risk of getting seven years' penal servitude for some 10*l.* or 20*l.* worth of stolen goods. I pointed out to him that if he only worked at the commonest labour outside at 1*s.* a day he would earn far more money in the seven years and have his liberty as well. He replied: "Well "yes, that is all right coming from you, but put your- "self in my position. I never knew my father or my "mother. My first recollection is being turned out of "a workhouse. I fell among thieves. I got educated "in crime; I learned to read and write in prison. "Unlike you I have had no moral training." "Now," he said, "I hold that man is naturally a thief. Take "for instance a child in its mother's arms; anything "that excites its fancy it wants to get, and if that "natural feeling is not corrected by parental training "and moral influence and education it gets stronger "as the child grows older." "Now," he said, "I am "such a product of your civilisation. You allowed "me to grow up with these animal instincts uncor- "rected, and then you send me to prison when I "exercise them."

11,294. Assuming that this irreclaimable life is to be looked upon as a form of insanity, then there comes the question of how to deal with it?—Precisely.

11,295. Could you deal with it otherwise than by detention and by labour?—Detention and labour apart from the severer punishment that is comprised in penal servitude. I do not myself believe that men have ever been reclaimed or ever will be reclaimed by punishment. I do not think that punishment reclaims anybody. Detention in such cases, with special treatment such as experts might suggest, and industrial occupation, training them as far as possible to earn something for themselves or something for the State.

11,296. But it would be necessarily compulsory labour?—Yes.

11,297. They would not be allowed to be idle?—Necessarily, no. I will go in for as much labour as you please, if it is productive labour.

11,298. I meant to say, in what respect would such employment differ from work in the quarries as now carried on at Portland?—I am not opposed to work in the quarries. I would send all the habitual criminal class to as hard manual labour as they ought to be put to, taking into consideration the state of their health. I would give all prisoners, but particularly "old lags," as they are called, some manual labour, and unless they did that labour (and some of them, of course, would refuse to do it) they would have to put up with the consequences, that is, with less food, and the loss of privileges. When I say "less food" do not misunderstand me. I would not resort to starvation diet, such as is now practised as a method of punishment in the convict prisons.

11,299. And, consequently, whether you regard these irreclaimable thieves as criminals or as insane persons, the treatment you adopt would be substantially the same in either case?—So far as industrial occupation is concerned, yes. But I would have them in a prison apart from other prisoners, and, in addition to their labour, would subject them to such special treatment as experts might think would be beneficial in the end.

11,300. These irreclaimable thieves are not, I suppose, deficient in mental powers?—Oh, no; on the contrary. For instance, take the case I gave a while ago of the educated burglar. I have met quite a number of these "old lags," who could speak French and read German. I once listened to a discussion on Homer from a man who had undergone several sentences of penal servitude. They read the prison poets, and they are very attentive to the schoolmaster, in the matter of library books, and they never fail to criticize the sermons. If there is any literary mistake or any misquotation from scripture, you will find that your educated burglar will point out where the mistake has been.

11,301. Coming to another class of prisoners, those who are obviously mentally deficient, have you seen many of that class of people who are absolutely weak-minded?—A very large number; and it was one of my cruellest experiences in Dartmoor to see wretches who were manifestly insane treated as if they were putting it on. Of course I make this allowance for prison doctors (especially in convict prisons) that they have to deal with a certain class of "old lags" who pretend to be insane. That is what in prison parlance is called "putting on the barmey stick," pretending to be mad. I would therefore strongly urge the appointment of a higher class of medical officer than I found during my experience of penal servitude. You want men skilled in mental diseases who could detect sooner than an inexperienced medical officer any of this shamming. In consequence of these shamming practices, many men who were really insane were treated and punished as if they were only putting it on. There was one instance which I think I gave in 1878, though I do not find it in my printed evidence. It was that of a young German lad about 18, who was breaking stones alongside of me in Dartmoor for a time. He could not speak a word of English. I was told by another German prisoner that he was suffering from religious mania. I was also assured that he had been wrongfully convicted. Well, that poor boy was repeatedly reported by warders for insubordination without being able to understand what was said to him by the warders. He was punished and punished until he was finally driven into the infirmary, and he was subjected there to what was called "the battery test" Those prisoners who are supposed to be pretending insanity are put into a chair, and electric batteries are applied, and whilst he was being subjected to this infamous test he died. That boy was really killed in Dartmoor, because there was not a medical officer there with sufficient knowledge of mental diseases to deal with it, and say that he should not be so treated.

11,302. (Mr. O'Connor.) I suppose I may take it that classification, properly carried out, is at the bottom of the question of prison reformation?—Yes; a proper classification would remedy many of the evils that I have referred to, and instead of interfering with prison discipline, I think it would promote the interests of order and economic management in the various prisons.

11,303. And whether the convict prisons and the local prisons were merged into one system or not, there is room for classification in both one and the other?—Assuming that nothing has been done in the way of better classification since I was last in prison.

11,304. The "star class," as you say, is a step in the direction in which you would wish to see things carried out?—Yes.

11,305. Could you indicate at all the lines upon which you think that classification ought further to be carried out?—Yes.

11,306. I think you have stated in your article that the character of the crime should be one element of classification?—Yes, I think men who are in prison for certain classes of offences I will not name should be kept entirely apart from other criminals. Those imprisoned for murder, I think, should be separated from the ordinary class of prisoners.

11,307. Would you say that age should be an element in classification?—Age, if associated with criminality. If an old man is imprisoned for the first time, I do not think he should be put in the same category or in the same classification as an old jail-bird.

11,308. I understand you to be in favour of raising the minimum prison age as much as possible, that is to say, keeping the young out of prison?—Precisely, raising the age for admission to reformatories and keeping young convicts as far as possible away from the "old lags." The "aged in prison" really means old criminals. I have occasionally met old men who were sent to penal servitude for the first time, but very few of them.

11,309. Then first offenders will furnish an element of classification, and the intellectually weak will be another?—Yes.

11,310. And the utterly depraved?—Yes, the utterly depraved will be another.

11,311. With regard to the nine months' separate confinement, I notice that in your article you speak of that with reference to "shorter sentences all worked out," and you say with regard to the nine months for the first offenders that it should be reduced to one or two months at the beginning or at the end of the sentence?—That is unless it is abolished entirely. I would go in for the abolition of that part of the sentence entirely, but wanting that I would favour the reduction of that term to a month or two at the beginning of the sentence and a month or two at the end of the sentence.

11,312. And it should be confined to first offenders?—Do not misunderstand me. I would favour the sending of old offenders at once after sentence to hard manual labour.

11,313. And the separate system should be confined to first offenders?—Yes, to one month at the beginning of the sentence and one at the end, unless it was abolished entirely.

11,314. You have in your article repeated twice over the expression, "shorter sentences all worked out"?—Yes. I deal in that article with the barbarous sentences, as I call them, of 7, 10, or 15 years' penal servitude for offences against property. I consider that seven years' experience of penal servitude is a fearful punishment. I believe that in recent years there has been some tendency to reform in that direction, and I think I am right in quoting Sir Edmund Du Cane as strongly in favour of shorter sentences; at least he wrote an article some years ago in one of the magazines urging that reform, and I would in the case of first offenders have a "short sentence all worked out" instead of the ticket-of-leave. I would reserve the ticket-of-leave for the old offenders who are in prison for the third or fourth time. In the case of first offenders I think it operates against them after their sentence has expired that they are compelled to report periodically to the police, as the police who have to look after these discharged prisoners are not always fair and considerate towards them. The police seem to think that it is their duty to prevent employers being imposed upon by men who have been in prison, and I have repeatedly had complaints made to me by reconvicted prisoners whom I met in their first sentence who came back again to Dartmoor that they got no fair chance when they were discharged, but that they were pursued everywhere by detectives and were driven back again into crime.

11,315. And you think there were good grounds for the complaint?—I do think there were very strong grounds for it.

11,316. With regard to the weak-minded; from what you have said I should gather that there is a good deal more of insanity, in your opinion, than appears in the official reports?—I think so, and I think even the official reports will convict the present system of increasing insanity in prisons. If I am not wrong in what I am about to say, I think the reports of the Commissioners show that there has been a large increase of insanity within the last 20 years amongst prisoners, and I think it will be found that this increase is referable chiefly to men who have been in prison on several occasions. In Ireland I think there is not that increase of insanity amongst the prisoners, and I would say this with reference to the Irish prisons that I think the treatment on the whole there is more humane than in the English prisons. I believe also that the number of punishments in Irish prisons is far less than it is in England, and the number of re-convictions is also less, showing that a more humane and more enlightened treatment even under the present system would remedy a good many of the evils that we charge against penal servitude in this country.

11,317. Do you know whether there is a rule enforcing silence so rigidly in Ireland as in England?—Well, I have no actual experience of convict prisons in Ireland, but I do not think that the rule against talking is so rigidly enforced.

11,318. You regard the prohibition of speech as inhuman?—I do, as absolutely indefensible. There is nothing like it in any other country in the world. I condemn it on every ground, as inhuman, as unjust, as not contemplated by the sentence inflicted by the judge himself, and as being unnecessary so far as prison discipline is concerned. Moreover, it is a fruitful source of offence against the prison rules. Then the prohibition of speech encourages deceit in prisoners. It drives them to resort to dodges and cunning, and it helps to keep in pernicious activity practices and faculties that are peculiar to the criminal class.

11,319. You speak also of the "eye torture of the four whitewashed walls." Did you suffer much from that?—I did very much. Of course prisoners are not allowed to ornament their cells in any way. To do so would be a breach of the rules, and would entail punishment; but I do not see why a prisoner who has to live in a small whitewashed cell for nine months should not be allowed, if he has the taste and the ability, to ornament his cell.

11,320. With regard to silence, you would advocate freedom to speak when at work and at Sunday exercise?—Certainly. Of course the conversation under those circumstances would be directly in the hearing of the warder, who would at once reprimand anything that would be obscene, or anything that ought not to be heard spoken.

11,321. And I suppose if a proper system of classification was carried out the objection which might now obtain to speaking would be largely removed?—Largely, if not entirely. The objection to speaking is that the old criminals can inoculate with more crime the less experienced prisoners. They talk about their exploits and their performances outside. Well, if that class of criminal is taken away and put in a prison by himself there would be less fear of demoralisation following from conversing at exercise and at work.

11,322. With regard to the effect of this nine months' separate and silent system, I suppose that you had in going to chapel and in returning from chapel and by other casual opportunities, means of judging of the condition of the prisoners?—Certainly. In going to chapel both in Milbank and in Dartmoor we had to cross corridors or yards, probably 100 or 200 yards in extent.

11,323. So that in spite of your being in separate confinement during the nine months, you would yet have the opportunity of judging of the effect of the imprisonment on your fellow prisoners?—Yes, and of seeing how enforced silence led to the breach of rules, because any offence of talking was immediately reported, and the offender sent to "chokey."

11,324. You say the nine months' sentence tends to make men more irritable?—Undoubtedly, if a man is shut up in a cell for 23 hours out of 24, of course, it naturally tends to affect his temper and his whole bodily system.

11,325. And make him more liable to commit himself and incur punishment?—Certainly.

11,326. You have told us also that when you were at either Dartmoor or Portland—I forget which—you on more than one occasion heard men being beaten below in the punishment cells?—In Dartmoor I was located in the punishment cells for several months, and had opportunities of seeing how incorrigible prisoners were treated by what I call brutal warders—men who exceeded their duty.

11,327. Would you hear the actual blows, or would you hear the cries of the prisoners?—The blows and the cries.

11,328. (Sir Algernon West.) Will you allow me to interpose one question here? Why were you in a punishment cell?—It was owing to the fact that some Fenian prisoners had been rescued in Australia; at least I was given to understand that, fearing that I might be rescued at Dartmoor, they took me out of the ordinary prison and located me in the punishment cells, which was a very great hardship.

11,329. A dark cell?—Not dark.

11,330. Comparatively dark?—No; we call the punishment cells—that prison within a prison—where men are sent to for extra punishment when they are guilty of breach of the rules. There were two classes of cells, the semi-dark cell where men undergo their extra punishment, and cells which are not dark, where men are located who are on what, I think, is called penal diet. If a man is, for instance, tried by the director and gets 28 days' bread and water and three months' "penal cells," he does the 28 days in the semi-darkened cell; then he is put into a cell where there is more light and kept there until his sentence expires. It was in one of these latter cells I was confined for several months.

11,331. (Mr. O'Connor.) At Dartmoor, as I understand, there was some kind of classification, because a large number of men, it appears, went out to reclaim land, but you never went outside the prison?—That was because I was subjected to greater surveillance and harsher treatment, being a Fenian prisoner.

11,332. Then there was a distinction made between yourself and perhaps some others, and the rest?—There was a marked distinction made all through my first imprisonment between myself and ordinary prisoners. A burglar, a murderer, or a pickpocket, who observed the rules, had the privilege of getting visits from his friends. That was denied me during my whole seven years' and eight months penal servitude. I repeatedly applied for my right under the rules to have visits from my friends, but the application was always refused.

11,333. Was the denial personal to yourself, or was it one that was extended to a class?—No, it was personal directly to myself.

11,334. Were there other political prisoners there?—There were two.

11,335. Were they allowed visits which were denied to you?—One of them, I think, was allowed two visits. Chambers, who is now dead, I think was allowed visits also, but I am not certain on that point.

11,336. In any other respect did you find your position different from that of others—I mean besides the visits?—In the respect I mentioned, in reply to the Chairman in the beginning of my evidence; I was subjected to what, I believe, was the political prejudice of the warders as well as the ordinary prison discipline.

11,337. I suppose that would manifest itself in a hundred nameless ways?—Well, especially in being searched. Prisoners at Dartmoor in my time were subjected to endless searching. You were compelled four times a day to open your dress on the parade ground no matter what the weather was. Then, in addition to that, you have your cell turned over, as the prison expression is. The warder goes over your cell in your absence.

11,338. (Chairman.) There have been modifications in that respect?—I am glad to hear it, but in my case these searchings were more frequent than with others, and, as I have only one arm, I had some difficulty in keeping my cell in order, so that it was peculiarly troublesome to me to be subjected to these too frequent searchings.

11,339. (Mr. O'Connor.) In the case of those men who are badly treated in the punishment cells, do you say that those cases of ill-treatment would occur where no complaint would be made by the men?—Complaints made by what are called "incorrigible prisoners"? Well, they are listened to, but nothing comes of it beyond that. If a man gets a reputation of being a troublesome prisoner, and has a just cause of complaint through such treatment as I have referred to, he is scarcely listened to by the governor.

11,340. Then there are many grounds and occasions for complaint when complaint is not made?—Many; there is a feeling amongst most prisoners that the complaining prisoner is a foolish prisoner. He brings prejudice to bear against him, and gets the warder against him, and loses the chance in future years of getting more congenial occupation in prison.

11,341. Would not you say that the numbers appearing in the report would furnish a fair standard of the amount of ill-treatment on the part of the warders?—Not at all.

11,342. Do you think that the harsh treatment which exists now is to a certain extent due to the fact that the warders are of a class inferior from that which they ought to be drawn from?—That is my impression, which I had shortly after my release from prison. Of course many changes, I hope, have taken place since then that would cause me to modify my opinion upon that particular point, if I were as familiar with the management of prisons now as I was 15 years ago.

Mr. Michael Davitt.

9 Feb. 1895.

11,343. I suppose the warder's temper may be affected by the length of the hours he works, or a number of other things?—That was my opinion in Dartmoor; their hours were, I think, excessively long, and the warders had to do night duty for a week once every month. That would not be calculated to sweeten the temper of an officer in charge of a number of men.

11,344. And the prisoners might suffer in consequence?—I would strongly urge the application of the eight hours rule to prison warders, and some increase of remuneration to those who have to undergo night duty.

11,345. Did you ever hear of any case in which a man sentenced by the director to a flogging appealed, or endeavoured to appeal, to any other authority?—No, there is no higher authority to appeal to than a director in a matter of punishment of that kind. A prisoner can afterwards petition the Home Secretary, but whether he can complain about this particular punishment or not I do not know. I scarcely think he can.

11,346. Then the director, whether he is a man qualified by his past services or not, can without appeal sentence a convict to a flogging?—He can, and I think, in cases of that kind, where a prisoner, say, strikes a warder, or attempts to escape, and subjects himself to the penalty of a flogging, that he ought to have the privilege of having a local magistrate or a local justice of the peace present when his case is being investigated by the visiting director.

11,347. Would you mean with concurrent authority?—Well, I should say, yes; or with the power vested in the magistrate to appeal to the Home Secretary for a stay of punishment.

11,348. There is no representative of the press present when the director sentences a convict to a flogging?—No, there is no one present when the prisoner is being tried, except the visiting director, the governor, and the officer who makes the charge and the prisoner. Then, after the sentence is passed, the prisoner is examined by the doctor, and if he is found to be a man of weak health, or with diseased heart or lungs, the doctor has the power of averting he flogging, otherwise the flogging is inflicted.

11,349. I gather then, also, that whether the convict system and the local system are merged or not, you are of opinion that independent light from the local authority, whether corporate or individual, should be thrown into those prisons, whether they are county prisons or otherwise?—Yes.

11,350. You would be in favour of the county councillors visiting local prisons?—Yes.

11,351. And with regard to local prisons, you say that the local authorities should have the right of inspection?—Yes, and I would extend the right of inspection also to members of Parliament, magistrates, and justices.

11,352. Do you think such inspection is necessary for the reasonable protection of the prisoners?—I do, I think that such an inspection would have a beneficial effect upon warders and higher officials. They would be more careful in administering the power that is placed in their hands by the law.

11,353. A director can also sentence a man, I gather, to 28 days' penal cell?—In my time a director could give a man three dozen lashes, 28 days' bread and water, and six months' penal cell, say, for knocking off a warder's hat, or striking him in the body, or attempting to escape.

11,354. Have you ever seen a man who has been subjected to that punishment?—Yes, repeatedly. I was employed for three years in Dartmoor immediately outside the punishment cells, and I frequently heard the shrieks of prisoners who were subjected to the cat, and it was the custom then to pick out for the infliction of these sentences the strongest warder in the prison. I have frequently heard a particular warder, who had been in the navy, and who had the infliction of this punishment given him, boast about how he had made the prisoner yell.

11,355. Have you ever seen a man after he had been subjected to the 28 days' penal diet?—Yes. Generally, as a rule, when they had undergone this sentence, they were turned out to break stones with me for a time, I being employed outside these cells; and when opportunities occurred (as they did occasionally) of course the man who had been punished would tell me all about what he had endured. I would say that 28 days' bread and water would be an infinitely more cruel punishment than even three dozen lashes. I underwent practically a week's bread and water in punishment cells in Easter week, 1876, for absolutely nothing, simply because a warder had some particular prejudice against me. He reported me to the governor for not answering to my name in a respectful manner. I had answered to my name as I had done for five years previously, and I was never proved guilty of speaking disrespectfully to anyone in the prison, and because I would not admit that the warder's statement was correct I was sentenced first to two days' bread and water in punishment cells, and then brought up and sentenced again; so that I know practically what it is to be put on a week's bread and water. It was a fearful punishment, especially in Dartmoor, where you get the keenest possible appetite through the invigorating atmosphere. Then the ordinary diet of a prisoner was not at that time sufficient for a strong man engaged in outside labour, and to be taken from your work, as men are who commit breaches of the prison rules just before dinner time, and then sentenced to bread and water, while you are actually in hunger is a most fearful punishment. I do not think I could have endured 28 days' bread and water. Of course the 28 days' bread and water are not continuous. Every third day penal class diet was given. That is, I think, a pound of potatoes, and a little more gruel and a little more bread. Then the three days' bread and water is given again, and so on.

11,356. At the end of the 28 days what is the condition of the prisoner?—Well, of course he is reduced very much in weight and in strength. Then he is put on what is called penal class diet. That is a diet without any meat, and which is made up of porridge and potatoes.

11,357. And he may be sent to break stones?—No, no, not until the full sentence is carried out.

11,358. The six months?—The six months' penal class diet. Then he is sent out either to his former occupation or to break stones. Frequently men who have undergone that terrible punishment have been sent by the doctor to the infirmary for a week afterwards to recruit.

11,359. Have you ever seen a man at the end of the 28 days' bread and water and before the six months' penal diet?—No, because he is not allowed outside the penal cell.

11,360. You cannot speak from personal observation of his physical condition?—Except from what I have seen during the time I was located in this particular prison. Then I could only judge from his appearance as a prisoner might be passing from one cell to another.

11,361. Had you a choir at Dartmoor?—Yes, in both churches, Catholic and Protestant.

11,362. Did the choir practice?—On Saturday afternoons I think for an hour.

11,363. Was it considered a great privilege or advantage to join the choir?—A very great privilege, and only the best conducted prisoners would be allowed to join the choir.

11,364. An extension of that sort of thing might hold out means of rewarding good behaviour?—Yes, but the manner in which they are admitted into the choir is generally on the recommendation of the chaplain or schoolmaster.

11,365. Is there any other point that occurs to you with regard to which you would like to say anything?—I do not think so.

11,366. With regard to the point of the classification of prisoners or treatment?—I think I have, in reply to your questions and the other questions and in what I have written, said all I have practically to say with reference to classification.

11,367. Or the treatment of prisoners?—Yes, I think I have dealt pretty fully with it. You see my evidence in 1878 practically deals with treatment and my own personal experiences, and I put that in as well as my article in the "Nineteenth Century."

11,368. (Mr. De Rutzen.) I understood you to say just now that in all cases of short terms of penal servitude you would have them worked out, and have no remission or ticket-of-leave on short sentences?—For the present system of long sentences and ticket-of-leave I would substitute "short sentences all worked out."

11,369. That is only on the short sentences of penal servitude, as I gather?—Well, I would deal differently with those who had been re-convicted three or four times and sent for short sentences to county prisons; but even in those cases I would favour giving power to the governor, the chaplain, and the doctor to recommend for discharge any such prisoner who has shown real evidence of reformation.

11,370. But I understood you to put that on the ground of the interference by the police with them when on ticket-of-leave?—Largely on that ground.

11,371. Are you acquainted with the rules by which the police are governed in those matters?—No. I come to my conclusion with reference to the ticket-of-leave from what I have been told by prisoners who have been re-convicted in my time, and from my own knowledge and observation of the conduct of detectives here in London while I was passing as an untried prisoner through Clerkenwell and Newgate, and subsequently on my various visits to this city.

11,372. There are a set of rules which govern the police, and I have a copy of one or two rules which you will allow me to read to you and found a question upon. Rule No. 363 is to the effect: "On no "account is a supervisee or licence holder to be "charged with failure to report without the express "sanction of the Assistant Commissioner at Scotland "Yard." That is one. The next rule that I will read is Rule No. 372: "When the divisional police "are directed to make inquiries respecting licence "holders or supervisees, the greatest care must be "taken not to injure them directly or indirectly either "with their employers or landlords. Officers should "be employed on this duty who are not well known "in the locality immediately in the neighbourhood in "which they live, and on no account is a man in "uniform ever to be employed on such duty." Assuming that those rules are carried out strictly would not that get rid of the difficulty to a great extent?—If those rules, which are admirable, were carried out to the letter and in the spirit, then the objection that I urge against the ticket-of-leave would fall to the ground. My position is that those rules are not carried out, that you have in the detective police who are set apart for this work men who are trained to hunt down criminals, and who have none of the humane and just spirit in them that you have manifested in those rules.

11,373. I have only one other question to ask you, which is this: Would it not be the duty of the police in your opinion to keep their eye upon a person who once was known to have committed an offence?—Keeping an eye upon a discharged prisoner in a fair considerate way is one thing, trying to run them down in order to get promotion and a character for vigilance is another. I am satisfied that if those admirable rules were worked out in accordance with their spirit my objection against the ticket-of-leave would largely vanish.

11,374. (Chairman.) In connexion with that I understood you to say that first offenders should serve out their sentences, and that the ticket-of-leave should be abolished in their case; but should you object to a system by which they could earn remission without being subject to the ticket-of-leave when they go out?—I would certainly favour a change that would allow the governor, the chaplain, and the doctor to recommend a prisoner should be discharged when half his sentence would be worked out, if they could give grounds satisfactory to the Home Secretary for such a recommendation. But in my article, while I recommend the abolition of the ticket-of-leave in the case of first and second offenders, I proposed it should be allowed to continue with the hardened criminal class, so that those who really have to be looked after for the public safety may be watched, but in a considerate way, under this law by the detective police.

11,375. Then with regard to one thing you have said in connexion with the silent system in the convict prisons. I thought you observed that there was nothing like it elsewhere?—I believe that is not strictly correct. I believe it began first in Philadelphia.

11,376. In Holland and Belgium they carry out a practice of sentencing people to long terms, such as ten years of detention and absolutely isolated imprisonment?—But I think that in Belgium you have associated with that the privilege to the Redemptorist Fathers and others to visit those prisoners in their cell whenever they please. Now the punishment of separate cells and silence together with such privilege of visiting as I have referred to is one thing; but such separate cells and silence as I underwent and other prisoners undergo in this country without any such visits is quite another thing.

11,377. Quite so; but as against that, of course, in Belgium and Holland there would be none of the associated labour, which I should have thought would make the imprisonment more severe?—I do not say associated labour is severe or objectionable. I do not think men working together in a prison makes imprisonment harder.

11,378. My point was that it makes it less hard?—But your point, I believe, is that in Holland and in Belgium there is no associated labour, and men work in their cells.

11,379. Yes, and therefore the isolation is probably more severe than it would be in the convict prisons at home?—But probably you will find that though they work in their cells they are working at some useful and remunerative occupation; they are allowed to ornament their cells and to have frequent visits from some such ministers as I have referred to; and in that way the horrors of silence would be very much mitigated.

11,380. With regard to the military and civilian warders, I do not know that there has been a change since your experience, but I find that taking Dartmoor for the year ending the 31st March 1894, there were 105 subordinate officers who had been sailors or marines and 80 who had been civilians. Probably more civilians have been appointed in late years?—There was certainly not that proportion in my time, but I have already, I think, in speaking about Dartmoor mentioned the fact that civilian warders were in my judgment the more efficient warders; that is, they treated the prisoners with a little more consideration than those of the military class, and appeared to get on better with them.

11,381. I have only one more point to put to you, have you any reason to think that in cases of disputes between charges by warders against prisoners or by prisoners against warders that sufficient prisoners' evidence was not sought for by the authorities?—No prisoner in my time was allowed to give evidence in favour of another prisoner, and the rule in the management of convict prisons then, as laid down by several governors, was that no statement by a prisoner would be considered acceptable evidence of itself against any prison official.

11,382. That has been altered now?—Yes.

11,383. You would say that a prisoner's evidence should certainly be taken for what it is worth as much as a free man's?—Well, many of the prisoners, of course, as well as being hardened criminals, are also notorious liars.

Mr. Michael Davitt.
9 Feb. 1895.

11,384. Therefore it would be taken for what it is worth?—Yes, it would be taken for what it is worth, but manifestly there is a prejudice in the governors' minds against all statements made by prisoners. The suggestion is that there is little or no grounds for the complaints, and that is another reason why complaints are so comparatively few; prisoners feel that they will not be believed.

Adjourned until Monday 11th instant at 1 o'clock.

TWENTY-THIRD DAY.

Home Office, Whitehall.

Monday, 11th February 1895.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P. (CHAIRMAN);

The Right Honourable SIR ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B.;
JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, Esq., M.B., F.R.C.P.
ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis; and
MISS ELIZA ORME.

JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

Sir G. Lushington, K.C.B.
11 Feb. 1895.

SIR GODFREY LUSHINGTON, K.C.B., called and examined.

11,385. (Chairman.) You were for a long period Under Secretary for the Home Department?—For nine years; I have been 25 years altogether at the Home Office.

11,386. Though not necessarily during that period brought much into contact with the interior of prisons, yet you have had many prison matters which have passed under your view?—Yes, a great number of papers, especially at the time of the transfer of the prisons to the Secretary of State.

11,387. Will you give the Committee your general view with regard to that transfer?—I suppose the Committee are themselves quite familiar with the details of the two Acts, so that I will abstain from making any comment upon them; but I should wish to point out that there were political and parliamentary reasons in operation at the time when that Act was passed, and the consequence was that the Prison Commission was not established by an independent and self-complete Act as it would naturally have been, but the creation of the Board was done by means of transfer. This transfer brought about one or two rather anomalous consequences. For instance, the Secretary of State has no power to alter any rules in the Act of 1865. I do not know that there has been much practical inconvenience from that, because we can add to them. Another point is that whilst the inspectors and Visiting Justices, under the name of the Visiting Committee, are retained, their functions are really inverted. Inspectors were State officers inspecting the institutions of a local authority. Now they are State officers inspecting a State institution carried on by their own official superiors. So Visiting Justices were members of the local authority. They practically managed the prison, and acted for that authority. Now they are independent critics of State conducted prisons.

11,388. Do you think it desirable that the Secretary of State should have power to alter the rules in the Prison Act of 1865?—Certainly. His power is limited in this way, that any new rule made by him must not come into operation until it has been laid before Parliament a certain time.

11,389. Do you think the transfer a success?—I consider the transfer has been eminently beneficial, and not merely as the cause of a better administration of the law, but as much more humane towards prisoners. The immediate purposes of the transfer, which were economy and uniformity, have been entirely fulfilled, and I believe individual abuses are now reduced to a minimum and all the provisions of the Act are most carefully carried out. Besides that, a vast number of valuable improvements have been introduced by the Commissioners; in fact, so far as I know, the prisons under the Commissioners as compared with prisons under the local justices are, as a whole—I say as a whole because of course some of the local prisons were very poorly, whilst others were admirably managed—are as a whole superior in every respect, except one, namely, the use of productive labour; in that matter there does seem to have been a going back, chiefly I believe owing to causes over which the Commissioners have little or no control.

11,390. Do not you think that the lack of interest, which I think on the whole it is proved has come about with regard to visiting justices, has constituted a going back as against the time before 1877, because of the less interest that is taken by the local people in the prisoners?—Very little indeed in my opinion. I believe that the personal influence of the justices over prisoners has been very much exaggerated.

11,391. Are you speaking of the time before the transfer?—Yes I am. In a prison like Holloway, for instance (which is an extreme instance, I admit) the influence of visiting justices so far as individual prisoners are concerned must be set down as nil. In a small county prison I dare say the justices did now and again have the chance of saying a kind or encouraging word to prisoners, but I attach no importance to that as affecting prison administration as a whole.

11,392. It would rather appear that the efficiency of a Prisoners' Aid Society (I am speaking of provincial centres and provincial local prisons) depends largely upon the interest which the Visiting Committees take in their work. If Visiting Committees are keenly interested in their work, and therefore interested in the state of the prisoners, they appear to be able to do a good deal for them. Do not you think there is some going back with regard to that?—I am not really competent to speak upon that. I attach very great importance, perhaps more importance even than most people, to the action of Prisoners' Aid Societies; and of course they could be to a certain extent helped by the Visiting Committees taking a personal interest in the prisoners; but this help to be efficient must consist of a methodical sifting of the antecedents of prisoners about to leave prison: and this methodical work Visiting Committees have as much opportunity to do as the Visiting Justices had before them: and I do not see how the case is affected by the question of whether they have a greater or smaller share in the actual administration of the prison.

11,393. At any rate your general view is that the Act has been a great success?—It is.

11,394. And the actual transfer involved work of very great magnitude?—Yes, I think that cannot be emphasised too strongly. The work of taking over nearly 120 prisons all on a single day and consolidating them into about 60; organising the staff, every member of which had statutory rights reserved to him; re-arranging the buildings and establishing uniformity, has really been a work of prodigious magnitude, on which an immense amount of thought, contrivance, and skill has been expended; and it would be a disappointment to me if the Committee have not found this vast machinery in good working order, and everywhere showing marks of vigorous administration. By that I mean that nothing has been left to chance or is the outcome of neglect, and that the arrangements, whatever they are (whether you find them completely satisfactory or no), have been advisedly adopted, and that the Commissioners have their reasons, to offer why the arrangements should be as they are and not otherwise.

11,395. Do you think that sufficient money has been expended on the prisons?—That of course is a matter of detail, but I shall not be surprised if the Commissioners come to the conclusion that there are sundry matters with respect to which the existing arrangements require to be developed, and with regard to which more money ought to be spent. This, of course, might be found to be the case with any State Department whatever which is subjected to an independent examination like the prisons; but, if you would allow me, I should be glad to give some general explanations why this result is more to be expected in the case of prisons than of other institutions.

11,396. Do so, if you please. The essential characteristics of prison administration seem to me to be, first, that it is a vast and complex machine operating uniformly on a large number of persons, with the primary, if not the sole object, of inflicting and enforcing punishment as imposed by the law. In carrying out the law the amount of consideration to be shown to prisoners (except so far as may be prescribed by Act of Parliament), is an indeterminate quantity, a matter of opinion, a matter of sentiment, although the standard is constantly advancing. Next, the importance of the question how much consideration is due to prisoners depends on the fact that prison administration embraces the entire life, day and night, all the week, month, and year round of the prisoners, who are of various ages, characters, and physiques, but who one and all have the status of the most passive submission; and thirdly, that though there is no intention of concealment, and though there are certain safeguards, the operation of the prison machine is necessarily withdrawn from the public eye. Prisons are and must be dark places. Shall I compare the administration of prisons with, say, the administration of the Mines Acts?—Yes.

11,397. Yes?—Mines inspectors, and for that matter the Secretary of State, are not left to find out for themselves improvements that are necessary with regard to the mines. A thousand and one suggestions are constantly streaming in from mining owners, mining agents, mining institutes, trades unionists, &c.; in fact from all persons interested in mines, giving the Home Office the benefit of their experience in mines; pointing out how the Acts work and where they fail, and how they think they can be amended. The Prison Commissioners have none of those advantages. From prisoners of course they learn nothing; prisoners cannot view the prison as a whole, or even its larger features, and any remarks which they may please to make are not likely to carry much weight. From the warders, who are mere subordinates, who have strictly to obey all orders, they can learn little more. The warders, in fact, are incompetent as a class to advise on this subject. Superior officers of course have greater knowledge, and might make useful recommendations; but I am sure they would think twice, and three times, before they ventured to volunteer to a strong-minded and strong-willed executive suggestions of a large character which would involve an important alteration of machinery or serious addition to the expense. Again, whereas in the administration of mines reforms come chiefly from special experience of mines, in the case of prisons it is otherwise. First the general civilization outside advances, then the improvements from this general civilization gradually win their way into prison administration, involving a change in the prison machinery, and generally also an increase of public cost. Let me give a small instance of this, only one of a thousand. Prisoners have to be moved from one prison to another. Well, what so simple or so safe as to chain them together, and so to take them to their destination. For centuries one may say this was followed without misgiving from any human person. Perhaps it would never have occurred to a gaoler, whose first duty is the safe custody of his prisoner, to make any change; but the time comes when the public (who in this instance witness what is done) object to it as a needless hardship or a painful spectacle. So a change is made, but this involves a change in the prison machinery, more warders, and a special charge for conveyances, and increased cost, &c.

11,398. So that the suggestions come mostly therefore from the outside philanthropists?—Yes, they do, and philanthropists, I need hardly say, often have hearts more kind than their heads are strong; and, at all events from the outside, they can never understand the full working of the prison machinery which they propose to amend. The consequence is that when such benevolent suggestions are addressed to the prison authorities, proposing to alter the machinery, that is to the persons who do understand the machinery, who have been accustomed to work it, who invented it, and who are, not without reason proud of it, the philanthropist has just as good a chance of obtaining acceptance as a solitary blundering shareholder in a railway company has when at the annual meeting he presses some change upon the chairman and directors. The philanthropist does not understand his business. What he proposes is unnecessary, inconvenient, extravagant, or incompatible with discipline. For all or any of those judgments there are generally excellent reasons to be given, and in most cases those reasons are right, but not always. Wait a little. Let the public feeling become stronger and better informed, and it may be that the Secretary of State or some Parliamentary Committee or some Committee like this, necessarily more in touch with feeling outside prisons, and perhaps taking a wider view of the ulterior effects of crime and criminals on society than can be expected from persons whose main duty is the custody of prisoners, may say, "Well, this suggestion will no doubt slightly impair "the strict discipline hitherto enforced, but we think "the gain will be more than the loss," or "this other "proposal will require an outlay of public money, but "we think that the money will be well spent."

11,399. What do you consider is the position of the Secretary of State with regard to prison expenditure generally?—One of the main objects, or rather recommendations, of the Act of 1877 which were put forward to the public, was to introduce economy, and undoubtedly the Prison Commissioners have from the first been honourably distinguished by their economy, and notwithstanding the great improvements they have made, they have still, I believe, kept the cost of maintaining the prisoners considerably below that point at which it stood when the transfer was made. The Secretary of State also desires that the strictest economy should be maintained, but the time is long past (if it ever existed) since he had any desire that the cost incurred by the justices in administering prisons should be taken as the necessary limit of the expenditure of the Prison Commissioners. Better administration, of course, costs more money, and the Secretary of State, and I have no doubt the Treasury also, is prepared to accept this conclusion. Then, perhaps, I may mention another matter which is not peculiar to the Prison Commissioners, but which must be borne in mind. Prison Commissioners like other officials—all of them mortals—must be expected to have their bias; just as Sir George Grey's Commission on Convict Prisons took a severe line, to be followed by Lord Kimberley's, with its recommendations, which, in some respects, were mitigatory, so in the vast and complex work entrusted to the Prisons Commissioners it must be expected that different Prison Commissioners will in turn give their special attention to some matter or matters rather than to others, whether it be maintenance of discipline, improvement of buildings, employment in useful industry, amelioration in the lot of prisoners, or economy, or whatever it may be; and as from the nature of things, Prison Commissioners can pursue their bent with a peculiar exemption from public or even official interference, I certainly attach much importance to any means that can be devised for bringing outside feeling to bear upon their work. I believe that all prison reforms in the direction of the amelioration of the lot of prisoners are really inspired by the feeling outside the prison, and, therefore, whatever can be done to cause that feeling to operate upon those immediately responsible for the prisons without interfering with their independence and authority, ought certainly, in my opinion, to be encouraged.

11,400. Then what are the best methods for attaining that object?—The best means now available for this purpose seem to me to be the Visiting Committees. They are gentlemen chosen for their judgment, entirely independent of the Commissioners and official organisation; have full opportunities to make themselves acquainted with prison administration, and it is expressly their duty to offer criticism upon the system which they see in operation. They are invaluable as a protection to the individual prisoners, hearing both their complaints and the complaints made against them, and acting as an impartial authority in the dispensation of the severer punishments. But beyond this they do nothing or next to nothing. The fact is that they find nothing to do. The Prison Commissioners take good care to sweep so clean that nothing shall be left for the Visiting Committee to remark upon. In this respect the position of Visiting Committees is completely changed from what it was. Formerly they practically managed the prisons as agents for the entire body of Quarter Sessions, who sat, of course, only intermittently; but the Prison Commissioners are, as it were, always sitting day and night. There is, therefore, no occasion for agents to look to daily wants; but the Visiting Committee also seldom make important suggestions, such as they undoubtedly have a power to do ,and the reason is that, having nothing really to do, they take but a limited interest in prisons.

11,401. Have you any remedy to suggest for that?—The remedy which has been suggested is that the Legislature should give the visiting justices something to do. To this I am quite opposed. It would lead to dual administration, and my strong opinion is that nothing whatever should be allowed to interfere with the exclusive responsibility of the Prison Commissioners. In my view the Visiting Committee should have little or nothing to do with the every-day affairs and arrangements of the prison. These can be safely left in the hands of the Prison Commissioners; but the true and important function of the Visiting Committee, in addition to their duties of hearing complaints in the prison, is in their annual report to review prison administration in its larger features, and to submit general observations and suggestions.

11,402. Have they made such observations and suggestions since 1879?—Occasionally, but not nearly so often as might be desired. Let me, however, give two illustrations of two recent cases where this has been done, and very much to the public advantage. At Dartmoor the visiting justices called attention to the small cells of corrugated iron.* These cells had been put up years ago with the approval of the Secretary of State. There was, therefore, nothing illegal in them, nor were they shown to have produced ill-health to any of the convicts. They had been used for a great number of years, and the Directors, though, of course, they could not consider these cells as up to the modern standard, yet had continued to use them without misgiving, and had not thought it necessary to recommend their abolition to the Secretary of State; but the moment Mr. Asquith heard of these cells from the visiting justices he forthwith condemned them, and applied to the Treasury for the very large funds necessary to replace them; and it is my belief that any Secretary of State within the last 20 years would have done just the same. Another instance I may mention, namely, that of useless labour. The Secretary of State was, of course, aware that great difficulty had been thrown in the way of manufacturing articles for sale, and I daresay it is possible that he could have abstracted from various figures in the annual reports of the Commissioners the extent to which useless labour was imposed on prisoners, but I am quite sure he was not aware of that extent, and I cannot recall that the Prison Commissioners ever pointedly called his attention to the injurious influence of this practice.† Indeed, I believe they would not admit it to be so injurious. It is, of course, a question on which two opinions can be held, and, at all events, the practice is entirely in accordance with law, but the remonstrances of the Bristol Visiting Justices, made in their annual report, brought this question to the front and led it to be referred to this Committee; and, speaking for myself, I shall be much disappointed if, in consequence, what seems to me to be a very salutary change is not introduced.

11,403. Those two cases are very much to the point, but having regard to the fact that these cells that you speak of lasted 20 years, and also that this kind of labour which was commented on by the Bristol Justices also lasted 20 years, is not it rather a singular thing that the Bristol Justices have not made their remonstrances before and oftener?—I regret it, but in judging of the present system one must also remember the past: visiting justices and justices in sessions assembled, have, to a great extent, tolerated this useless labour for years, and bad cells too.

11,404. You suggest that the Visiting Committees should issue a more detailed annual report?—I do. At present they only send in an annual report which contains the remarks, if any, which they desire to make. I think something would be gained if the Secretary of State every year issued a circular to Visiting Committees and Visiting Justices specifying the headings that is the principle features of prison administration upon which he will request full observations and suggestions. This report should, with an analysis, be laid before Parliament.

11,405. Then according to that method the analysis would be left, I take it, practically to the Secretary of State?—Well, he would have the initiative in drawing up the heads on which he required observations but of course any observations on any other head would be welcomed.

11,406. Would not one danger of that system be this, that the Visiting Committees would get into the habit of thinking that all important points would be submitted to them for a certain time of year by the Secretary of State, and therefore would not they be more inclined to slacken their own personal interest in the prisons and devote themselves to answering the questions as best they could when they received them?—Well, it is difficult to prevent prejudices, but I certainly think the circular could be drawn in such terms as would directly negative that view. It would state that the Secretary of State relied upon receiving the full benefit of the experience of Visiting Committees, and that therefore it was necessary for them to pay close attention to the administration of the prisons in order that they might respond to any inquiry which he might make of them.

11,407. Would it be better to issue that circular at the beginning instead of at the end of the year?—Well there would be no objection to that, perhaps there might be two circulars.

11,408. You remember the letter addressed by the Secretary of State—I think it was to a particular Visiting Committee—in 1878. It is a letter that was quoted very fully in the Report of the Kimberley Commission?—On what subject is it?

11,409. It is a letter calling the attention of the visiting committee to the intention and provisions of the Act of 1877, which put upon the Visiting Justices various duties and responsibilities. The intention of the letter was to make the Visiting Committees fulfil those duties more thoroughly in the future?—I do not remember that letter, but I have a general recollection that Lord Cross had great anxiety to secure for Visiting Justices full scope of exercising a useful influence on prison administration. As you are aware, there was a good deal of jealousy felt at the passing of the Act, and the superseding of the justices; and two Visiting Justices were associated with Sir Edmund Du Cane for the express purpose of giving him the benefit of their experience.

11,410. But under the Act of 1877 the Visiting Committees have excessively large powers. If they choose to act very fully on those powers, should not you say they would possess now under that Act a very direct power of interference with the administration of the prisons?—Yes, I believe it would be just that. It would not be assistance, it would be interference. Those words I regard now as surplusage in the Act. They were practically borrowed from the earlier Act, and I am quite sure that if they had been duly criticised at the time, persons would have felt that they would have been inoperative. I mean under the earlier arrangements the Quarter Sessions met periodically; they made their rules for the prison, and then of course it was quite necessary to see that those rules were carried out, and also to see that anything that happened in the meantime should be duly attended to. The Visiting Justices did that, and if you compare the words in the section of the Act of 1877 with the corresponding section (I think it is section 58) of the Act of 1865, you will see that the words in the Act of 1877 are a good deal borrowed from the earlier Act. I do not see how full operation could be given to those words without causing interference.

11,411. I think that you said that the Prison Commissioners by their strong administration make a clean sweep of the prisons, and leave very little to do for the Visiting Justices?—Yes, the Visiting Justices say so themselves.

11,412. But it would be possible, would not it, for the Prison Commissioners to intrust some of that sweeping to the Visiting Committees?—I think not.

11,413. I said "possible," I did not say advisable, but I said "possible under the Act"?—Oh yes, they could hand them over anything almost. "They "shall report on any abuses within the prison and "also on any repairs which may be urgently required "in the prison, and shall further take cognizance of "any matters of pressing necessity and within the "powers of their commission as justices and do such "acts and perform such duties in relation to a prison "as they may be required to do or perform by the "Secretary of State." Those were intended to be soothing words to the Visiting Justices.

11,414. Have you anything further to add with regard to Visiting Committees?—Well, it has been suggested that in England, as I believe in some other countries, there should be a periodical revision, by an independent body, of prison administration. I think it very doubtful indeed whether there should be any rule or standing authority to this effect. If there was a periodical revision every year I am quite certain it would degenerate into a mere form. At the same time, I cannot doubt for a moment that great good comes from an occasional revision by a competent independent body, and I think that such a body ought from time to time to be appointed. Their report would be given to Parliament, and in my opinion the institution of such a revision would no more cast reflection on the Prison Commissioners and Directors, or interfere with their operations, than say the Public Accounts Committee interferes with the Treasury.

11,415. You would propose that that body should be dormant for seven or ten years?—Certainly; non-existent rather.

11,416. Non-existent and then nominated by the Secretary of State?—Yes.

11,417. I think you wish to express some views on certain points in the general administration of the prisons?—There are one or two details in which it seems to me the arrangement for the general administration of prisons might be improved. After what I have said you will understand that any suggestion of this kind I offer with diffidence, being fully aware of the difficulty of meddling with a complex piece of machinery on the construction and perfection of which so much thought has been expended. However in some respects the machinery has not been, I may say devised, but is the result of the procedure adopted on the occasion of the transfer to the Prison Commissioners. In working the prison machinery, too great importance I think cannot be attached to the personnel. It is not enough that a thing requiring to be done in the prison should be done; it must be done in a proper spirit. The duties of prison officers are often painful; often have to be performed under provocation; always on a helpless subject, and more or less without immediate control from a superior officer. Everything depends on the spirit, judgment, and behaviour of the officer. Any want in this respect must inevitably aggravate the lot of prisoners, and also lead to a multiplication of prison offences. Now I believe this spirit must come primarily from above, and spread downwards, I mean that everything should be done to secure the utmost influence of the Commissioners on the governors and the superior officers of the prison; and of the governors on the officers of the prisons, and on all the warders. It seems to me that the arrangements in this respect are not all that could be desired. First, in the local prisons as distinguished from the convict prisons, the Commissioners very rarely inspect themselves. They sit at Whitehall and their control is a paper control, sufficient, however (quite sufficient I admit), to keep the machinery rolling regularly round and to prevent the improper and wasteful expenditure of money, but not calculated to give them very full personal influence over the governors. The inspection by the inspectors, who are a relic of the former system which has been now superseded by another, is not altogether satisfactory. I do not go so far as to think it a useless formality, although the inspectors have no power. At least they see what is going on and understand what they see and can report anything amiss and then it will be redressed. But an inspector can never have the same personal influence on the governor and warders as a Commissioner; nor can the action of a Commissioner on a report be so effective as his personal presence; for if he visited the prison he would see many things which might seem to him to require amendment, but which would never be reported to him because not contrary to rule. I know there would be a difficulty from the number of prisons to be inspected, but inspections, I think, might be rarer; at all events, one inspection from a Commissioner would be worth three or four from an inspector. If necessary, there might be an additional Commissioner appointed in lieu of the inspectors. Some of these visits of the Commissioners would, I suppose, be surprise visits, but others would be pre-arranged; and, in the latter case, a notification should be sent to the Visiting Committee to give them an opportunity of attending in case they should like to do so. It is of importance from my point of view to bring the Commissioners into as close contact as may be with the Visiting Justices. In the next place, I certainly think that in a large prison there should be a deputy-governor. The governor cannot be everywhere, and although the principal warder may be able to do what is required to be done, I can never think that he is likely to exercise the same influence on the superior officers, and the warders, and the prisoners, as a deputy-governor, either when the governor is in residence or when he is away on a holiday. What for this purpose ought to be considered a large prison is, of course, a matter to be settled; but the line should be drawn at a much lower level than where it is now drawn. This, of course, will involve an increase of public expenditure. For the same reason I agree with those Visiting Committees that have recommended that every prison should have a governor. The prison may be small, but the conduct of all engaged ought to be at the same high line as at a large prison, and I believe a person with the position and education of a governor is far more likely to secure this than a warder in charge. I know this will be an expensive arrangement, because there are various small prisons which for local reasons cannot be extinguished, but it seems to me to be a responsibility which devolves on the Secretary of State as successor to the local authority. I am also sorry that this change should deprive principal warders of promotion, but of course there is nothing to prevent a warder being promoted to a governor if he is found really to possess the qualities which are recognised as essential for a governor as distinguished from a principal warder. Lastly, as to the warders, I think that before being definitely appointed they should pass through a period of probation, during which they should be regularly trained at certain prisons set apart for this purpose. During this period they not only could obtain methodical instruction as to their duties, but would be tested to see whether they possessed the manner and temper requisite for the proper discharge of their duties. There would be some difficulty, I suppose, as to the expense of removing their families. The warder would have to go to the expense of removing his family or be separated from his family for a while, but this would be recognised as an incident necessary to the service, and it is of course not a greater hardship than that imposed upon sailors and others.

11,418. If such a proposal were carried out probably the warders would be appointed at a rather younger age than is at present the case?—Perhaps so.

11,419. Eventually it would be so. Of course you would have to deal with the present staff, which of course means dealing with many elderly men?—I express no opinion upon that. I have not studied that part of the question, I only care to insist upon it that family difficulties shall not be allowed to prevail.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. A. Turnor.

Mr. ALGERNON TURNOR called and examined.

11,420. (Chairman.) You are the Secretary to the Post Office?—Financial secretary.

11,421. Would you kindly tell us what work you give to the Prison Department?—At the present time they make for us the whole of the canvas leather mail bags, pouches, straps, and a variety of small articles that we require. Our estimate for next year is 20,000*l.* for that. They also make all the string required for the mail bags in London and in the travelling post office, and sundry other articles, such as stamping pads, notice boards, packing cases, and boxes. That is estimated at 12,000*l.* They do not make the uniform clothing, but they make waist belts, pouches, and leggings. That is another 1,000*l.* The total comes to about 33,000*l.* in a year.

11,422. They do not make boots?—No.

11,423. Do you find that the work turned out is sufficiently good?—Yes, it is very fairly done.

11,424. And is the tendency to give more work to the prisons?—I think we have always been rather inclined to give whatever we think legitimate to the Prisons Department. We have pointed out from time to time things that they could make.

11,425. Does the Prisons Department supply the raw material?—Yes, I think that is so.

11,426. Subject, of course, to your specification?—Yes.

11,427. Then you specify what you want, I suppose, to the Prison Commissioners, and they make all the arrangements as to where the work shall be carried out, and so forth?—Yes.

11,428. You leave that entirely to them?—Yes, there is a good deal of communication between our Controller of Stores and the corresponding official of that office. They arrange all the details.

11,429. Have you found that the delivery of the goods have been fairly punctual?—Yes, fairly so.

11,430. Have you any particular criticism to offer with regard to the production of the things?—No. I think we are satisfied; what they supply answers our purpose. If we were not satisfied we should not continue with them, but they have supplied us for many years.

11,431. Have you any suggestions to make with regard to any possible improvement in the industrial system of the prison service?—Do you mean as regards the making of our articles.

11,432. On any point in connexion with industries that you are acquainted with?—Of course I am not intimately acquainted with their internal system. All that I have to do is to consider what articles we could put in their hands, and then consider their offer, and to consider whether what they perform for us is well done. There are, of course, some other articles which might possibly be made by prison labour, but I do not know how far they have got opportunities for making these other articles. For instance, you mentioned boots just now. We have contracts for boots, not for postmen, but for telegraph messengers; we do not supply the postmen with boots. It might be a question whether they could not perform some of this work for the telegraph messengers. I do not think that subject has ever been raised with the Prison Commissioners.

11,433. Have you ever had occasion to rescind orders, or to cease giving orders for particular articles because they were badly turned out?—No, I think not.

11,434. Then some of the articles you mentioned involve a fair degree of skill in their manufacture?—Yes. Of course mail bags are simple things, and we want a great quantity of them. We want them well sewn and stout. There is not a great degree of skill in that; that is the main item with which they supply us, pouches and straps require a little more skill of course in making.

11,435. You have not made yourself acquainted with what I call the industrial system of the prisons; you are not familiar with the comparative degree of competence as between one class of prisoner and another?—No, we have no information of that sort.

11,436. You are satisfied with the work that has been done, and you are quite prepared on the same footing to extend it, assuming that the things would be equally well done in the future?—Yes, if we are fairly satisfied they could perform it to date. We are obliged to be particular to get in a supply in time.

11,437. (Sir Algernon West.) Looking at it from a financial point of view, do you regulate the price you pay the prisons for this work?—In some cases we ask for tenders, and we get prices offered by the prison authorities and compare them. Of course we should not pay more to the prison authorities than we should to a contractor.

11,438. May I ask you, looking at it from the prison point of view, whether you would pay them less, or merely if their's is the lowest tender you would accept it?—Their tender is lower generally, and naturally so, because they have not so many expenses as a contractor.

11,439. Of course; but would it be possible to say it was unfair to give this contract for labour required by the Post Office because they undersell the ordinary trade; or is it a very small sum?—There is a considerable difference between the prices. There is no profit in quotations from prisons; the Prisons Department do not require to make a profit. You can hardly compare the two, I think.

11,440. When you call for a tender, I will say, for these bags, is it a tender by open competition?—In many of these cases we have gone on for many years, and continue to employ from year to year the prison authorities, we do not invariably ask for tenders in the open market.

11,441. The prison authorities have got a monopoly?—Yes, to a certain extent.

11,442. Do you think you could extend your suggestion if more work could be done, and it was thought advisable to have it done by prisoners, to other things. Could not you employ the prisoners in making uniforms. You supply them I think to your telegraph boys and others?—We supply uniforms to telegraph boys and others.

11,443. And you see no objection to that?—Well, I should very much doubt the expediency of doing that. We have to supply an enormous number of uniforms up to a given date, and meet with great discontent if they are not ready, and also with very great inconvenience. Unless we were truly satisfied that the Prisons Department could do the work as well as the contractor, and turn it out up to date, I should very much doubt the expediency.

11,444. Perhaps you are aware that in France they do make uniforms, and that they make for the police and for the Civil Guards in the prisons, and that sort of thing?—Yes.

11,445. But provided the work was good, and came up to your sample, you see no other objection to utilising prison labour do you?—I very much doubt whether they could perform the whole of our work. The contract would have to be divided, and there is always an inconvenience in dividing a contract into very small divisions.

11,446. I suppose it is enormous?—It is enormous. We are just making a new contract, and we have found that we have made it very much cheaper this year than has been hitherto the case, by dividing the cloth from the tailoring. We buy the cloth ourselves, and then get a contract for the tailoring part. Of course the tailoring part is very important, and we have to be satisfied that the clothes are well put together.

11,447. Quite so, but provided all that is done to your satisfaction, you do not see any objection to giving a portion of that to the prisons, as you do divide it now?—There is the inconvenience of splitting up into very small divisions.

11,448. But you do that now I think?—We have a separate contract for Ireland, and we have one contract for the whole of Great Britain

The witness withdrew.

Colonel J. T. Barrington called and examined.

11,449. (Chairman.) You are the Superintendent of Inspectors of Stores at Woolwich Dockyard, I think?—Yes.

11,450. Do you conduct any business necessary to the giving of orders to the Prison Department?—No, I inspect the stores, that is to say, the inspectors under me inspect the stores that are made in the prisons, I do not give the orders.

11,451. Can you tell me what work the Prison Department does for the War Office?—Yes, the prisons make rugs, and mats, and baskets of various kinds, and also oil bottles of various kinds and sizes. They have made those for several years, supplying their own material and making their own arrangements; in fact, tendering as a contractor would outside. But last year there was a new departure, and they got orders for bedding on a limited scale—about 12,000 bed cases and bolster cases for which the materials are supplied by the War Department; and they simply make up the articles and send them in, and the War Department pays the carriage. That was a new departure last year, and it is being continued again this year on the same scale, but the Prison Department wish to have the orders increased.

11,452. Where is the material sent?—The material is sent from the Arsenal; from the Commissary-General in the Arsenal to the several prisons. He is informed of the proportions to be sent to each prison. This year there are no less than 9 prisons, but last year there were only four in the metropolitan district.

11,453. Will you give us the names of those prisons?—For last year, they were Wandsworth, Holloway, Pentonville, and Wormwood Scrubs. This year they are Holloway, Wandsworth, Wakefield, Pentonville, Knutsford, Strangeways, Stafford, Liverpool, and Wormwood Scrubs.

11,454. Could you tell us the money value of the work done by the prisons?—Rather over 2,440*l.* for the present financial year.

11,455. The numbers of articles are large?—In the aggregate there were 26,766 oil bottles made during the past five years, and 7,000 door-mats 1,700 passage mats, 1,800 hearthrugs, and 18,866 baskets of various kinds, so that they represent in the aggregate a considerable value.

11,456. Are you satisfied with the quality of the work?—Yes; on the whole the quality of the work is very satisfactory, and especially in the tin work.

11,457. Do you have to make many rejections?—Very few.

11,458. Not more than you would in the case of an ordinary contractor?—Less.

11,459. Less than in the case of an ordinary contract?—Yes, much less; they have not the temptation to send in inferior material.

11,460. And they do not scamp the work?—No, they do not scamp the work. We had a difficulty in one contract with them. A few years ago they had an order to make 800 grocery panniers. They are covered baskets to go upon pack animals, and supplied to regiments in the field. It was a new order to them, and it was rather a large order for them to take up, It was not altogether satisfactory, although they got through it, and eventually supplied them all. But we had trouble; they had to take some of them back and make some alterations. The fittings were bad, although the wickerwork was good. They are quite capable of doing the work.

11,461. Have the goods been punctually delivered?—Fairly punctually.

11,462. Do you find any difference between some London prisons and prisons some distance away like Knutsford or Liverpool?—Well, we have not had anything from those distant prisons. This is the first year those distant prisons have got an order. The mats are made at Lewes, Bedford, Canterbury, and Wormwood Scrubs. They make the mats. I have not heard that there is any more delay in the country prisons. I think they are fairly up to time.

Colonel J. T. Burrington.

11 Feb. 1895.

11,463. Have you heard at all that the work of one prison is better than the work of another?—No, we have not.

11,464. There is no appreciable difference?—No. I think we have very little trouble indeed with the prison work. We had trouble with brushes from the millitary prison at Gosport a few years ago. They had an order for 5,000 brushes, and they made the bulk of them very fairly; then towards the end they began to make up the inferior material which they had set aside, what would be called outside the waste. Those were very inferior brushes. How to get rid of their waste is a difficulty they have to contend with.

11,465. Do you see your way at all to give further orders, larger orders, to the Prisons Department?—There are a good many things of the same simple character that they could make for us, such as sand bags and corn bags, sackings for beds, and sacks of various kinds, barrack sheets, tent valises, and pin bags. Anything of that simple class they could do, and fencing jackets, they are made of canvas. Then in the tin work they might take other things. They now take oil bottles almost exclusively, but they might also do meat dishes, funnels, dust pans, pudding shapes, baking tins, and drums and cylinders for oil and paint. Those are all simple things, and they could do them. They might also do woodwork, such as boards of various kinds, bed-head boards used in hospitals, diet scale boards, inventory, knife and notice boards; also simple wooden boxes, such as brush boxes and salt boxes, cradles for camp kettles, trestles, and bed boards for field service. They might try soldiers boxes. There are a large number of soldiers boxes now got. Every soldier gets a box, and they are not difficult to make. I have not added to the baskets, because they practically do all kinds of baskets. There is no reason why they should not try brushes and bass brooms also. There are a very large number also of brushes and bass brooms got, but there is the difficulty of working up the waste material, the short material which in the trade they could work up into small brushes. If they had no outlet for that outside, it would be thrown upon their hands.

11,466. I suppose they could manage to sell that periodically?—I suppose they could, no doubt, if there was no objection outside to it.

11,467. You have no particular criticism to make with regard to the general arrangements for manufacture and delivery of the stores by the Prison Department?—I think that if a practical representative of the Department were to see our patterns, and say what they think they could do, and what they could turn out per annum, and approximately in equal deliveries monthly, that that would be a good way of starting. Then they could send an estimate to the War Office, we will say before the commencement of the financial year, and the War Office would then say what they could give them to do; but it would be essential that the orders should be fairly punctually delivered, and it would be for the convenience of the prisons and also for the convenience of inspection that they should come in periodically, and also in equal deliveries.

11,468. You keep certain stores of those articles I suppose?—The stores are kept in the Arsenal, in another department. I merely inspect them, and pass them into the storehouses.

11,469. I mean the goods manufactured by the prisons would first of all go into the stores?—No, they would come to me first to be inspected, and then they would go into store.

11,470. So that absolute punctuality would not be essential. It would be desirable, but not absolutely essential?—It is very desirable, because the Commissary-General does not keep large reserves, and he has out-stations calling on him for supplies for the troops, and if he has not got them, complaints come in from the stations through the Generals Commanding, that the troops are without their stores; and then there is trouble all round. For that reason it would not be well to give the prisons the bulk of large orders, but to give them portions, so that the Director of Artillery and the Director of Contracts could go to the trade and spread the contracts over a wide field if they wanted to get in quick deliveries.

11,471. It would not be possible, I suppose, for the prisons, say, in the north of England, to deal direct with the Northern Military District. All goods would still, you think, have to come up to Woolwich?—Well, in simple things that is now done to some extent. The Military Prison at Gosport, for instance, sends stores to be inspected at the Gun Wharf at Portsmouth, and if the Ordnance Store Officer there has any doubt about their quality, he sends a sample up to me at the Dockyard at Woolwich, or an inspector could go down occasionally, if there were any necessity.

11,472. I suppose you have found that on the whole it has answered for the War Department to give these orders to the prisons?—As far as I am concerned personally, it answers very well; and the Commissary-General, who is responsible, under the Director of Artillery, for the maintenance of the supplies at stations, has no objection to it, provided it is not carried too far, so that there shall still be a margin to work upon with the trade.

11,473. I understand you are well satisfied as a whole with the quality of the goods delivered?—Yes, quite so.

11,474. (Mr. De Rutzen.) Have you any idea of the money value of the things which you have suggested could be done by the prisons?—I have stated the approximate value of the stores now made. The value from year to year must of course depend upon the orders actually given to the Prison Department.

11,475. (Dr. Bridges.) Are the goods supplied by the prisons at a lower price than those you get from the trade?—I believe the prisons are called upon to tender, and they tender to the Director of Contracts when supplies are wanted. Then their tenders are compared with the tenders from the trade, and if they are too high they are not accepted. As a rule, I believe the prices compare favourably with trade-prices, having regard to the lowest-tender system. And, with such simple stores as those entrusted to the prisons, there is no reason why they should not, as profits have not to be taken into consideration, beyond covering expenses.

The proceedings were adjourned for a short time.

Sir G. Lushington, K.C.B.

Sir Godfrey Lushington, K.C.B., recalled and further examined.

11,476. (Chairman.) Do you think that the present prison system is sufficiently deterrent?—I think prison is unquestionably deterrent to the community in general. That is, it deters ordinary persons from committing crime. I cannot doubt that if imprisonment were abolished without any substitute there would be an enormous increase of crime. Therefore, it ought to be maintained, though it may fail to deter any prisoner from falling into crime again. Recidivism is not the test of an effective prison system. How far recidivism is on the increase I cannot say, but the statistics can only be taken with qualification. The increased shortness of sentences of course tends to make prison less deterrent, and also to multiply the opportunities for recidivism. On the general question I should suppose that actual experience of the inside of a prison is not deterrent on the very young, nor on the habitual criminal, nor on the habitual drunkard; and perhaps it is not deterrent on the very very poor; but on others I should think experience of a prison had a deterrent effect. The shame to have been in prison, the shame to have been in the company of known criminals, and all the misery occasioned to friends and family, the injury and ruin of business, and so on, must have their effect.

11,477. When you said the statistics must be received with qualification had you specially in your mind the difficulty of identification?—No I had not, but of course that is a very serious difficulty.

11,478. What particular point had you in your mind?—Well I meant that if they compared the present period with a distant antecedent period that comparison might lead to fallacious results.

11,479. The law has changed?—Yes, and of course the enormous multiplication of small prison offences affects it. The criminal law has been enormously magnified and extended. I do not know how many hundred new offences are created every year.

11,480. Do you consider the present prison system of a reformatory character?—Well that is a very doubtful matter indeed, but perhaps it might be useful if I were to point out the elements in prison life which seem to me to make for, and those which seem to me to make against reformation. As favourable conditions I would specify, first, the actual separation from vicious associates and rendering it impossible for a prisoner to commit crime. Secondly, prison labour which may help to teach a prisoner a trade, or at least may help to give him habits of industry. This influence, however, must be slight indeed in the case of short sentence prisoners, and in all cases its moral effect is diminished by the fact that prison labour is forced labour, and it passes into a minimum quantity where the prison labour is useless labour. Then there is the influence of the chaplain and of religious services. In some cases this may be, and is, I believe, very valuable, as where the prisoner is still susceptible to good impressions, or sick; but on the whole I should put it down as coming to something very little indeed. I cannot think that all the ministers, say 150, can have produced much effect upon the 168,000 persons who passed through the local prisons in 1893, many spending only a few days there, and all of them of very unpromising material. It must also be borne in mind in this matter that the prisoners are not free agents, and have therefore no opportunity to give effect to any good intentions they may form. The one prison requirement is to conform to rules, and judged by that standard most prisoners attain perfection. To my mind the special good done by the chaplain is that he is one of the three officers (the governor and the medical officer being the other two) who are at liberty to speak to a prisoner as a man to a man. On the other hand the influences unfavourable to reformation are in my opinion very strong indeed. First, the so-called solitary confinement of a convict for nine months, of a local prisoner for one month, I regard as unfavourable. I should hold the same opinion if I could assume that all this time the prisoner was brooding over his sins and undergoing prolonged moral penance.

11,481. On that point of the nine months solitary confinement, the practice simply survives from the days when there was transportation, I understand. The nine months solitary confinement was designed, originally, to be a preparation for transportation?—I daresay that may be so. I forgot that; but I think it was strongly insisted upon by one of the Commissions, either Sir George Grey's or Lord Kimberley's.

11,482. Yes, that was so. But the system has not been designed in late years by the Secretary of State, or by the Prison Commissioners; it has been a survival from 50 years ago?—Yes. Then, I regard as unfavourable to reformation the status of a prisoner throughout his whole career; the crushing of self-respect; the starving all moral instinct he may possess; the absence of all opportunity to do or receive a kindness; the continual association with none but criminals, and that only as a separate item amongst other items also separate; the forced labour and the denial of all liberty. I believe the true mode of reforming a man or restoring him to society is exactly in the opposite direction of all these. But, of course, this is a mere idea. It is quite impracticable in a prison. In fact, the unfavourable features I have mentioned are inseparable from a prison life. All that I care to insist on is that this treatment is not reformatory. I consider that a mediæval thief who had his right hand chopped off was much more likely to turn over a new leaf than a convict who has had 10 years penal servitude.

11,483. Do I understand that you do not think it is possible to introduce a reformatory element into the prison?—That is my opinion.

11,484. And therefore that the prison system should be simply punitive and deterrent?—Yes.

11,485. And therefore that it is of no use to make an effort to make it anything else?—I do not see how any effort of that kind could be made successfully. In addition to those features of prison life which I have indicated as not likely to help the prisoner to abstain from crime when he leaves the prison, we have to consider the condition in which imprisonment leaves him on discharge. In the case of penal servitude and other long sentences of imprisonment, a prisoner having served a period in which everything has been provided for him by his masters, and prescribed by order, and in which not a shred of liberty has been permitted to him, is at once let loose into a world of complete liberty. There he has to shift for himself, with a small gratuity, but nothing more. His business, if any, probably gone, his family, may be, ruined or alienated, or scattered, and his own character lost. This is a dismal but true picture. It is to some degree mitigated by the intervention of the Discharged Prisoners Aid Societies. Hitherto the work of those societies, except so far as formal communication might have been made with the governors of prisons, has been, really, altogether outside the sphere of prison administration; and on the whole I am inclined to think it had better remain so. But I think the aid societies should be more subsidised than they are, and in some respects have greater facilities allowed them. Assuredly the work is one of very great importance, and which is capable of great extension. It might be objected that more ought not to be done for the ex-criminal than for the virtuous poor, but this objection is removed by the great danger to society caused by the abandonment of discharged prisoners.

11,486. Have you any knowledge of the method or principle under which the 4,000*l.* a year grant is distributed to the different prisons?—I have some little knowledge of it, but I think it is stated accurately in the evidence of one of the witnesses who has been before you. I think you had better have that from someone who is more intimate with it than I am.

11,487. Then you would not, I suppose, give a perfectly free hand to the representatives of Prisoners Aid Societies while the sentence is current?—No, I think it would lead to great mischief if further opportunities were allowed to ladies and other visitors with respect to prisoners while under sentence. I also recognise the evil of societies competing for prisoners when the time comes for discharge, but subject to this every facility should be granted. It would not be well, I think, to submit to each prisoner the various lists of societies, but if a prisoner expresses a desire to see the representative of any society, then, as now, it should be gratified. And further, to prevent clashing arrangements and to allow the utmost scope to each society, I think arrangements might be made by the governor for an equitable distribution of the work amongst the various societies which seek to take a part in it. Supposing, for instance, there were two societies at a certain prison, the Salvation Army and a local society, the governor could arrange that each should take prisoners on alternate days or alternate months, or that one should take one class of prisoners and another another. I think all that could be settled without difficulty and to advantage. I may add that I am not aware that there are any societies to aid the families of prisoners during their detention. Good work could be done in this direction, but it would be a work of very great difficulty.

11 Feb. 1895.

11,488. You would agree, probably, that it is desirable to get more inter-communication between the Prisoners Aid Societies for the purpose of identifying criminals who make an improper use of these societies?—Yes, I belong to, I think, two of those societies myself, but I am not very familiar with their operations, and I should be afraid there would be likely to be some jealousy between different aid societies. Whether they might combine just for the purpose you mention I do not know.

11,489. Without some such system of communication an old offender who has been perhaps in the convict prisons or in London prisons, and who changes his scene of operations and goes up to the north, may present himself up there to the Prisoners Aid Societies as an injured individual, and take advantage of them unfairly?—Yes, that would be so.

11,490. Possibly it would be desirable to arrange so that either by communication with the prison or police authorities, or by inter-communication between themselves, that undesirable result should be avoided?—I have not thought out that part of the subject, but I believe that more could be done to reform the prisoner and help the prisoner after he gets out than when he is in; and if the State by its prison organisation can in any way help on the work, I think it ought to do so.

11,491. Perhaps you will now give your views to the committee on the question of classification?—As to classification, it seems to me, in the first place, that it is essential that when a sentence has once been pronounced by a court of law it should be known to be what it is, and it should be carried out without any modification. This, of course, does not prevent variety in the form of sentence. The sentence of the court may be one of imprisonment with labour or without labour, just as it may be for two or for three months; and so again the effect of a sentence may be known to be different according as the person sent to penal servitude is a man or a woman, and so on; but in my opinion it would be quite wrong and hopelessly impracticable for a governor or other official to have the power of mitigating in prison any sentence with a view to equalise the penal effect of sentences on different classes of prisoners. I am quite satisfied that in this respect equality is equity. But so long as sentences are carried out equally for all, there is no objection on principle to any classification of prisoners with a view to convenience of prison management, or to prevent prisoners injuring themselves or one another. In convict prisons, where persons work in association on public works, and are detained for considerable periods, there are such classifications. There is the star class for those who are sentenced for the first time, or supposed to be, as it were, first offenders; and again, the weak-minded convicts are kept apart. In local prisons there would, of course, be much more difficulty in classification, and also there is nothing like the same reason for it, as prisoners do not work together on public works, and they are detained comparatively for so short a time.

11,492. What is your opinion with regard to juveniles?—I am entirely against the imprisonment of children under 16; but I may say not for the reason usually given. I do not believe in actual contamination inside the prison. The younger prisoners are exercised apart from the elder ones, and there can be no real conversation between them. The actual mischief which comes from juveniles being in prison is, no doubt, what has been pointed out, namely, their possible after recognition by the older prisoners when they come out; but though this may lead to the ruin of certain individual prisoners, I am rather incredulous about its being carried out on a large scale. However, my objection to the imprisonment of young persons is that imprisonment is at once not severe enough, and too severe. It is not severe enough because boys at this age make light of a short period of imprisonment. Unlike their elders, they are accustomed to be ordered about; they do not mind discomfort and hardship. They have no anxiety for their family being impoverished, and no power of looking forward or realising the after effects of imprisonment. On the other hand, the punishment is, in its subsequent consequences, far too severe. The boys, when they grow up, carry through life the stigma of having been in prison, perhaps only for a freak of mischief; and they get to think of themselves in association with crime and criminals, which is bad for them, in some cases depressing to them, in other cases stimulating them to criminal exploits. I think the imprisonment of boys and girls could be done away with if the Bill of the late Government were brought into operation.

11,493. Which Bill do you refer to?—It is the "Summary Jurisdiction (Youthful Offenders) Bill," which was brought in by Mr. Henry Matthews on the 9th February 1891. It is a Bill which gives to the magistrates various powers of dealing with young criminals and their parents instead of sending them to prison. I was going to say the law at present works deplorably ill. A boy commits some outrageous piece of mischief; the justices think this so bad that they must take notice of it, but they can only fine; the boy cannot pay, and the father will not, so that the boy has to go to prison. It is shocking, I think, that boys should be imprisoned for acts of that kind. Flogging can now only be imposed for certain offences, but the Bill would allow the justices, if I remember rightly, whether they convict or not, either to order a flogging, or to fine the parent, or to require the parent to enter into securities for the good behaviour of his child. The Bill was opposed because it authorised flogging, but, even if the flogging was struck out of it, I still think it would be very well worth having.

11,494. In what you have said you do not contemplate the establishment, I gather, of a Government reformatory?—No, certainly not. The idea of a Government reformatory, I think, is that boys might be subjected to a long course of penal treatment without the stigma of having been in prison. Now, in the first place, I believe that the stigma would attach to this penal reformatory just as much as it does now to an ordinary reformatory or even to a gaol. There is some stigma attaching now to reformatory boys; they are not allowed to enter the Navy at all, and there is often difficulty found in disposing of them in any respectable calling or in any respectable service. Then, which is a stronger objection in my mind, prolonged penal treatment, I consider, is wholly unsuited for boys, and thoroughly bad for them. What father would think of keeping his son in disgrace for two or three years? It seems to me a completely unnatural and inappropriate treatment. On the contrary, what is wanted is kindness and encouragement. Ordinary reformatories profess not to be penal at all, but of course they are penal, they cannot help being so, and I think they are a great deal too much so. The isolation, the monotony, the complete dependence of life, and the want of all the free play of society in general—these must be terribly penal to a young boy, and, in my mind, they constitute very serious drawbacks to the reformatory system. It is true that in well-managed small reformatories—I lay emphasis on the word "small"—these adverse influences are, to a certain extent, counteracted by the friendly and fatherly interest taken in the boys by the managers, but this redeeming element is exactly what would be absent from the State reformatory. A new Parkhurst would be a prison in another name.

11,495. I understand you are speaking now with especial reference to juveniles?—Yes.

11,496. Would your objection extend to a penal reformatory for a rather older class of young offenders?—I think it would simply be a prison.

11,497. Of course, we have had evidence to show, at least statements have been made to show, that the habitual criminal is created practically between the ages of 16 and 21 as a rule. If any establishment could be organised in the nature of a prison, but which was specially adapted for the teaching of industrial work; and at any rate for giving a great deal of agricultural work and land reclamation work to them, do not you think that such a prison might possibly succeed with a certain number of these young offenders who simply have turned out habitual offenders by the present prison system as it is?—That is not my view. I do not like prisons much, but in some respects I prefer them to reformatories; that is to say, I would far rather send a lad of 17 or 18 to a comparatively brief term of imprisonment than I would shut him up in a reformatory between 18 and 21, which I believe is now what many of the reformatory managers are asking for. In my opinion, when a boy has been free up till 16, he is too old to bend himself to the severe discipline of reformatory life, for the first time imposed upon him; and it is in my judgment entirely wrong that lads from 18 to 21, who are really young men, should be treated like children, have everything ordered for them, and in case of disobedience should be liable to be flogged. Such treatment is not likely to turn them out good useful men, or make them inclined to do their duty to the community. I should say that proposals to this effect coming from reformatory managers ought to be very carefully scrutinized. As it is, reformatory managers notoriously keep the boys too long. It was distinctly so reported by the Commission which was presided over by Lord Aberdare. It is, of course, to the interest of managers to keep their reformatories full, and also to have the profit from the remunerative labour of the older boys; but, apart from this, there must be a tendency on the part of managers to attach excessive importance to the advantages to the boys of the institution—advantages which are always en evidence—and not to be sufficiently sensible of the drawbacks which ever accompany a protracted life in the reformatory; so they become inclined to unduly put off making the experiment, for it must be always more or less an experiment of restoring their young protegés into freedom and social life.

At this stage of the proceedings the Chair was taken by Sir Algernon West.

11,498. (Sir Algernon West.) May I follow for a moment that subject about these reformatories. Do you know yourself personally anything as to the conduct of the Redhill Reformatory?—I know a little about it; I read the evidence which has been given.

11,499. It is rather on the same principle as our large public schools. There are separate houses, and it is conducted very much the same as a large public school, and I certainly say the per-centage of boys there who turn out well and lead good honest lives is much greater than they would be at any of the public schools, because I think they said that they amount to 93 per cent. of the boys that go there. I was tremendously impressed with Redhill?—I do not accept those statistics without qualification.

11,500. No, I suppose not?—First of all it assumes that all the boys, because they were convicted boys, would turn out ill. That is, I think, a large assumption; and in the next place it assumes that the whole of that long detention has been necessary to secure their reformation. But I quite concur with you that, as far as I know, the system of conducting the Redhill Reformatory is the right one, that is to say, that boys of different ages are separated, and not more than a certain number of boys are collected under the same roof, so that there is some possibility of giving them personal attention. But when you compare them with our public schools, I recollect that schoolboys have four months holidays in the year, when they are with their fathers and mothers, and brothers, and sisters. I think there is a very great difference there.

11,501. I did not quite mean it was the same, but I meant the system was the same of separate boarding-houses, separate messing, and having their amusements separate in each house. In each house they have their football matches and so on?—Yes.

11,502. They, I think, as you said in the evidence, were anxious to extend the age. You would not agree with that?—No, I should not accede to it.

11,503. Then going on with classification, I think you have something to tell us about lunatics?—Well, I really do not think I have much to say about lunatics. It will, of course, be remembered when persons suggest that lunatics are continued to be dealt with as prisoners that there can be no indisposition on the part of the prison officers to recognise them as lunatics. The officials have no motive for such action whatever; on the contrary, lunatic or quasi lunatic prisoners are usually more or less troublesome prisoners. A certificate of lunacy gets rid of a troublesome prisoner, and a medical officer can be under no apprehension that he will suffer any unpleasant consequences from granting a certificate of lunacy; on the contrary, he knows that the effect of the certificate will be to ameliorate the lot of the prisoner.

11,504. And you think certificates would be granted far easier in the case of prisoners than they would with an outside person?—I should think so. I see the question has been raised whether the examination on admission is too perfunctory to offer a reasonable security that an insane prisoner would be distinguished. As to this, I think we must remember the circumstances under which the examination is made. This is not a case where the examination has for its object to ascertain once for all whether a man is lunatic. It is not like a case where the finding of lunacy carries with it irretrievable consequences, as, where a free man has to be shut up for life as a lunatic; or as where a convict under a capital sentence will have to undergo that sentence. There are, of course, different classes of prisoners who all pass through the examination. First there are the remand prisoners and the prisoners committed for trial. These have all passed through the hands of the police and have been before the court before they come to the prison. Therefore there is some slight presumption that they are not lunatic, except those who are specially sent to be under observation. The purpose of examining these prisoners is to ascertain, not that they are fit for penal imprisonment, but whether they are fit for mere detention for a few days or a few weeks, as the case may be; and during that detention prisoners are under observation, not under very strict observation it is true, but under observation more effectual than they would have received out of doors. Then as to the sentenced prisoners; most of these have been through the prison previous to their trial, at all events they have undergone their trial in open court, and the object of the examination is to ascertain whether they are fit for penal treatment. When removed to the prison punishment they are daily under the eye of a warder, are seen every day also by the governor, and (if they complain) by the medical officer. I think that these seem to me sufficient safeguards that penal treatment will not be imposed on or be continued to persons who are insane or on the verge of insanity, I mean persons who are generally considered to be insane—though, of course, I know what I say will not satisfy those experts who hold more subtle views of lunacy, and think that most criminals should be treated as lunatic patients.

11,505 What you tell us would rather lead us to doubt the accuracy of the insane statistics?—Yes, there have been statistics offered to the public which, I think, can scarcely be accepted. For instance, a prison is compared to a village, and at that rate Holloway, with its 22,000 prisoners passing through it in a year, is compared with a town of 700 or 800 inhabitants, simply because that is the average daily number of prisoners in the prison.

11,506. That at once throws great doubt on these statistics?—Yes, and of course, the population is quite different in the two cases. In one it is mixed and indiscriminate, in the other it consists solely of criminals, and a good many of these are also of the pauper class. Then the conditions are all different also.

Sir G. Lushington, K.C.B.

11 Feb. 1895.

Unlike persons outside, prisoners are on the one hand safe from drink, safe from hardship, safe from vicious associations, and from all the trials of love and business which are supposed to specially lead to insanity; and they are also under medical supervision. On the other hand, they suffer from the shock of imprisonment, from the isolation, monotony, and limited amount of exercise which are the incidents of prison life, and which also, of course, lead to solitary vice. I may take this opportunity of saying that quite independent of the bearing of the question upon lunacy, I think that all prisoners should have Sunday exercise, and that an addition to the staff should be made for the purpose.

11,507. You think that is important?—I do; I think that is necessary.

11,508. Then as to habitual criminals?—I have no remarks to make as to habitual criminals.

11,509. And drunkards?—As to drunkards, what I should say is that few persons would question that habitual drunkards could be more effectually treated in an asylum than in a gaol; therefore, it would be well for the gaol to be rid of them. But the practical difficulty is whether they could be committed to an asylum for a period long enough to produce good results without causing excessive hardship to themselves and to their families.

11,510. Have you at all come to any conclusion as to what time you think would be any good in shutting up an habitual drunkard?—No; I was not a member of the Committee which inquired into that subject; but I think everybody assumes that the period of deprivation from drink must be a long one.

11,511. I think we have had it given us that a year would be the least, and two years would be better. Of course, as you say, there are families to be thought of in those cases. Then, as to these men who are put into prison really for contempt of court, who are called debtors. It always struck me in visiting these gaols, that they are a worthless and disturbing element in the gaols, and I have heard instances of men who are put in for a small debt, which they can pay and will not pay, having dinners more costly than the debt they will not pay?—I daresay it is so. Those are quite my views. No person can be sent to prison for mere debt, unless the court finds that he could have paid, and has not paid, and would not pay. Those men seem to me to be dishonest, and I see no reason whatever why they should not be treated as criminal prisoners.

11,512. Then as to prison labour?—My view is that labour absolutely unproductive and useless should be discontinued, or at all events never imposed, except as it is in convict prisons by way of a special punishment. For prisoners under sentences too short to admit of their being taught a trade, even a simple one, labour not useless, but purely mechanical, seems the very last resource, but for all others work requiring some intelligence should be found, and such as may be useful hereafter, whether as having helped the prisoner to form habits of industry or as having given him some little knowledge of a trade. I am aware that there is difficulty in carrying out this policy. It is difficult to find such work or customers for the product. It may be necessary to remove prisoners to a greater extent away from the prisons near which their friends reside, in order to collect them into another prison where they would have an opportunity to learn a trade, and certainly more money will have to be spent in providing workshops, more warders to supervise, and skilled warders to give instruction; also money to meet the cost of waste and spoiled material or products that do not fetch their market price; but I believe these difficulties are all to be overcome.

11,513. I suppose your difficulty in removing a prisoner from one place to another is the hardship you inflict upon his relations by not being able to see him?—Yes; a great point was made of that at the time the Prisons Act of 1877 was passed.

11,514. Then, except as a punishment, you would do away with the treadmill and with the crank?—Well, with the treadmill and the crank which do nothing.

11,515. But do you like even a treadmill which grinds?—I put that as the lowest class of useful labour. In saying that I attach very great importance to the abolition of useless labour; I should wish to add that the area to which productive labour is applicable is not so large as might at first appear. After eliminating all remand prisoners, all prisoners committed for trial, all very short-sentence prisoners, all sick prisoners and debtors (if debtors are allowed to be continued), the residue who can be put to productive labour forms comparatively a small part of the total number of prisoners. Of course, in the case of convict prisoners, it is very different.

11,516. Would you say whether you think greater advantages might not be given to well-behaved prisoners of the star class. The only advantage they have now is absolute isolation from other prisoners?—I should object to any advantages being given, except they were open to all prisoners alike. I mean for good conduct.

11,517. Would you like these advantages to be increased. You are aware, no doubt, that in several foreign countries they allow them to earn a small wage; and part of it—I am not quite sure what the proportion is—goes to the State, part of it goes to a fund to help them when they go out, and part they may either send home or spend in small luxuries in the prison, that is to say for a little better food. That is for prisoners of very good conduct?—Well, I have not thought of that subject, and therefore I should not like to express an opinion. Before leaving the question of labour may I add that I think wherever it can be managed—in many cases, of course, it is impossible from the circumstances of the prison—it would be a great advantage to employ prisoners in outside labour. The consideration of extra cost of staff or of any extra fencing ought not to be allowed to prevent that.

11,518. Well, I think that is your general evidence. There is no other point?—I did wish to add a few words about prison offences and prison punishments. I have no suggestion to make as to the powers of punishment conferred respectively on governors and Visiting Committees. There are objections, of course, to every kind of punishment—to corporal punishment, dietary punishment, manacles, or punishment cells; but on the whole I should think that dietary punishments, if strictly limited, are the least objectionable. The system of marks seems very well adapted to diminish the number of each of these special punishments; but it seems somewhat defective in stopping short when the full gratuity has been earned. If there are objections to extending it in this direction (of which I am not aware), it would be advantageous that a prisoner with more than a seven months sentence should, like a convict, be able to earn some remission. Also to meet the case of violently refractory prisoners, I see no reason why visiting justices should not be empowered to add to the sentence, of course within very strict limits, say not more than a period equal to the original sentence itself, or to not more than a month, whichever was the least.

11,519. Then you evidently view the case of the prisoner who goes for two years without any remission as being in a worse position than that of a convict for three years with the remission?—Well, I believe that the life in the local prison is supposed to be harder than in the convict prison. It is harder in consequence of his not working on public works. One gets two years and three months, the other gets two years.

11,520. May I ask you one other question which you will perhaps explain to me; and that is as to the relation between the Home Office as the Home Office and the Prison Commission. I take it that the Prison Commission deals with prisoners from the moment of their entrance into the gaol to their coming out and nothing more. Is not that so?—Yes.

11,521. And that the Home Office as distinguished from the Prison Commissioners, deals with the prisoners as to sentence, and remissions, and forgiveness, and so on?—Yes; of course, almost all the questions of remission are raised by the prisoners whilst they are in the prison.

11,522. I am a visitor of Woking Prison, and sometimes when I come across a case I want to inquire about, I go to the Prison Commissioners, and they say: "We know nothing about that; that must be a Home Office case"?—No, they do know nothing about it; but it is on the petitions sent to us.

11,523. Do you think it desirable there should be a little more co-operation between the Home Office and the Commissioners, and that the Commissioners should know what you are doing?—No.

11,524. You think it works satisfactorily?—When the petition comes from the prison, we always send back the answer of the Secretary of State to the Commissioners.

11,525. They know what you have done, do they?—Yes, they know what we have done.

11,526. (Mr. De Rutzen.) No doubt the seeds of crime are sown very early in life among boys, and, as you suggested just now, that no boy under 16 should be sent to prison (probably with that we should most of us agree) for trivial offences, perhaps such as a little petty larceny, a boy is fined, but he cannot, of course, pay it, as you say?—No.

11,527. The parents will not pay it, and the consequence is that the boy goes free?—He does sometimes.

11,528. Because it is no good to send him to gaol, as he would be discharged; he would not be of the age, and he would probably be discharged?—Not necessarily We only act under 14, but we do not always act if the boy is under 14.

11,529. Have you any suggestion to make in reference to that, as to how a boy should be dealt with, because if he cannot pay (as he clearly cannot), if his parents will not pay, and there is a disinclination (as there is) to send him to prison, it leaves him master of the situation?—Yes, it does. I suggest that you should have power to order him to be whipped; distinctly.

11,530. But there are a great many offences for which he cannot be whipped?—No, but that is the effect of that Bill which I referred to.

11,531. When prisoners are sent for trial, and the calendar is made out, it may be that the preliminary court, which sends a person for trial, has remanded a prisoner upon the supposition that he is not quite strong in his intellect, and in some cases a return is made that the person has shown no signs of insanity, but is a person of more than ordinary weak intellect. He goes for trial. There is no calendar which recites any of these facts for the knowledge of those who have to try him. Do you think that that would not be an improvement, and that any observations by the doctor of the gaol should be placed on the calendar?—I am afraid that judges would strongly resent anything of the kind unless it was done under order. They would object to anybody volunteering to make a statement with respect to a prisoner coming before them.

11,532. I only mean it is one of those things which ought to come before the judge, as to the particular state in which the prisoner's mind is?—I am not quite sure I understand the case. Who was it that directed the prisoner to be put under observation?

11,533. Most likely the magistrate who commits the prisoner for trial?—Then, would not it be right for the prison officials to communicate it to the magistrate. I suppose the magistrate could communicate it to the judge.

11,534. He has had an intimation that the person is simply of weak intellect?—Would not it be right for the magistrate to communicate that to the judge.

11,535. Yes, but it gives no kind of information to the magistrate which precludes him from sending the case for trial if otherwise it ought to go for trial. The difficulty is that it does not really reach headquarters, that is, the person who has to pass the sentence?—Do I understand the case to be this, that a man is brought up before a magistrate who thinks he ought to be carefully observed, and a report comes from the prison that the man has been observed and that he is decidedly weak minded, but the magistrate nevertheless thinks it right that the man should be committed for trial. Is your question what becomes of the report of the medical officer of the prison.

11,536. No, no, it is never put down on the calendar. The calendar is made up as to whether a man is able to read or write. The state of his education is put down in one column, but the state of the man's mind is not put down at all?—Well, I think there would be considerable difficulty in making that a compulsory entry in the calendar. At all events I would not suggest it until the mind of the judges generally had been ascertained. I do not know whether you are aware that there is a great difference of opinion as to what should be in the calendar as to previous convictions, and so on.

11,537. The question arises in this way. There has been a suggestion that a great many cases of insanity have been caused by prison treatment. My question, rather, is pointed to this, that I am taking the case of a person who began his prison career by being a man of weak intellect, who has then passed on after a sentence into prison, then may possibly become insane, having started as a man of weak intellect, no notice of which is brought to the attention of the judge, who presides at the trial of a person of that particular class?—No, that is a drawback; but judges are extremely sensitive of any communications being made to them.

11,538. I know that?—You know there is a second calendar, containing a list of previous convictions. With some judges the first thing they do is to say, "let me see that book"; that is before they try the prisoner; but other judges will not look at it, and are highly offended if it is put before them.

11,539. (Dr. Bridges.) Taking prisoners with regard to whom there has been no previous insanity or enfeebleness of mind, who are regarded as sane when they come into prison, have you at all had your attention called to the number of cases of insanity that break out among those after a month or more than a month's imprisonment?—I have not analysed the statistics myself, but I believe that the conditions of prison life which are most liable to lead to insanity consist of the first shock of imprisonment. To some persons that must be a terrible shock indeed.

11,540. You made some remark, I think, with regard to the nine months separate confinement of convicts?—Yes.

11,541. But have you formed any opinion as to that nine months being a desirable thing to continue?—I do not think that I have arrived at any definitive conclusion. I look upon those nine months as part of the punishment, and as being something which was intended to make the punishment more deterrent; but I am not aware that it is too deterrent, and I believe prison officers do not think so.

11,542. You have not formed any opinion as to whether it is likely to be injurious to the man's mind or no?—No.

11,543. With regard to the question of reporting things or making suggestions for the amelioration of prisoners, you said, I think, that even a superior prison officer such as a chaplain or a doctor would be too much influenced by his official superiors ever to make such suggestions?—Well, I do not say it is universally so. It depends very much on the superior officer, and also very much upon the subordinate officer, but that such a feeling often exists in the prison as well as in other services I cannot doubt. The stronger the superior officer is, the more he does for himself, the more he relies on himself, the less likely is he to receive information from his subordinates.

11 Feb. 1895.

11,544. Let us take the case of a prison medical officer. Might it not be regarded as incumbent upon the prison doctor that he should make general reports as to his prison and his prisoners, and be encouraged officially to do so?—Certainly I believe that is made expressly his duty by the Act: "The foregoing "resolutions do not purport to comprise the whole of "the duties of the medical officer, but if it is amongst "the matters to which they relate, it is expected that "he would at all events carry out his instructions "with goodwill to the best of his ability, and will "spare no efforts to promote the wellbeing of persons "under his charge."

11,545. I mean, supposing it was understood it was part of the medical officer's duty to report generally as to the amelioration of his prison or to the lot of his prisoners every year, how could he be regarded as showing any insubordination by so doing?—No, there would be no insubordination in his making any suggestion, but he could, of course, I do not say he would, cause some annoyance in making what was supposed to be an inopportune suggestion. Nobody can give advice except under those conditions, that the advice may be unpalatable to the person who receives it.

11,546. Could not more be done in the way of encouraging such suggestions by the Secretary of State making it understood by the Prison Commissioners that such suggestions were to be encouraged and not discouraged?—The Secretary of State would be willing to do anything which was necessary for that purpose; but I think he would be unwilling to do anything which threw the slightest doubt upon that being the rule at present.

11,547. I have been struck in reading the reports of the Commissioners for several years at the extremely scanty and jejune reports given by the officers, or, at any rate, at the extremely barren extracts from those reports which are published. I do not know whether the whole of the report is published or not, but could not more use be made of the prison officers in the way of encouraging such suggestions?—I am afraid I have not examined carefully into that. It must be plain, on the one hand, that it is not for every medical officer to be constantly reviewing the whole of the prison system. On the other hand, I certainly think it is the duty of every medical officer to refer to any special practice in his prison which he considers to be injurious, and if he has a strong opinion upon the physical result of any general feature of prison life I think he ought to state it, as, for instance, if he considered that the nine months preliminary detention of a convict was excessive and injurious, I certainly think he ought state it.

11,548. I suppose that such reports, if they are ever made, do not necessarily come before the Home Secretary?—No, they do not; in the annual reports there are extracts from the medical officers reports.

11,549. You rather rely, I gather, for such general suggestions upon the Visiting Committees?—Not, I think, on the medical points.

11,550. I thought you said on the general points?—Yes, on general prison administration; but if it were a question of whether the diet was sufficient or whether there was too little exercise I certainly think that that is a medical question, rather than one for the Visiting Committee, though it may be well to put the question also to them in case they may have any remark to make. But I think it is the medical officer who is primarily concerned in the matter, and it is certainly his duty to make any representation he thinks fit. I will give another illustration. Supposing he felt that sufficient time was not allowed to him to examine the prisoners, or that his duties were excessive, and that he was not able really to do justice to all the prisoners, it is undoubtedly the duty of the medical officer to make a representation on the point, and the Secretary of State could only rely on the Prison Commissioners bringing the matter to his attention, if it was of importance.

11,551. I have only one more question which I want to ask you. I gathered that you had formed an opinion unfavourable to reformatories. Is that because, as far as you have known them, they have not been very well administered within the last 20 years?—No, I should not like to say that; I would rather say that at it's best the life offered by a reformatory has most serious defects, however vigilant and kindly managers may be; that these defects are liable to be aggravated by special causes, as by insufficiency of funds, or by the inmates being too numerous for good management, or, in rare instances, by remissness on the part of the managers.

11,552. (Sir Algernon West.) Before you go, I do not want at all to draw you at length into the question about the outbreak at Wormwood Scrubs, but I think many of the Committee would be glad to have just one or two questions answered by you, as to whether you could tell us what was the opinion of the Secretary of State, as to whether it was a very serious outbreak or not at the time?—Well, I do not think it was a very serious outbreak, except that any prison outbreak which threatens violence is a very serious thing. It was all done and quieted before the Home Secretary heard anything of it. Then there was a slight resumption of disorder when the convicts were being removed at the railway station. I believe the immediate cause of the outbreak was this, not the bare fact of convicts being confined in the local prisons, but that some changes had been introduced into the treatment of convicts, subjecting them to penal conditions more or less corresponding to those of local prisoners. Those changes had been adopted and were in operation in the provincial prisons, but for some reason which I do not know they had not actually found their way, or were only just finding their way into the metropolitan prisons. These convicts were at Wormwood Scrubs, which was a metropolitan local prison, and they were put in cells on which were placarded the rules for the local prisons. Then the convicts said "These are not our rights, and we will have our rights," and the outbreak followed in consequence. That, I think, throws great light on convict life, and shows how very careful you have to be with convicts. It also shows, I think, that great care must have been taken in order to prevent similar outbreaks on other occasions. The Secretary of State, of course, put an end to the particular difficulty, he said that in future we must have different abstracts, and that every convict must have a convict's abstract and that every local prisoner must have a local prisoner's abstract.

11,553. Did you put any complaint before the Prisons Board then?—The Secretary of State said there had been a mistake with respect to these abstracts.

11,554. And they were told that by the Home Office?—Yes, certainly.

11,555. And that was the revision that was made, and the result and the conclusion the Secretary of State came to?—Yes, they were to have fresh abstracts made and sent up for approval. There has, I believe, been no recurrence of trouble, either at Wormwood Scrubs or elsewhere.

The witness withdrew.

Adjourned.

TWENTY-FOURTH DAY.

Home Office, Whitehall.

Thursday, 28th February 1895.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P. (CHAIRMAN);

The Right Honourable SIR ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B.;
ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Esq., M.P.; and
ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis.

JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

Mr. CHARLES EDWARD TROUP called and examined.

Mr. C. E. Troup.

28 Feb. 1895.

11,556. (Chairman.) You are senior clerk in the Home Office?—Yes; and I was in the Criminal Department for 12 years.

11,557. I think you were chairman of a Departmental Committee appointed to consider the question of the judicial statistics?—I was a member of that Committee and drafted the Committee's report, and after the Committee had made its report I undertook to edit the first volume of revised statistics.

11,558. When was that Committee appointed?—About three years ago. I have just written an introduction to the statistics for 1893, and have the proof sheets here. I will hand in certain tables (see Appendix III.)

11,559. You are acquainted with the figures given in the Prisons Commissioners' Reports upon the decrease in recent years of the prison population?—Yes.

11,560. To what extent do you think that that decrease is borne out by your examination of the general question of crime?—Of course, the decrease in the prison population is quite as great as anything that has been stated, but as an indication of actual decrease of crime it really does not prove anything.

11,561. For what reason?—Standing by itself it might arise either from a decrease of crime or from the reduction in the average sentence. Taking it by itself, one cannot tell in the least whether crime has decreased or has not decreased. If we take it in connexion with the reduction in the number of commitments, then we can say with some degree of accuracy how far it is due to the reduction of crime, and how far otherwise.

11,562. To what extent would you say that the reduction was due to the decrease in committals?—The figures which I have quoted here (Table A.) show that in 10 years from 1883 to 1893 the total prison population, that is, the daily average, had decreased by 33 per cent.; but when you look at the committals you find that the reduction of the committals is only 3·5 per cent.; that shows that the reduction in the average term of commitment must be about 29·5 per cent. Of course, one cannot take even the commitments to prison as an absolute index of the decrease of crime, but they show that a great part of the reduction in the prison population is not due to actual decrease of crime.

11,563. How do you profer to test the question?—Do you mean the question of the decrease of crime?

11,564. Yes?—I think the best figures to go by are the number of indictable offences; not the number of offences tried on indictment, because that has been very much affected by the Summary Jurisdiction Act: nor the total number of convictions on indictment and on summary process, taking the whole together, because that, of course, is very much affected by the creation of new offences, but if you take merely the indictable offences, that is, those which can be tried upon indictment, then (as during the last 20 years there has been very little alteration indeed in the definition of indictable offences) whatever increase or decrease we find in those is a very reliable index, on the whole, of the increase or decrease of crime.

11,565. Would you give the Committee anything to show the result of applying that test?—I will give the annual averages. For the five years, from 1874 to 1878, the number was 53,044. For the next five years, from 1879 to 1883, the number was 60,080. For the five years, from 1884 to 1888, it had fallen to 57,385, and for the last five years, beginning in 1889, and ending in 1893, the number had fallen to 56,472. That shows a diminution in the last three quinquennial periods, but not a great diminution.

11,566. Could you give us the proportion to 100,000 inhabitants?—Yes. For the first period it is 217 per 100,000. For the next period it rises to 230 per 100,000; then it falls to 208 per 100,000, and then to 194.

11,567. On the whole that shows a slight but practically a continuous decrease?—Yes, for the last 15 years. I produce some diagrams, which I propose to publish with the statistics for 1893, which will illustrate this (see Appendix III.). What I show by the first diagram is this: that the number of crimes against property is so large compared with other crimes, that the variation in the total of indictable offences is completely dominated by the offences against property, and in fact dominated by the offences of the larceny and embezzlement group. The two lines at the bottom show the variations of other classes of crimes. One relates to crimes against the person, and the other, to miscellaneous offences. These (if shown on the same scale as the other) have variations so slight as not to affect the total at all.

11,568. The offence of larceny really constitutes a great proportion of the whole?—About five-sixths of the whole; that is, larceny and one or two kindred offences. Finding that to be so, I went on to analyse more in detail the variations of the different classes of crime (Table B.), and without going through all this, perhaps I might just quote the summing up at the end. "Summing up these results, we arrive at the "following conclusions: that during the 20 years, "from 1874 to 1893, the number of crimes of "violence against the person have diminished in a "very marked degree; and though crimes 'against "morality' have apparently increased, the increase is "in part, at any rate, due to the creation of new "offences by legislation; all classes of crimes against "property show a diminution in the actual figures, "and a marked diminution as compared with the "population; and though in the case of larceny and "kindred offences this diminution is complicated by "changes of legal procedure, in the cases of crimes of "violence, and also in the case of offences against the "currency, where there has been no change of procedure, the diminution is very marked indeed; "and that the miscellaneous offences included in "Class VI., with the exception of attempts to commit "suicide, have shown a considerable diminution. On "the whole, therefore, there is good ground to

Mr. C. E. Troup.

28 Feb. 1895.

"think the decrease in crime, though not so great "as it has often been represented, though by no "means comparable, for instance, to the decrease "in prison population, is nevertheless real and "substantial." I may also mention an interesting remark in the introduction to the last volume of French Judicial Statistics,—that for 1891. The writer, who is a very able statistician, after remarking that in France crime of every sort prevails most in those departments which are the wealthiest, the most productive, and the most civilized, and that the same thing appears in other countries, points to England as an exception to this rule. He says: "L'Angleterre, par l'effort persévérant d'un système "pénitentiare sévère et rationellement appliqué, "est parvenue à voir décroître rapidement, dans "ces dernières années, sa criminalité jusque-là "grandissante."

11,569. With regard to previous convictions of criminals, would you state the general conclusions at which you have arrived?—Well, taking the persons convicted at assizes and quarter sessions for 1893, we find that the number with no previous convictions recorded against them was 45 per cent. Those who had one or more previous convictions were 55 per cent. Of course those figures must be taken with the qualification that probably a good many escaped identification.

11,570. Then if they are wrong it would probably be in the way of understating the number and proportion of re-convictions?—Yes, that certainly is so; in fact one is certain that as to a good many—one cannot say how many there were, but it is certain that a considerable number do escape identification.

11,571. Of the 55 per cent. that you mentioned, what are the proportions convicted on indictment and summary process?—In 2,988 cases the previous convictions had been on indictment, and in 2,347 cases on summary process only.

11,572. I think you tested the general results which you have just given by examining the figures in regard to certain counties of England?—That was the point which was taken up by a committee of which I was chairman, on the Identification of Habitual Criminals. They do not represent the same figures as those above.

11,573. But they bear on the question of identification, do they not?—Yes, the object of those figures was to throw light on the question of how many escaped identification. Of course, one would naturally suppose that in London the proportion of habitual criminals would be quite as large as, if not larger, than anywhere else; and yet we find that in London the proportion having previous convictions recorded against them is only 47 per cent. as against 70 per cent. in Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Staffordshire, and as against 79 per cent. in the boroughs of Liverpool, Birmingham, and Bradford, and 61 per cent. even in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk. That seems to show that in an enormous place like London, where a person gets lost in the population, the police are less able to trace his previous history and to record his convictions.

11,574. May we assume safely that there are a larger proportion of habitual criminals resident in London?—Well, I should think one might assume that, but we have no figures to show it.

11,575. (Mr. O'Connor.) But these figures show that the general average is low by reason of the very low average of London alone, and that elsewhere the average is very much higher, as for instance, 79 in Liverpool and Birmingham?—Yes.

11,576. So that your average is one of total cases and not of general experience in different places?—Our average of 55 per cent. is for the whole country.

11,577. It is for cases taken in the total, not the average experience of different places in the country, but it is brought down by the very low average in London alone?—It is brought down no doubt by the low average in London. That is a reason for thinking that if one could get at all the previous convictions the average would be a good deal higher. But there is one consideration to be taken on the other side, which is that those figures which I have quoted are the figures for quarter sessions and assizes. One must remember that in certain cases a prisoner, if he has previous convictions, will be sent to be tried at quarter sessions or assizes, whereas for the same crime, if he has no previous conviction, he would be disposed of by the court of summary jurisdiction: so that that tends to increase the proportion of habitual criminals at quarter sessions and assizes.

11,578. Would not that apply both in London and the provinces?—Yes, I am only mentioning it as a consideration to be taken in the opposite direction. As regards prisoners generally, the statistics for 1893 show the number of persons received in the prisons who had previous convictions was 48 per cent., that is a lower average than for quarter sessions and assizes. At assizes and quarter sessions it is 55 per cent., but of all persons received in prison, whether tried at assizes or quarter sessions or by courts of summary jurisdiction, the proportion is only 48 per cent.

11,579. (Chairman.) Now can you give us the proportion of re-committals in different classes of crime?—Of persons convicted of offences against the person, the proportion having previous convictions recorded is only 30 per cent.; of offences against property with violence, it is 66 per cent.; of offences against property without violence, 64 per cent.; of malicious injuries to property, 42 per cent.; forgery and coining, 37 per cent.; and other offences in Class VI., 25 per cent. Of particular offences, larceny from the person has the greatest per-centage, that is 79 per cent.

11,580. How do the other offences come out?—Simple larceny comes next with 78 per cent.; burglary and housebreaking and kindred offences, 66; robbery, 64; false pretences, 44; receiving stolen goods, 47. I have looked at some figures about the proportion of habitual criminals in other countries. I do not know whether that is of any interest to you.

11,581. Yes, we shall be glad to have those. Are they similarly classified?—No, I have only the totals.

11,582. Will you give the figures you have got?—In France, of persons convicted by the courts of assize the proportion of recidivists (that is, persons previously convicted) is 57 per cent. in the last tables; of those convicted by the correctional courts it is 46 per cent. In Germany the proportion of recidivists amongst all sentenced is 34 per cent., but the German figures are taken on rather a different basis, because they take in an enormous number of crimes; it is 34 per cent. on a figure of nearly half a million.

11,583. They take in civil offences?—They take in very minor offences, but not civil offences; very small offences.

11,584. Certainly offences which would be included in the English figures?—No, nor in the French figures.

11,585. What are the offences included in the French figures?—The 57 per cent. refers only to the most serious offences; those which have been tried at courts of assize. Pretty much the same offences I think as would be tried at a court of assize in England.

11,586. Then I understand that there is a closer analogy between the figures you have given us for France than there is to those you have given us for Germany?—Yes, much closer. In England the per-centage of 55 refers to a total of 9,600 cases, in France the per-centage of 57 to a total of about 3,000.

11,587. You think, on the whole, you can make a fair comparison between those French figures and the English returns?—I think so. In Italy, the proportion is only 36 per cent. of those tried at assizes, but I should think the means of identification they have are not so good; besides, in Italy a great proportion of the cases tried at the assizes are for offences against the person. The number of murders there is very enormous. In Switzerland the proportion among prisoners is 52 per cent.

11,588. I think the French criminal statistics show that there is considerable difference as against the English figures in respect to the ages at which the bulk of the prisoners are committed?—Yes; shall I give you the English figures first?

11,589. Yes, if you please?—The proportion per 100,000 of the population of the same age, is as follows: Under 12 the proportion is 24; from 12 to 16 the proportion is 261; from 16 to 21 the proportion is 321; from 21 to 30 the proportion is 24., from 30 to 40 it is 204; from 40 to 50 it is 143; from 50 to 60 it is 92; and above 60 the proportion is 56, so that judging by the number convicted of indictable offences, the age of 16 to 21 is the most criminal age in England, after that it diminishes very rapidly (Table F.). In France I have not got the proportion per hundred thousand of population because I have not got the figures for the French population, but the actual figures (Table G.)* of persons tried by the Courts of assize are, under 12 years of age, 35; from 12 to 16 years of age, 597; from 16 to 21 it is 577; from 21 to 30 it is 749; from 30 to 40 it is 1,076; from 40 to 50 it is 661; from 50 to 60 it is 336; and above 60 years of age the figures are 176; so that there the most criminal age appears to be between 30 and 40, judged by those figures. I am not at all attempting to compare the number of crimes in the two countries, but only the proportions at different ages.*

11,590. Now with regard to the younger offenders in England; the large proportion may be due, I suppose, at any rate to a certain extent, to the short sentences which they get?—It might be to a certain extent, but then one must remember that a great many young offenders are sent to industrial schools or reformatory schools; in fact, the proportion of young offenders sent to industrial schools or reformatory schools is larger than the proportion of old offenders sent to penal servitude.

11,591. What is the actual proportion of criminals under 21?—Of all persons convicted the proportion is 41 per cent., and of persons in prison on the 31st March 1894, only 17 per cent. were under 21 years of age, showing, of course, that the sentences on those sent to prison are very much shorter. I must mention that on looking at the German tables, I find that the proportions in the different ages are very much nearer the English than the French. The most criminal age there is between 18 and 21 or between 21 and 25.

11,592. Have you come to any conclusion upon the question as to whether recidivism is increasing?—I have not been able to find any evidence that it is increasing. I have got the figures which Sir Edmund Du Cane gave you. These are, of course, calculated figures, which he had great difficulty in getting out, but in the new statistics we have got the actual figures for 1893 as regards the number of convictions, and I find that the proportion is rather smaller than what he gives here. Where he gives 29·6 per cent. of second to first convictions, the actual figures for 1893 are 28 per cent.

11,593. But that return seems to show that the proportion as between the last three decades has been increasing?—The proportion of second convictions has increased very little.

11,594. But taking the committals, say for the sixth time, I see that in 1872 there was 71·2; in 1883 there was 70·3; in 1893 there was 79·2. Then, taking the last column, the percentage of the number committed for more than the third time, and the number committed for the third time, in 1872, there is the percentage of 277·6; in 1883 there is 311·5; and in 1893 there is 417·1: do not those figures seem to show that there is a considerable increase?—An increase in those having a large number of previous convictions, but a comparatively small increase in those who are convicted for the second time.

11,595. That is to say, there has been a small drop of 2 per cent. since 1883?—Yes.

11,596. But an increase of 2 per cent. since 1872? Yes, that is so; I am inclined to think that the very great increase in the number of those having a large number of previous convictions must be due, partly at any rate, to the better identification. There is no doubt the police have been paying more attention in tracing habitual criminals in the last few years, and have been using photography a great deal more for that purpose.

11,597. Then I see the percentage of the number committed for the third time compared with the number committed for the second time has risen from 46 in 1883 to 48 in 1893?—Yes.

11,598. I rather gather that you are not prepared to give a very definite opinion on this point?—No. They are the best statistics I should think that could be obtained from the data available, but of course one of the chief objects of our revising the statistics was to get better data. We cannot carry our improved statistics back into the previous years.

11,599. No doubt in future years you will be able to get at the proportions more accurately?—Yes.

11,600. But from the figures that we have got at the present time, it would appear that there is a certain increase in what is known as recidivism in connexion with the larger number of committals?—Yes, the figures do show that.

11,601. That is to say, in respect of the prisoners who are committed for a larger number of times?—Of course that is the experience in all other countries. In France the number of recidivists is increasing. There are very accurate figures, which show it has been increasing enormously.

11,602. Will you give the Committee the figures with regard to the average length of sentences passed on prisoners convicted the first time, the second time, and so on?—Those figures I have only worked out for one or two districts; we tried it experimentally first for the West Riding of Yorkshire, and taking all the cases of larceny in 1893 where there was five or more previous convictions of a like offence, we worked out the average of the sentences passed on each conviction, and the figures we got (Table C (1)) showed that on first conviction the average sentence was 2 months, 15 days; that on second conviction the average was 5 months, 11 days; on third conviction the average was 7 months, 9 days; on the fourth conviction the average was 1 year, 9 months, 11 days; and on the fifth conviction the average fell to 1 year, 7 months, 3 days. Then taking the sixth to tenth conviction, the sentences give an average of 1 year, 11 days; and on convictions after the tenth the average was only 3 months, 28 days: but there were only 17 cases of sentences beyond the tenth conviction, so that really one did not get a sufficient number to give a reliable average.

11,603. Will you also give us the penal servitude figures?—Yes; the number of penal servitude sentences passed were on first conviction none; on second conviction, 1; on third conviction, 4; on the fourth conviction, 18; on the fifth conviction, 21; and on the sixth to the tenth conviction, 12; and after the tenth conviction, none.

11,604. You have made similar inquiry with regard to Lancashire?—Yes, excluding the Liverpool City Sessions. Again, we took all the cases where there were five previous convictions and upwards, and we got (Table C. (2))—on first convictions 2 months, 8 days; on second convictions we got 5 months, 27 days; on third convictions, 11 months, 6 days; on fourth convictions, 1 year, 2 months; on fifth convictions, 1 year, 7 months, 24 days; on the 6th to the tenth convictions the average was 1 year, 7 months, 7 days; and after the tenth conviction it was 1 year, 4 months, 24 days.

11,605. I observe there is a very close similarity up to the last item between the Yorkshire and Lancashire cases, but how do you account for that extraordinary difference in respect of those from the 11th to the 20th convictions?—I think it is really accidental. In Yorkshire there is so small a number of cases with more than ten convictions that we do not get a fair average. There were five cases of penal servitude included in those 32 sentences in Lancashire, whereas there were none among the 17 in Yorkshire.

* Mr. Troup reports that there was an error in some of the figures quoted by him at the end of his answer to question 11,589. The correct figures are:—under 16 years, 35; from 16 to 21, 597; from 21 to 30, 1,326.

Mr. C. E. Troup.

28 Feb. 1895.

11,606. Then will you give us the sentences of penal servitude in connexion with that?—On first conviction there were none; on second conviction there were three; on the third, 12; on the fourth, 17; on the fifth, 27; and on convictions from the sixth to the tenth, there were 42; and after the tenth conviction, there were 5.

11,607. The figures generally show that there is a certain increase of punishment, according to the number of committals?—Yes, but that after the fourth or fifth conviction the sentences fall away—the reason being, I think, that the class of criminals who are convicted of more serious larceny, get sent away to penal servitude by that time, and reduce the number of serious cases. There remain a larger proportion of people convicted of small offences.

11,608. Will you give the Committee the figures, showing the proportion of women among criminals at different periods of life?—Under 12 years the proportion of women to men is 7·32 per cent.; from 12 to 16 it is 12·18 per cent.; from 16 to 21 it is 14·48 per cent.; from 21 to 30 it is 17·93 per cent.; from 30 to 40 it is 21·74; from 40 to 50 it is 26·42; from 50 to 60 it is 26·66 per cent.; and above 60 it is 20·03 per cent. Of course, these figures, which relate to the proportion of men to women, do not imply that the number of women prisoners is actually increasing. It is only the proportion of women to men that increases.

11,609. They become criminals at a later period of life?—Or, at any rate, that so many do not cease to be criminals. Probably some become criminals at a later period of life; but that is not clear from the figures.

11,610. That column, I think, applies to women convicted of indictable offences?—Yes, of indictable offences.

11,611. (Mr. O'Connor.) I should like to ask you, whether you have any theory with regard to the relation of reconvictions to the length of sentence. You will observe that in Class 1 (offences against the person), the proportion is 30 per cent., and in Class 2 (crimes against property, with violence), it is 66 per cent., which is more than double the first class. In Class 3 (offences against property, without violence), the proportion is 64 per cent., which is very much the same as Class 2, which is also offences against property. Have you any theory with regard to the length of sentences?—Do you mean the length of sentences as producing those averages?

11,612. Yes?—I should not think they are connected with the length of sentences.

11,613. The reason I ask you is this, that you have been comparing figures taken from Germany and France, with the figures arising on the judicial statistics of this country?—Yes.

11,614. But one of the features of the administration of this country is the very sacred kind of character which attaches to property and the severity of the punishments inflicted for offences against property as compared with the trivial punishments given for serious offences against the person which in other countries, such as France, are regarded as more serious than offences against property?—I do not think that is the reason for it. I think the difference arises simply from the fact that offences against property are those by which a person can gain his living, and there is, therefore, a temptation to go on committing them: whereas in the case of offences against the person they are generally committed in hot blood, and are not at any rate the sort of thing one would ever get his living by. In the German statistics one finds, though the proportions generally are not so large, the proportion of reconvictions in the case of offences against property is very much larger than in the case of offences against the person.

11,615. That brings me to another point, are you satisfied that your classification of offences for the purpose of comparison with foreign figures is the same as the classification adopted abroad in respect of crime?—The classification of offences?

11,616. Yes, are you sure that you are comparing like with like?—Would you refer me to the particular comparisons you mean?

11,617. In this country you have for those statistics a certain system of classification of offences?—Yes.

11,618. Are you satisfied that that classification is the same as those adopted for the statistics of France?—They are not the same as regards particular offences. As regards the distinction between crimes against property and crimes against the person, the line of distinction is substantially the same.

11,619. Take another cross division of indictable offences, the offences dealt with summarily; are you sure that the same division exists in France?—I am sure that it does not, but I have as far as possible avoided making anything in the way of comparison depend upon it.

11,620. Of course, the value of these comparisons must depend really on whether you are comparing like with like?—Yes, within certain limits. Will you put the question with regard to particular comparisons that I have made? If so, then I may be able to say how far they are affected by differences of that sort.

11,621. It is because I myself do not know the details of the classification of the foreign figures that I am unable to do that, but I had a doubt as to whether the classification was precisely the same?—It cannot possibly be precisely the same, but I do not think the difference would anywhere vitiate the comparisons that I have made.

11,622. Turning to page 96, we find a table (F.) showing the total number of persons convicted of indictable offences for all ages?—Yes.

11,623. And at the bottom of it a list of persons (Table G.) accused in France of serious crime for all ages?—Yes.

11,624. I take it that by "serious crime" you mean what we should understand here as indictable offences?—Yes, but there, of course, there is a considerable difference.

11,625. As long as it is approximately the same term I am satisfied?—It must be taken with this qualification, that the English figures do include a much larger number of crimes against property than the French do.

11,626. But at any rate you class all indictable offences together for England?—Yes.

11,627. And you class all serious crimes together for France. Of those offences tried at assizes in France, whatever the classification may be, making the best effort you can, you give us the figures for France and the figures for England for the more serious crimes?—Yes.

11,628. What strikes me is this, that under 12 years there are 2,000 in this country, against only 35 in France?—The figures must be taken with the qualification that the English ones include a much larger number of crimes against property, and therefore many smaller crimes.

11,629. Under which point there are only 35 in France where there are 2,000 in England; that is a startling disparity?—But the figures themselves are very unequal with regard to the total numbers.

11,630. From 12 to 16 there are nearly 7,000 in England and less than 600 in France?—Yes.

11,631. Then the numbers go to nearly 10,000 in England from 16 to 21, and there are not 1,000 in France?—Yes, that is so.

11,632. From 21 to 30 there are over 10,000 in England and not 1,000 in France?—Yes.

11,633. Now at the first blush, inasmuch as there does not appear to be one-tenth of the number of crimes recorded against France that stand to the account of England, it appears to me that we must somehow have got hold of what does not admit of comparison between one country and the other. It is incredible that there can be 10 times as many crimes in this country as in France?—I have said already that I am not attempting to compare the total numbers; but only the proportions of the different ages. I can give you the figures for assizes and quarter sessions in England from those tables, which would probably come much nearer it; though they are still considerably higher. Taking the figures of persons tried only at assizes and quarter sessions, of children under 12, there are only 11 in England; of course, the reason being that most of that age are disposed of summarily. Between 12 and 16 the number is 236, between 16 and 21 the number is 1,887, between 21 and 30 it is 3,087, and between 30 and 40 the number is 2,237.*

Mr. C. E. Troup.

28 Feb. 1895.

11,634. But those are included in the figures shown on page 96?—Yes.

11,635. Then that does not affect my point. Whatever the object with which these figures are put there, if the figures really represent, as they purport to do, the number of persons convicted of indictable offences in England, and with regard to France not the number convicted but only the number of persons accused of serious crime (and there are not one-tenth of the number of persons accused of serious crime in France as there are convicted of indictable offences in England), there must somewhere be a misapprehension?—No, I do not pretend that those are the same crimes in the two cases. I have never suggested that they are. I have told you all along that in this list for England we take a much wider class of crime than in the French statistics.

11,636. I quite understand your point. In these two tables you are endeavouring to distribute as between different age periods the offenders in the two countries?—Yes.

11,637. Let us go to the next point with regard to the numbers shown in the returns of reconvictions. I suppose any improved system of identification would naturally manifest itself most clearly in the higher classes of reconvictions, that is to say, supposing you improve you system of identification, the persons among whom the improved system operated earliest would be those who had been repeatedly reconvicted. They would come at once under the improved system?—Yes, I think so.

11,638. And therefore you would expect that after the fourth or fifth reconviction you would have a manifest improvement earlier than in the stage of the second or third convictions?—You mean you would identify more?

11,639. Yes?—Yes, I should think so.

11,640. Because they would be easier cases for identification under an improved system. Therefore, my point is this, the figures that have been read out may point rather to an improved system of identification than to any actual increase of what is called recidivism itself?—You mean Sir Edmund Du Cane's figures?

11,641. Yes?—Yes, I should think that is very possible.

11,642. And it is necessary to take those figures with that qualification?—Yes, I think so.

11,643. (Chairman.) On that point I can understand that when photography came in there was a very marked increase in the facility of identification. That would tell between 1873 and 1883, but as between 1883 and 1893, has there been any further distinct advance in the method of identification?—Well, I think the police have been using it more; at Scotland Yard, for instance, they have established a sort of separate department for identifying habitual criminals.

11,644. Within the last 10 years?—Within the last 10 years they have done a great deal in that way, and the same in Birmingham.

11,645. (Mr. O'Connor.) Then again, with regard to the figures on page 93 (Table C.), with regard to the re-convictions. I think you have already told us that they include a very large proportion of comparatively venial offences?—Well, they include all cases of larceny, great or small.

11,646. And they include also the most heinous offences?—Well, the worst cases of larceny. Larceny can never come into the very highest grade of offences.

11,647. You say the number of sentences of penal servitude passed were as follows. Then you give certain figures?—Yes.

11,648. "A similar investigation has been made "with regard to the County of Lancashire, excluding "Liverpool City Sessions; the result is to show a "somewhat similar graduation in the average term "awarded." It shows nothing about larceny?—I have said a "similar investigation" to that above, and there I say the examination was confined in the first instance to cases of prisoners convicted during 1893 of larceny in the West Riding of Yorkshire, who had at least five previous convictions of a like offence.

11,649. That is on page 92. I am dealing with page 93?—That is a similar investigation.

11,650. In the next sentence do you refer to larceny actually?—It all refers to larceny. I start by saying we investigated questions of larceny, and then when I come to Lancashire I say that a similar investigation has been made. I might repeat the word "larceny" to make it clearer.

The witness withdrew.

Colonel GARSIA recalled and further examined.

Col. Garsia.

11,651. (Chairman.) Colonel Garsia, there are a number of points which have arisen in the course of the inquiry which I just want to have some information upon. You remember the letter written to the Strangeways Visiting Committee by the Home Secretary in 1879?—Yes, I have it here.

11,652. Did that letter produce any effect?—Not immediately, but since then the Visiting Committee of that prison and the Prison Commissioners have gradually got on very good terms, and the thing works harmoniously now.

11,653. I think that letter was circulated to other visiting committees, was it not?—It was.

11,654. In order to stimulate them?—It was the purport of the letter that was circulated, not the letter.

11,655. Yes, the purport of the letter was circulated to all visiting committees, was it not?—I believe so.

11,656. Had it any general effect in the country?—I should say generally that it had, and that taking it all round the visiting committees have pulled very well with the Prisons Commissioners since then. The relations have been satisfactory, but here and there we have had cases where it has not been so, notably Birmingham; still, generally speaking, I should say that the relations have improved.

11,657. I was not thinking so much of the personal relations between the visiting committees and the Commissioners (which I have no reason to think are not satisfactory), but rather as to whether the visiting committees or the individual justices come forward readily to undertake the duties imposed upon them by the Act of 1877?—I could not speak positively as to that.

11,658. So far as any increased zeal is concerned you are not aware that that letter produced any particular effect?—No, not in that direction.

11,659. With regard to the prison staff employed in the small prisons, should you say that as a rule where the population is very small the prison staff is in excess of the work to be done?—I should not say so as regards the male part of the prison, but as regards the female prison in many cases at times, of course it is in excess, because there is little for them to do. There are no prisoners sometimes.

* Table H. handed in subsequently.

Col. Garsia.
28 Feb. 1895.

11,660. I think there was a case mentioned to us of the Dorchester prison, and that the number of women there is about six. What female staff would there be there?—Speaking just from memory without being able to refer to it, I should say two or three female officers at the outside permanently. Two, I should say.

11,661. With an average of six prisoners?—Yes, with an average of six prisoners.

11,662. That surely is quite unnecessary, is it not?—How could you possibly carry on the prison without a relief unless you had a second officer, because the poor unfortunate officer who was there would never get away. You have to consider that the officer has to be relieved.

11,663. Then supposing that there was an average of three, and that there was any chance at all of one female prisoner being received, you would have to have two female officers to look after them?—There was an exception to that at a prison at Ruthin in Wales. There they had ordinarily one officer, because it was very seldom that they had a prisoner. It is changing now. The reason was that the old governor there, Mr. Walmsley, had a daughter who used to receive some little salary in order to be available to relieve this officer. It was a local arrangement, and but for that we should have had to have two officers; you could not do with less.

11,664. According to the returns that we had, there were three prisoners at Oxford, and there are two warders?—Yes, there might be only one prisoner and two warders; that is the permanent staff of the prison.

11,665. Would not it be possible to draft them off in some way?—That has been tried by the Commissioners, and they have done it to a certain extent, so as to have certain prisons where female prisoners could be drafted. That is one of the objections that the magistrates made. I recall at this moment a prison in Wales where great trouble has been caused by closing the female wing of the prison, because sometimes there is no prisoner there at all. There was local opposition to that. They thought it a great injustice that their local prison should not have a female wing, and that their female prisoners should be sent to a distance where they could not be visited by their friends.

11,666. With regard to sentences inflicted by the visiting committees to punishment cells. Supposing a case of a woman being sentenced to 14 days. Now the governor has no power to remit that sentence supposing he or the matron has reason to think that she is no longer contumacious and perfectly willing to be amenable to discipline?—None whatever. He has the power of representing that fact to the visiting committee, and recommending that they should do it. He is in constant touch with the chairman of the committee.

11,667. Would the chairman have, ex officio, power on behalf of his colleagues to relieve it?—I am quite convinced that he does possess that power and that he would exercise it.

11,668. But he may be away?—I think there is always an arrangement for that. That is my experience.

11,669. But you would agree that, supposing a young prisoner, male or female, after two or three days, or, say, after one day, was brought to a state of repentance, it is most desirable that that punishment should be stopped?—I quite agree to that. I think it is very desirable.

11,670. Do you think an arrangement might be made that the governors should have discretionary power to remove those prisoners from the punishment cell at once, and inform the chairman of the visiting justices what had been done, and wait for his approval and confirmation?—I do not think the governor should have discretionary power to do it without the authority of the visiting committee, because I think it would be a very bad thing to vest in the governor the power of overturning the award of a superior authority; but I think it is the bounden duty of the governor to write at once any change in the behaviour of the prisoner, and to make a very strong recommendation to the visiting committee, and if the visiting committee, by their chairman, like to act, or they like to act themselves in case of his absence, that is another matter; but where he can be got at, I think it should rest with him and the committee who ordered the punishment.

11,671. But if you gave the governor a discretionary power to provisionally remove a prisoner from a punishment cell subject to the confirmation of the visiting justices, then you are giving him a power to overturn their decision?—I think it virtually is so. I cannot see the distinction.

11,672. Can you tell the Committee how often the prisoners are kept to No. 1 hard labour longer than a month?—I can tell you generally that no prisoner is kept to No. 1 hard labour beyond the statutory period allowed provided he earns the marks. It is done by a system of marks, and not by time. Provided he earns the marks, namely, eight a day, for the period, he is relieved from it; but if he fails to earn those marks, he is kept at No. 1 hard labour, if the doctor certifies he is fit for it, until he has earned them. That is one case. The other case is, if a prisoner misconducts himself, and the governor, under the power vested in him under the stage system, sentenced him to be put down in the lower stage—the first stage—he is kept there until he has earned the number of marks which he may have been ordered to earn in that stage. Those are the only cases in which a prisoner is kept beyond the time.

11,673. How often does it happen that a prisoner is sent back from loss of marks to first-class hard labour; does it often happen?—For misconduct?

11,674. Yes, for misconduct or want of marks?—I should say that the per-centage of it is very small.

11,675. Have you ever known cases of a prisoner being kept to hard labour for two consecutive months?—Never to my knowledge. I think if you were to look at the punishment books you would find that there is a column there marked "The stage." You will often see that a governor sentences a prisoner to some punishment, such as dietary punishment, without touching his stage at all, and in that case a man would not go back to hard labour. It is only where he actually sentences him to loss of stage or detention in the stage that it would affect it, and that would be by loss of marks.

11,676. With regard to the question as to whether convicts or men sentenced to hard labour should be allowed to work at their own trade, what view do you take about that?—Well, I take very strong views on the question of industrial employment, as I told the Committee when I had the honour of appearing before you last. I think we are bound to obey the Act now, but I think that the Act (particularly if a prisoner is sentenced to over a month) might well be altered or amended so that prisoners should be employed at industrial employment from the day they come into the prison. I am very strong upon that point. I think that prisoners in prison should be taught to be industrious, which is the first principle of imprisonment. I have always held those views strongly, and I cannot too strongly urge them here.

11,677. Do I gather from that that you would allow a carpenter, a joiner, or a fitter, as the case may be, to work at once at his own trade as a form of hard labour?—I would—at task work. I would exact from him such an amount of work that it would not be light work at all, and I would see that he should fulfil such a task as would come under the head of "hard labour." I think it would be a greater advantage to the man, a greater advantage to the State, and that it would also be reformative.

11,678. Have you heard of cases of complaint by other prisoners on the ground of inequality as between a man who is set to work at his own trade and another prisoner who is not?—I have incidentally heard so as an incidence of imprisonment.

11,679. And you have stated your view upon it?—That is my view.

11,680. Now, on any occasion, are any educational classes held in prison other than for juvenile prisoners?—No; except for juveniles it is all cellular. It is so to the best of my belief. There is no authority for it to be otherwise.

11,681. To what extent are the rules regarding visits and communications relaxed by visiting justices?—The visiting justices have no power under the statute to relax any regulation as regards letters, but they have power to extend the duration of a visit. The Prison Commissioners have recently issued a standing order, No. 228, giving governors increased powers of giving extra letters and visits.

11,682. Governors?—Yes.

11,683. What is the date of that standing order?—It is dated the 8th February 1895.

11,684. Will you hand that in?—Yes. (The document was handed in. See Appendix.)

11,685. Is it in the power of a man in a local prison who is not able-bodied to earn as many marks as might be earned by an able-bodied man?—Yes.

11,686. As a matter of fact, do those men who are not able-bodied earn as many?—Yes, when it comes to my knowledge I generally point it out to the governor. I make it my business as inspector to look particularly to this, that if a prisoner is not able-bodied, and does what the medical officer says his strength enables him to do, or should enable him to do, he should receive the same number of marks as an able-bodied prisoner doing the full task.

11,687. Has any order or circular been issued on that point?—Not in those exact words, but enough to make governors understand that that is the intention.

11,688. Do you feel satisfied that as a matter of fact the spirit of the thing is carried out?—It is thoroughly understood in the prisons.

11,689. Then this man who is not able-bodied does not earn his 10*s.*?—Yes, if he gets the marks he does. The marks decide the gratuity, and he gets the same gratuity as the man who earns the full marks.

11,690. A man who is in the infirmary would not earn the 10*s.*?—No.

11,691. Is not that a hardship?—Well, I have always thought that it is a hardship, but there are a great many considerations about that. You have such a lot of malingering in prison. You have got to think about that. I think that perhaps it is about the fairest thing in the present system where the governor brings the case before the commissioners and says, "So-and-so is an invalid," and when it is his time to go out, he writes and says, "This man has not "earned the marks owing to being an invalid"; in which case I recommend him for a gratuity, and the Commissioners say, "Give him the 10*s.*" I think it is better to have a rule to hinder and put a check upon malingering, but that very liberal consideration should be given to the cases on medical recommendation.

11,692. (Mr. O'Connor.) Why cannot they have the same rule in the prisons that they have in the army in that respect, that a man's pay is stopped if he goes to hospital for his own misconduct only?—Do you mean where the doctor has to decide it? Of course in the army we know what the misconduct would be that would lead to this.

11,693. But if he is incapacitated by his own fault he must pay for it?—Of course the difficulty is to get the doctor to certify.

11,694. (Chairman.) With regard to Question No. 2560, Captain Schuyler refers to a form called "L. P. C. 3 form"; could you tell me what the system is?—This is a form which I will hand in. (Document handed in. See Appendix V.) It is a form of notification to prisoner's friends from a prison of his being received at a prison. I may say that Captain Schuyler there speaks only from his knowledge of one prison; but I tell you (as having been connected with Wormwood Scrubs Prison) that it was always allowed, not by me alone, but by the governor of the prison, and that what Captain Schuyler says was allowed at Wandsworth was always allowed both at Milbank and Wormwood Scrubs; but he implies that it was not done at Wormwood Scrubs. I will go so far as to say that it is allowed at almost every prison throughout the country, and that even a governor who has only a particle of the milk of human kindness, when the prisoner sends the form to his friends, if he wishes to add to it, always allows it to be done. I really do not think the governors are so hard-hearted as to stick to the letter of the law, and compel prisoners to fill in the form without a word.

11,695. You think it is generally done?—I feel perfectly convinced that it is.

11,696. With regard to Question 2569, Captain Schuyler uses the expression, "If any prisoner knows "the ropes, the regulations with regard to visits work "satisfactorily." Do you think from your own experience a prisoner does know the ropes?—I think that a prisoner who comes often does know the ropes. Though a man who comes in for the first time has the rules read and explained to him, and although he has a copy of the stage in his cell, yet we know that from the official wording of them the man may not be so well up to them, and probably during his first imprisonment does not so thoroughly understand what he can do; but I think the ordinary prisoner who has been once or twice to prison does pretty well know what he is about, and that he does arrange it.

11,697. Still it is more desirable that the man who comes for the first time to prison should know it?—My own practice, when I was connected with prisons, was this. Every morning, the first duty I performed was to have every prisoner received on the previous day paraded before me. I had each man individually brought into my office. I saw that he was clothed properly, I checked his property which he had recorded against him; I checked the amount of his sentence and commitment, and asked him whether he had any complaints or wishes, and whether he wished to write to his friends, speaking to him generally about the advantages of good conduct, and what he could gain as far as regards letters and visits by it. I did that with regard to every prisoner that was admitted to the prison during the time I was at Wormwood Scrubs, and I believe most of the governors do it.

11,698. Now, with regard to Question 2576, is the Prisoners' Aid Society at Wandsworth identical with the Visiting Committee?—The Visiting Committee at Wandsworth Prison are ex officio members of the "Surrey Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society." It is the same.

11,699. Because Captain Schuyler, I see, says that the governor brought a certain circular with regard to the Prisoners' Aid Society, to the "Surrey Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society," and they entirely disapproved of it being placed in the prison, and accordingly it was not placed in the prison. That disapproval would be qua Visiting Justices, and not qua Prisoners' Aid Society, I take it?—I think they objected to it as a Prisoners' Aid Society.

11,700. But they had no power to object to it?—They only did it by way of representation, that is all. Allow me to read this. I have got what we had from Wandsworth on the subject. The circular we sent out was this. This is the answer to it, objecting. Then the Prison Commissioners said, "Very good, do not exhibit them."

11,701. Have you got Question 5259 before you?—Yes.

11,702. Are those figures accurate?—There were 6,515 females received, of whom only 1,043 had not been previously convicted.

11,703. With regard to gratuities to prisoners' aid societies and homes, would you state to the Committee under what principle the 1,500*l.* given by the Government is dispensed?—I will hand in to the Committee this document, showing the whole system of the gratuities to prisoners from charities, and I will just state briefly that in 1888 the Treasury reduced the amount allowed to 1,500*l.*

Col. Garsia.

28 Feb. 1895.

11,704. Why was that?—It does not say why they did it. In order to bring the amount which was expended within this limit, the following course was adopted. As soon as a new scheme was framed by the Charity Commissioners making the income of the charity available for that purpose this was done. I will hand this in to the Committee. (The document was handed in. See Appendix V.).

11,705. You do not know why that reduction was made by the Treasury, you do not know accurately the reason?—The only reason I could see was that so many of these charitable societies had funds, and that the Treasury took advantage of that to decrease the allowance from Imperial funds, and left it to be done by these societies.

11,706. Then there is a certain amount of distribution of the money to the homes which receive discharged prisoners?—The refuges only.

11,707. They come in for a share of the grant?—There are three refuges, and they are treated exactly like the aid societies.

11,708. What refuges are so treated?—There are three of them. I will send you up their names. They are treated exactly as the aid societies, except (and why the distinction is made I do not know) that one refuge gets 2*l.* for each prisoner that goes to it, and the "Elizabeth Fry Refuge" gets 1*l.* for each prisoner that goes to it, and the third refuge gets only 10*s.* for each prisoner that goes to it.

11,709. (Mr. O'Connor.) Which is the third?—I do not know which that is, but there are three refuges and I will get you the names.

11,710. (Chairman.) Do you think it would be desirable to increase the Government grant on a somewhat new and more equitable method of distribution, according to the work done by different societies?—Yes, I think so. I think the aid societies' work after the reformation of prisoners in prison is the most important work connected with the criminal system. I think they can do more by taking a prisoner in hand than any one. We can teach him to be industrious and orderly, but when he passes outside the prison gates, unless there is somebody to take him by the hand, and keep him from relapsing into crime, the man has not a chance.

11,711. You alluded to a committee of which Lord Rosebery was chairman, in reply to Question 6474. What was that committee?—It was a committee on "Grievances of Convict Prison Officers as regards "their hours of duty and superannuation," &c.

11,712. What year was that?—1883.

11,713. I see that that committee is not mentioned in the list of previous inquiries which you gave?—I will hand in a copy of the report; it was a confidential report on the "Grievances of Prison Officers." It has never been given to Parliament. Both these committees of Lord De Ramsey's and of Lord Rosebery's were held to be confidential reports—not that there is anything confidential in them.

11,714. You were asked a question with regard to a prisoner becoming a number in the prison, and you told the Committee that you always addressed a prisoner by his name?—Yes.

11,715. That would be as governor?—As governor.

11,716. Would the warders call him by his name?—There is no rule about it. For the purpose of convenience every prisoner is registered as a number, and that number is fixed to him; if they are calling him out of the cell they would say "24," "25," or "26" for convenience; but, as a matter of fact, in practice the warders know the names of the prisoners. Their names are on the cards, and when a man comes before the governor as an applicant or on report he gives his name and register. He says, "B. 401, John Smith," and the governor speaks to him by his name.

11,717. When the warders have to call out for an individual prisoner who is among a great many others, what would they call him?—They would call him by his number.

11,718. And that would be in the prisoner's interest, I take it?—Yes.

11,719. Because it would not necessarily reveal his identity?—Yes. With reference to that I have also a feeling from my prison experience. Since I have been at the Home Office I have revised a great many forms in use in the prisons, and among others the card which is put up on the prisoner's cell, and so strongly did I feel that in the prisoner's interest his identity should be kept from others, that whilst the old card used to have the prisoner's name, and all the particulars of his crime, and where he came from, and everything of that kind, face outside, I revised the card, and the Commissioners adopted it, so that now the particulars which the visiting committee insist on having are put on the other side of the card, only showing the registered number in front of it. I only mention that to show that one has had the matter under consideration.

11,720. (Mr. O'Connor.) I have observed that in some prisons, but it is not universally so?—It was universal. We issued it a year ago, but some of the visiting committees (I recollect, at the moment, Portsmouth, Birmingham, and one or two others) wrote, saying they disliked it very strongly. Of course, there is a certain amount of conservatism about things, and they liked the old card, though in my opinion it was undesirable to have this information exhibited, because, do what you will, a cleaner who comes out goes and stands at his door and reads all about the man, but he would not turn the card over, because that would be an offence; whilst if anyone wanted to know all about the prisoner he could pull it down and look at the back of it. Still, they objected to it, and in some half-dozen cases the Commissioners endeavoured to meet them, and said they had no objection to the cards containing the information which they required.

11,721. (Chairman.) You mentioned the fact that Newcastle Prison was in a very unsatisfactory state. Is it likely to be condemned?—Yes, the Newcastle Prison is condemned. The Commissioners have recommended that a new prison be built. The Secretary of State has adopted the recommendation; and in the Estimates for the coming year a sum of money has been taken up to make a start for procuring land for building.

11,722. Where is the land going to be purchased?—I do not know. They are now looking about for it, but in the estimates for 1895–96 a sum of money has been taken up for it.

11,723. (Mr. O'Connor.) Whose business is it to look after that site. Is it the business of the Treasury, or is it your business?—We do it. The Prison Commissioners have statutory powers. They acquire land and own it.

11,724. (Chairman.) Is it proposed to acquire a site within the city?—No; we always get out of a town if we possibly can; and I should think that to buy land in a city like Newcastle would be ruinous.

11,725. Is it there now?—Yes, it is in the lowest part of the town; and I suppose it would not fetch what we should have to pay for a new one.

11,726. (Mr. O'Connor.) Would the money go to the county?—No. We are going to replace the prison, and therefore it goes to the Treasury. It is only where we close it that it goes to the county unless we provide accommodation elsewhere.

11,727. (Chairman.) With regard to the point raised by Captain Johnson at Question 8770, what is your view of that?—Well, the practice, I may tell you, at all prisons is, that if a visiting order has been sent out to the friends of the prisoner, and before the friends come the prisoner misconducts himself, the visit is allowed if his friends come. That is, I may say, no order of the Directors or the Commissioners, but it is the practice. But if a prisoner has not sent out his order, or has not applied for it, and he is due for a visit and has earned a visit, then if he miscon-ducts himself, and behaves badly after he has got his class or his stage, he would have to go to the governor and apply for leave to see his friends. The governor would, of course, say, "For the present, until you "regain your class or your stage, you cannot have it, "because you are under punishment." As I take Captain Johnson's suggestion, it is that that should not be so, but that the prisoner, having earned it, whether he be under punishment or not, should have that visit. I cannot say I go with him. I do not think it would be a good thing, because you might have (I do not say you would always have) a prisoner reserving his visit and defying the authorites in that way.

11,728. If the relatives came some distance that would be taken into consideration, I suppose?—It is always allowed; I have never known it refused.

11,729. (Mr. O'Connor.) Even if a man was under punishment?—I have known a man under dietary punishment in a convict prison when his friends have arrived even without an order, but it has been said, "The friends have come; they knew he was due for a "visit, and they must not suffer."

11,730. (Chairman.) With regard to the point raised by Colonel Plummer at Question 9013?—About the special class, I have carefully read Colonel Plummer's answer, and all I can say about it is that I do not agree with him. "Exemplary conduct" in the standing order does not mean entire freedom from report. There was a circular issued some years ago on that. The governor has a great latitude in judging what exemplary conduct is, and he is told that simple reports of no serious nature shall not be regarded as militating against a man going into the special class. I think this much also that it would be quite impossible for a misconducted prisoner to get into the first class, and therefore you must let him get into that step by step to make the standard of the special class. I would not alter those rules, but I think that improvement might be made in those rules about the gratuity. What is most important to a prisoner relating to this class is the money gratuity attached to it, and where the man does not in the opinion of the governor merit the special class owing to some little misconduct in the latter part of the sentence (because the special class carries not only a special gratuity of 3*l.*, but it carries a week's extra remission of sentence), then I think that the governor should have power to recommend this man for an extra gratuity, which would be given, but that he should not get the great advantage of an extra week's remission so as to make a difference between him and the man who really is exemplary.

11,731. I should like to ask you whether you think it is desirable that the Secretary of State should have power to alter at his discretion the Rules of the Prisons Act of 1865, assuming that any alteration which he made would have to be laid before Parliament and laid on the table of the House for sanction?—Yes, I think so. I am very Liberal; almost Radical in my views on all these questions, and I think as we go on we get better light on these things, and find that most of them are capable of great improvement. The difficulty is that it is very cumbersome to get anything altered. If the Secretary of State had power to amend the Act I think it would be of great advantage.

11,732. That leads to another point, which was raised in Question 9201. Dr. Aucrum refers to a Prison Congress that was held when the late Lord Aberdare was Secretary of the Home Department; have you any knowledge of that congress?—I know about it, and that it did exist. Of course there are Prison Congresses held periodically in different countries. There is one going to be held in Paris in June. It is on the same lines.

11,733. This was an European Congress, was it not?—I believe so.

11,734. Do you think it would be advisable that annual meetings should be held of prison officials and representatives of the prisoners' aid societies and visiting committees who are interested in prison work and with practical knowledge of it to discuss prison questions, prison statistics, and general points of administration?—On the whole I am not in favour of them. I do not know what good can come from them.

11,735. You know the practice with regard to the meetings of inspectors of mines?—I do.

11,736. So also with regard to the inspectors of factories?—Yes.

11,737. And coming to other departments, for instance, the Education Department, the first-class inspectors meet every year. An agenda is circulated amongst them. They send on subjects to the inspectors subordinate to them to get their opinion upon, and then they come up to London annually to discuss all these matters with the chief officials at the office of the Minister of Education. Now, in all those departments the very greatest advantage is found from bringing to bear the general experience of practical men on the points at issue. Do you think there is any reason why the Prisons Department should be exempt from that practice?—First of all I would say it appears to me that the cases are not quite parallel, and that these people you have mentioned are all permanent officials. There is continuity in their work, whilst, as regards the prison officials, they are permanent as regards the commissioners and inspectors of prisons, who are in constant touch with the work; but when you get beyond that and get to visiting committees, you may have a different chairman and members every year.

11,738. Then let us take governors, medical officers, and chaplains. There is continuity there?—There is, but there is now a rule where we have it laid down that a governor is not to limit himself to writing a report to the Commissioners once a year, but that at any time any question occurs to him that he thinks he can bring forward he is to write to the Commissioners or directors, as the case may be. I think by that rule you would really get more than if you assembled 60 or 70 governors here.

11,739. There is no reason why so many as 60 or 70 should come. Can you see any harm, and do not you see the possibility of considerable good coming from bringing up certain governors, certain medical officers, and certain chaplains (we will leave outside for the moment visiting committees and prisoners' aid societies), and assembling them to discuss the chief questions on the treatment of prisoners that may be current or that may have arisen suddenly, and giving the benefit to the Commissioners, and through the Commissioners to the Secretary of State, of their own individual experiences?—I do not think it would do any harm. I am not opposed to it.

11,740. You think it might not do any harm; do you think it might do good?—I think it might. I am not unfavourable to it.

11,741. With regard to question 9932, may we understand that a governor has not the power of stopping a man from going to chapel?—I say this about it, that by the Prisons Act of 1865, schedule 1, regulation 46, it says: "Criminal prisoners shall "attend Divine Service on Sundays and on other "days when such service is performed, unless "prevented by illness or other reasonable cause to be "allowed by the gaoler, or unless their attendance is "dispensed with by the visiting justices." Now, for the "visiting justices" you must read "Commissioners." Therefore, the Commissioners have power to dispense with the attendance of any prisoner at Divine Service, and I say that in the case of most prisons that I have visited the governors have delegated to them by the Commissioners (because it has been done with their authority or their sanction) the power of withholding prisoners from attending Divine Service who misconduct themselves in chapel; and therefore it is perfectly legal and legitimate. I would say about that that in the unfortunate reference to the Wormwood Scrubs, which I have been personally drawn into much against my will, the question there of stopping prisoners from going to chapel for misconduct came up; and it might appear that I was the originator of this as the deputy governor of the prison appointed by the Secretary of State. I was the appointed deputy governor of that prison. I only followed what was done by the governor of the prison, who had authority from the Commissioners. I only carried on a system which had previously existed there. In going through the punishment book of Maidstone prison I find the same thing there, and that wherever the governor inflicted that, it was as a preventive measure. I can name any other number of prisons where the governor has done so, with the sanction and knowledge of the Prison Commissioners, who, having themselves power under this Act to do it, have therefore power to delegate it.

Col. Garsia.

11,742. As we have reached that point I want to ask you a question about the case of a person who has been called J. E., and that reference to what was thought to be a punishment cell?—Of course when I appeared before the Committee last, this question of the award of the visiting committee on that prisoner on the 19th December 1891 did not arise. I have read it in evidence that has since been given, and I am very glad to have the opportunity of answering any question on the subject, and of making clear what did occur about that.

11,743. It seemed to me almost incredible that 42 days should have been inflicted in a punishment cell?—Well, I say distinctly that the prisoner never was sentenced to 42 days in a punishment cell.

11,744. What is your explanation of it?—I say the visiting committee sentenced him on my suggestion to 42 days' crank labour on No. 3 diet, it then being believed that they had powers of dietary punishment, which, no doubt by the Secretary of State's rule, it was intended they should have; that the sentence pronounced by the chairman of the visiting committee was distinctly without any reference to a punishment cell; that afterwards, no doubt, that "p. cell" was put in, but it did not stand for "punishment cell"; it stood for "penal cell" or "penal class cell." There were certain cells in Wormwood Scrubs Prison, which had been a convict prison, which were known as "penal class cells," and which were called familiarly "penal cells." They were ordinary cells containing a hard labour machine, called a crank, where prisoners underwent crank labour on this dietary punishment. I said to this visiting committee, that of course the man would do it in that cell, and no doubt the chairman of the visiting committee put "p. cell" there afterwards. If the question had been referred to me when the governor of Wandsworth (not knowing what it meant) assumed it was "punishment cell," if when it came up to the Commissioners they had referred it to me, and asked what is the meaning of this, I should at once have replied, and said what it did mean; but it never was referred to me. He dealt with it as he thought best. He said you must follow the statute, and only inflict so much of that punishment, but I say the visiting committee knew the law as well on that day as now, and so did I; and I never for one moment would have stood by and allowed the visiting committee, or agreed to the visiting committee ordering an illegal punishment like that, which would be a grossly illegal punishment, without any word of explanation or protest. I say distinctly that he was not sentenced to a punishment cell for 42 days, and that it is a misunderstanding entirely.

11,745. I noticed that Mr. Davitt in his evidence the other day referred two or three times to "punishment in penal cells"; so that I understand that "penal cells" are the usual cells where convicts are sent for crank punishment?—Yes. In local prisons there are a certain number of cells fitted up with a crank. They call them "hard labour cells" I believe, but I have always been accustomed to call them "penal cells." I have called them "penal cells" for 14 years, and I continue to call them "penal cells;" and at this place we had 300 convicts at the time. You will notice whenever the visiting committees wrote "punishment cell," they wrote "pun." in this case it was put "p. cell." The sentence on the prisoner was 42 days' crank labour on No. 3 diet. I am clear about it, I am quite satisfied about it.

11,746. Do you see any objection to publishing the "standing orders"?—No, I see no objection to it. We publish all the orders for the Army, and there is nothing secret in our prisons. I think the more open they are, the more the public know about them, and the more the public see them, the better it will be for the administration of the prisons.

11,747. Do you see any reason why the inspectors should not certify that they have examined the punishment book?—There is no reason against it. They virtually do that now. They put their initials every time they visit the prison in token that they have done so; perhaps you will allow me to make a few remarks on this. I would tell you first that we have in our convict prisons what I regard as a most perfect system of check on the governor that the punishments of prisoners are all strictly correct, adequate, and legal. It is the rule of every convict prison, and in local prisons as regards convicts, for every convict who comes under report to have his name entered in a sheet called the "report sheet," which I will show to the Committee. Every report against a prisoner is there entered, with a statement of the investigations made, and the punishment awarded. If the prisoner, for the purposes of restraint, is placed in handcuffs, or if any other event happens whatever, it is recorded there. Then at the end of every week those sheets containing the whole of the records of every report, and how it is dealt with, are sent up to the Home Office by each prison, and are reviewed by the Director of the Prison, who goes through every report and every punishment to see that it is correct and legal, and who returns it to the prison with his remarks, either approving it or saying it is inadequate, and in some cases, saying "You must reduce the punishment." This is accompanied by a letter which I will also hand in, which puts the directors in complete possession of all the facts of how the prisoners have been treated throughout the whole prison. That is the covering letter which comes with it. Recently, within the last year, we have applied this same principle to convicts in local prisons. Every convict kept in a local prison who is punished or comes under report is in like manner entered up in one of these sheets, and every week we get one of these sheets up at the Home Office. What I think would be the most perfect check, and keep the people who know most of the work of the local prisons in touch with them, is to carry out the same system in local prisons that you have in convict prisons, and have that weekly sheet sent up to the Commissioner, so that he can see what is going on; see every man who has been punished, how he has been punished, and why he has been punished. He will know all that is going on, which he does not know now, and it will be a check on the inspector. I recommend that that should be done. It will give a little more trouble here, but it will make the present system very much more perfect, and I therefore recommend it.

11,748. There was a question asked with regard to the accommodation. I do not go into that further than just to ask whether you think that on the facts of the case it has been really possible to keep within the law. I see that you have kept within the law so far as the 17th section, subsection 1 is concerned, but then it does not necessarily follow that you are able to keep within Regulation 26 of Schedule 1; in other words, that where from accident there has been a too great influx of prisoners for the accommodation, those prisoners have had to be put in association for a time, which of itself is technically an infringement of Regulation 26?—Quite so; I can only say what I said before, that I think that all this overcrowding which has occurred in certain prisons could have been avoided. I think that we have got ample accommodation throughout the country, since the prisoners have been brought under one central authority we have certain alternative prisons, and if the governors would only look a little ahead and keep a margin of cell accommodation, and not run it too close, I think all difficulties could be avoided. It has occurred in the past; but it has become less now. We had a case last year.

11,749. I have only one more question to ask you. I forget whether you have been asked your opinion with regard to the amalgamation of convict prisons and local prisons?—No, I was not asked that.

11,750. What is your view of it?—I really cannot see any advantage in the separation.

11,751. Do you see any difficulty in carrying out the amalgamation as soon as you can get Parliament to pass the necessary Act?—I see none whatever. I think that all your long-sentence local prisoners, people sentenced to 12, 18 months, and two years, might well go on public works and be employed with the convicts. I think it would facilitate the working immensely if we had such an amalgamation.

11,752. It would be a great convenience to the Commissioners to work the whole system I suppose?—Yes.

11,753. You have now to issue separate reports and separate statistics with regard to convict prisons and local prisons, and the whole thing could be done in one report if they were amalgamated?—Yes, I think it would be of infinite advantage to the public service.

11,754. It would require, of course, a codification of the law?—Yes. I now hand in a list of all reports on matters connected with the system and returns which have been furnished by the Prisons Department. I have also to hand in the report of the directors, which you, sir, called for, with regard to some of the evidence given by Mr. E——. (The document was handed in. See Appendix IX).

11,755. (Mr. O'Connor.) There are just a few points which occurred to me as the Chairman was asking you questions, as to which I should like to put one or two queries to you. First of all as to the discretion suggested for governors in the matter of remission of punishment. I suppose a good many governors would rather be without the discretion?—I think so.

11,756. And perhaps you would think it would be questionable as matter of policy whether it was wise to allow a governor to appear in the eyes of the prisoners as a court of appeal from a visiting committee?—I think it would be most objectionable.

11,757. But you would not have any objection to governors being allowed to submit to the visiting committee a case which appeared to them to call for it, and a proposal that some of the punishment ordered by the visiting committee should be remitted?—He has really the power now, and I think he ought to exercise it more than he does.

11,758. But that the remission should not be operative without the formal sanction of the chairman of the visiting committee?—That is my opinion.

11,759. Now with regard to another point. Prisoners should always be employed in industrial occupations, you think?—That is my opinion. You cannot do that with a very short-sentence prisoner.

11,760. No, I was coming to that. You said also you would be willing to see the men employed each upon his own particular line of industry; and that would be practicable?—It would be practicable. I am dealing, of course with long-sentence prisoners. I do not think it would be practicable with short-sentence prisoners, because you could not find work for them; but in dealing with prisoners of over six months or of over three months, where you have power to send them to particular industries, and where you could concentrate them under the powers vested in you under the Act, I think it would be possible.

11,761. If there was a classification of prisoners then, according to length of sentence, it might be more practicable than it is now?—Yes.

11,762. With regard to visits from relatives, you mentioned that often in cases which did not come within the rules, you yourself have taken upon yourself to allow certain things to be done which were not strictly in accordance with the regulation?—Which were not laid down in the regulation.

11,763. But that was where a strong governor would be prepared to deal with the situation before him apart from the strict regulation of the rule?—Yes.

11,764. Do not you think the rule should be so clear that every governor should understand he had the discretion?—I think it would be advantageous to throw light on all governors on these points.

11,765. Then I understand that there was a circular from the Commissioners making certain suggestions to the governors to the effect that the governors should send in any suggestions that occurred to them?—It is a standing rule.

11,766. What is the date of that?—I cannot tell you, but I know that as long as I have been in the prison service I have known that; it is in our convict regulations, and I believe it is in the books.

11,767. But it is not often acted upon, is it?—No, it is not. Of course I have known it acted upon, and I have acted upon it myself once or twice. I admit that governors are chary of coming too much forward in suggesting things as regards general administration, but things relating to their particular prisons they do not hesitate to make recommendations upon.

11,768. On the point of the suggested conference, I take it you are not very sanguine of the result?—No.

11,769. And you take it it would be scarcely worth the expense which would be involved?—I do not oppose it; but, I think, dealing with prisoners and prisons is a special study, and that people have to give up their time and their thought to it very much.

11,770. With regard to Rule 46 of the 1st Schedule of the Act of 1865 as to attending at chapel, I take it that that is a rule imposing an obligation upon a prisoner to attend service?—The first part of it is.

11,771. And the second part is a qualification, the object of which is to dispense the prisoner from the obligation in certain circumstances?—Yes.

11,772. The qualification is for the relief of the prisoner from an obligation to which he may have some objection?—I do not go with you.

11,773. Will you kindly read the terms of the rule?—"Criminal prisoners shall attend Divine Service "on Sundays and on other days when such service is "performed unless prevented by illness or other "reasonable cause, to be allowed by the gaoler, or "unless their attendance is dispensed with by the "visiting justices."

11,774. If the "visiting justices" means the "Commissioners," may I ask you if the Commissioners or the gaoler has power to dispense under certain circumstances with this particular obligation. A dispensation from an obligation is a totally different thing from a punishment?—I am not a lawyer, but all I can tell you is that this question was brought before the House of Commons in the case of certain prisoners, anarchists, at Stafford Prison; and the Secretary of State held the view that it was perfectly within the right of the Prison Commissioners to dispense with attendance at the services and to prevent those prisoners who had made it a grievance that they were not allowed to go to chapel from doing so, and that the governor, acting under the Commissioners' orders, had power to prevent them attending. I am not sufficiently a lawyer to know whether this is strictly legal or not. All I can say is, that that is my view; that is the way I read it, but I bow to you if your judgment is better than mine.

11,775. I only want to draw out your view. I suggest that dispensation from an obligation may be distinguished from a punishment?—That is the way we have always interpreted it here; that it is giving power to the Commissioners to dispense with i for the protection of the body of prisoners, not as a favour to the prisoner.

Col. Garsia.
28 Feb. 1895.

11,776. That would be a matter of precaution in the interest of discipline?—Distinctly, or it might be as a matter of punishment. I have never awarded it as a matter of punishment. I have always awarded it as a matter of precaution to keep away a man from hurting other people. I look upon it as a great privilege to go to chapel, but if a man makes the chapel unbearable for those who value it, I think that in the interests of the other prisoners he ought to be prevented from doing so.

At this stage of the proceedings the Chair was taken by Mr. De Rutzen.

11,777. With regard to the check on illegal punishments, I am afraid I did not catch what you suggest?—I suggest that the excellent system we have in our convict prisons of every punishment being entered on a sheet and sent to the Home Office so as to come under the review of the directors, should be adopted. In the case of convicts in local prisons there is the same check. That system should be extended to prisoners in local prisons; and we should have one uniform check which cannot in my humble opinion be surpassed.

11,778. That does not obtain at present in regard to local prisons?—No, only as regards convicts in any local prison.

11,779. With regard to the margin of accommodation which a governor ought to secure, if not the Commissioners themselves, from the returns which the governors send up with weekly information as to the existing margin in each prison?—Well, on Tuesday of each week we get an accommodation return from each prison, showing the vacancies in each prison.

11,780. So that the Commissioners themselves are fixed with knowledge each week of the existing margin at the date of the returns?—But they have no knowledge of the possibilities or the probabilities of what will be required in that prison. It is only the governor, the man on the spot, who knows the local circumstances.

11,781. But they have the history of each prison in preceding years?—Look at the work of having to work out 60 or 80 places.

11,782. But if these returns which are sent to the Commissioners are not to be acted upon by them, the returning of them, the filing of them, and the registration of them, becomes a matter of very perfunctory character?—I must explain the object of that return, which is to show the Commissioners that those prisons are not actually overcrowded at the time, and that they have got space for the prisoners; that is the object of them.

11,783. But we have had several cases mentioned to us in which the weekly returns showed that already the accommodation had disappeared, and that there was overcrowding. We have not been able to ascertain that the Commissioners, when that was brought to their notice, took any steps at once to communicate with the governors with regard to the condition of their prisons?—Of course in my multifarious duties as secretary, you will understand it does not devolve upon me to check these weekly returns.

11,784. I do not mean personally, I mean the staff?—But I want to explain it to you. The accommodation returns go to the chief commissioner of the district, and we make up the returns to see what the accommodation is. The commissioner is supposed to go through it and check it, and to call attention to anything, and pull up a governor if he sees that anything is exceeded. I do not know but it would be of great advantage to us if we could know the specific cases where these returns did show overcrowding and no action was taken on our part.

11,785. But I have asked in the course of these proceedings for any letter or communication or minute of communication made to a governor with respect to a report which showed that his margin had entirely disappeared?—May I further explain to you that the Commissioners have not laid down any distinct margin for each prison.

11,786. I am speaking of cases where the margin disappeared altogether?—That margin is in the discretion of the governor. Putting it generally, the understanding with the prisons is this. You have, we will say, 500 separate cells in a prison. The governor is supposed to understand (it is not a new thing, it has been going on for years) when he sees that he will be overstocked, or overcrowded, that he has to take time by the forelock, and submit a request to be allowed to remove prisoners into an adjoining prison; and we always instruct them by telegraph and give them authority to do so; but the Commissioners do not say to the governors "You have 500 "cells, when you come to 450 you are to apply for "authority to remove them;" they leave that to his discretion. In his discretion he may think 490 is the right number at which to apply, but I do say that the governor has this amount of latitude, at this moment I recall no case during my years at the office in which a governor has made a representation that he was, or was likely to be, overcrowded, in which there was any hindrance to his getting prisoners removed.

11,787. Of course when prisons are choke full it is absolutely necessary to remove them?—I have been just investigating a case which occurred at Preston prison, I think. The visiting committee in their annual report say that the prison on one day, that is the 30th of June, was overcrowded. We have gone into that, and we find that the governor did not apply until the 3rd of July to meet this position.

11,788. Would there be any objection to including in your weekly return of accommodation a line for the estimated number of prisoners likely to be received in the next week?—None whatever.

11,789. That would at once direct the attention of the authorities to it?—Yes, but I think a much more stringent thing would be to give a distinct order to the governors binding them to send in a demand for removing prisoners.

11,790. Just let me ask you one question with regard to the prisoner who has been called "J. E." at Wormwood Scrubs. Where was he on the eve of his removal to Wandsworth?—He was in a cell in B. hall.

11,791. He had already undergone one sentence, and I think he had already begun to suffer a second sentence, and was actually in course of suffering a second sentence?—But not the 42 days part of it. He was sentenced on the 11th of the month. The day before I resumed charge he was sentenced by the visiting committee to a punishment of so many days. It was a dietary punishment in a punishment cell. On the 19th, the day of the disturbance in the chapel, he was again tried by the visiting committee, and sentenced first of all to so many days in a punishment cell on No. 2 diet, and to so many days' crank labour in "p.," which, I have explained to you, does not mean a punishment cell, and he had begun to serve the first part of that sentence, not the 42 days at all.

11,792. It is not "punishment cell" here; it is "p. cell."

11,793. (Sir Algernon West.) What is "p. cell"?—Penal cell.

11,794. Is that where you put a convict?—Yes.

11,795. Then it is just the same?—I must tell you also that at Wormwood Scrubs there was not one solitary certified punishment cell.

11,796. (Mr. O'Connor.) On this paper you will see that "p. cell" is written in precisely the same way as the "p. cell" in the other sentences?—I do not think it was. It was not so in the punishment book.

11,797. The word "cell" was not. It was "p. c." I think?—Let me tell you that at Wormwood Scrubs there is no such thing as a certified punishment cell.

Col. Garsia.
28 Feb. 1895.

There were none that were certified in the prison as punishment cells; they were only ordinary cells.

11,798. That really indicates a punishment, I suppose?—That means, according to the Act, a semi-dark cell devoid of any appliances for labour, or even of furniture, in which a prisoner is shut up, in a state of idleness, deprived of exercise, deprived of going to chapel, and kept in close confinement; he does no work during the time he is there. That is a true description of a "punishment cell." A governor is limited to giving 24 hours in that, and the visiting committee to 14 days. These cells must be certified by an inspector of the prison as being for the purposes of punishment and punishment only. What I say is, that at Wormwood Scrubs there was no cell that had been certified for punishment. There were a lot of ordinary cells, some of which we had used as penal cells, but they are all ordinary cells, some of them having appliances which were capable of being used in case a prisoner was violent; but beyond that we had no punishment cells, and the mere fact of putting a prisoner on crank labour in a punishment cell is an impossible thing; you could not carry it out. They would have had to build a special cell for it, because in a punishment cell pure and simple there is no such thing as a crank, and how the Governor of Wandsworth Prison could have assumed it was a punishment cell, I do not know, because on the face of it you would not put a man to work in the dark. That is ridiculous. He wrote a letter and asked the question, and the commissioner did not refer it to me, but he wrote back and said, "You must obey the statute." All I can say about it is, that the man was not sentenced to the punishment cell. I am prepared to go into court and swear it, or if any magistrate here would put me on my oath I am quite prepared to swear to it.

The witness withdrew.

The proceedings were adjourned for a short time.

The Chair was again taken by Mr. Gladstone.

Mr. James Duncan recalled and further examined.

Mr. J. Duncan.

11,799. (Chairman.) In connexion with Question 4484, you gave as the per-centage of interference by prison labour with outside labour ·04 per cent.?—Yes.

11,800. Perhaps you could now put that on a rather clearer basis?—The statement I made on this point was merely an extension, at the instance of Sir Algernon West, of the evidence I gave on the probable increase which would take place in the number of workers at industrial employment from the impetus which would be given to prison trade by the introduction of certain improvements which I had suggested: the augmentation of workshops; the inauguration of a scheme of systematic instruction to prisoners; the granting of pecuniary reward to industrious prisoners, and so on. After very careful consideration I estimated the addition which would thus be made to the number of workers as about 1,100, confining myself to this low figure—because the law as it at present stands requires that a very large proportion of prisoners who would otherwise be available for industries shall be employed on first-class hard labour, which is more or less unremunerative—there were 3,825 of those prisoners, for example, in 1893–94. Comparing the 1,100 with the last census statistics of persons employed outside at like occupations, we arrive at ·04 per cent., or ·4 per thousand or 1 in 2,500, as the rate of increased interference on the basis I have named. That is what I understood Sir Algernon West had in his mind.

11,801. (Sir Algernon West.) I wanted the total?—My answer is all on increased per-centage, and I took it you were running on that line. It can be got but easily on the wider basis.

11,802. At present I understand you mean the increased interference, supposing all you recommend were adopted, would be one man in 2,500?—Yes, one man in 2,500 workers. On this figure I have to remark that it is founded on a bare comparison of the respective numbers, but it has to be borne in mind that the amount of work done by a prisoner is much less than that done by a free workman. Taking, then, a prisoner's labour at half that of a free workman's, the ·04 per cent. would be reduced to ·02 per cent. or ·2 per thousand, or one in 5,000 workers, which is probably pretty near the mark, having regard to the number of learners and indifferent workmen among the prisoners. I think that is the more reliable figure of the two, and that is about a fair estimate of prisoners' work as compared with outsiders' work. I have, of course, no knowledge of what further industrial developments the Committee may have in view, but even were the 1,100 workers to be trebled, the rate of increased interference would be so small as to be unworthy a moment's consideration.

11,803. The question I want now to put to you is this: you have told us that supposing all the industries you have mentioned were developed subsequently by the prison authorities the extra interference with outdoor labour would be as one man to 5,000?—That is so.

11,804. Could you tell us what is the interference at the present time?—I cannot absolutely. It would take considerable calculation, but roughly you might take it that there are 10,000 workers, including the oakum pickers—say, 3,000. Taking off the oakum pickers it leaves 7,000 employed at industrial occupations.

11,805. That 7,000 divided amongst the different trades would be, roughly speaking, what?—It would increase the proportion.

11,806. What I want to get at is this: at present we interfere with outdoor labour to the extent of x, y, z, and if these recommendations are carried we shall interfere to the extra extent of 1 in 5,000?—Yes. I think you had better have the thing worked out exactly. It will be only a short affair to work out and give you. It is certain trades I am going to increase; and in the other trades, which will not be increased under the normal state of things, there are things which might seriously affect the per-centage as a whole; for example, bricklayers would come in, but I am not going to increase the bricklayers by my scheme, and there is an enormous per-centage of bricklayers outside. That might, perhaps, upset any estimated figure, and if you are going to quote any figure in your report I should advise you to have it exact.

11,807. Then I will ask you what do you calculate is the present interference of prison labour with outside labour in the trades for which you consider prisoners suitable?—And in which they are employed, you mean?

11,808. Yes, in which they are employed?—Taking, as before, the labour of a prisoner to be half that of a free workman, I estimate that the total present interference with outside labour is at the rate of ·053 per cent, or ·53 per thousand, or 1 prisoner to every 1,886 free workmen. The total interference after the proposed increase of prison workers has taken place would be at the rate of ·063 per cent., or ·63 per thousand, or 1 prisoner to every 1,587 free workmen. The rate of interference in so far as the particular trades proposed to be increased are concerned would be 1 prisoner to every 5,000 free workmen at those trades, as already stated.

Mr. J. Duncan.

26 Feb. 1895.

11,809. (Chairman.) In connexion with that point, can you give us the per-centage of interference with regard to the mat-making industry?—Mat-making has been done away with.

11,810. With the mat-making industry alone?—As now existing?

11,811. Yes?—We have only about 70 people now.

11,812. I should have said, as it was when the agitation against it arose?—When it first arose? Because it has come gradually down from 2,800 to what it is now. At the time the agitation against prison mat-making first arose during the rule of the Commissioners, the number of prison mat-makers exceeded by 23·87 per cent. the number given in the Census returns as employed at mat-making outside.

11,813. (Sir Algernon West.) Out of that, may not they say, "Yes, very true; that is so as distributed "all over the country, but how is it as to a particular place?"—Yes, that is so.

11,814. (Chairman.) I think you wish to clear up a point that came before us with regard to the disturbance of the sack-making at Lewes?—Yes, the question of the cessation of the Admiralty coal sack making at Lewes is a very simple one. I have read the evidence, and I see that some misconception seems to have arisen on the point. The making of Admiralty sacks was entirely a convict prison industry up to 1888, the year in which I took over charge of the Store Accountant's Department. Though the work is undoubtedly more suitable for long term prisoners like convicts, because they can be depended upon to give better workmanship, and to supply to time, a strong effort was made at the period I refer to to get the local prisons to take a share of it, but the prisons applied to, as a rule, thought it far too difficult for the class of prisoners at their disposal, and were greatly disinclined to undertake it, especially as deliveries were required to be made by a fixed date. Lewes was only engaged on the work for two years, during which time the Admiralty were frequently pressing for deliveries. At the end of the two years the then governor reported that he was unable to promise any definite quantity, because of the want of convict labour, and the reduced population of his prison, a reduction which afterwards continued. There was no alternative therefore but to send the work to another prison; it is impossible to say for certain where now, the matter having happened some four or five years ago; but a crucial point with the Admiralty orders is promptitude of delivery, and unless that can be relied upon there is no use in our taking up the work at all. This is just one of the cases in which the establishment of a central depôt to which the prison could forward their supplies from time to time would be of immense advantage. I may mention that the Metropolitan Asylums Board have under consideration the question of establishing some such depôt as that, and I have been called into consultation with regard to the matter by way of assisting a special committee that is now sitting. I may mention, however, that the question of pushing the making of sacks in local prisons has been all along kept steadily in view; it has been one of my pet schemes. Wormwood Scrubs, Wandsworth, Reading, Exeter, Hull, and Chelmsford prisons have done excellent work for some time. A very large order for coal sacks, hammocks, &c., 154,910 articles in all, has lately been received from the Admiralty, and the governor of Lewes having reported some time ago the presence of a number of convicts in his population, he will be given a full share. He has already in fact been asked to proceed with 1,000 sacks on account. The same question arose at first to some extent with regard to the making of mail bags. When mail bags were first undertaken, it was entirely a convict prison industry. To-day, 75 per cent of the mail bags are done in local prisons instead of in convict prisons. No doubt that will eventually, under improved conditions, be the result as regards the coal sacks, which are a much more difficult thing to make, and also as regards the hammocks, and so on. Reading has done splendid work all through, and has taken it up most enthusiastically and increased its output from 1,000 to 8,000 sacks a year; it seems to have gone in for the work.

11,815. To what do you ascribe the special success at Reading?—I do not know. It has struck us very much. I suppose the governor took a fancy to the work, probably.

The witness withdrew.

ANALYSIS OF EVIDENCE.

ANCRUM, Dr.:

A County Justice of Gloucestershire. Has not practised medicine for 35 years. A visiting justice of Gloucester Gaol for nearly 30 years; now chairman of the visiting committee, 9187–92, and chairman of the County Asylum, 9220. Gloucester the first prison on the "separate" system, 9203–7; not 100 prisoners at present time; will accommodate about 300, 9239.

Visiting justices. Their duties in the past and at the present time compared, 9193–96; interest taken in work greatly diminished owing to present system, 9201–2. Old system of visiting justices led to improvements in prison management, 9208. Means by which the interest of the visiting justices might be restored, 9210–18. Reformatory influence of prisons lessened by lack of interest on part of visiting committees, 9216–17.

System of gratuities at Gloucester Prison explained, 9208–9.

Improvements suggested. Justices should have greater power to modify food; cumulative sentences advocated for habitual offenders, 9248–49.

Prison diet sufficiently good, but absolute uniformity of diet undesirable. Stirabout refused by the ordinary Gloucestershire prisoner (the agricultural labourer), but in the North of England the prisoners, accustomed to porridge, would doubtless eat it, 9197–9200.

Habitual drunkards. Holds same opinion as that of the Committee of 1893, 9250–51.

Chief warder in charge less anxious, owing to his training, to desire to reform than to preserve strict discipline; appointment of a person of superior intelligence advocated, 9217–18.

Insanity. Cases carefully watched at Gloucester. Few prisoners are insane, though many feign insanity, 9219. As chairman of the County Lunatic Asylum sees 1,200 lunatics every month, 9220. The mere fact that a man is a criminal would not constitute an objection to his transfer to an ordinary lunatic asylum, 9221–4. Suspected cases carefully treated, and put into association, 9225–6.

Associated prison labour. In favour of, but not at first. The principle introduced by Maconochie is better; separate treatment at the outset, 9252.

Prisoners' Aid Society at Gloucester quite independent of Government, and more than adequate, 9252–57.

BAILEY, Mr. ROWLAND:

For 11 years in charge of the furniture department of the Office of Works, 11,153–6.

The reason for the discontinuance of the supply of various articles (principally mats, baskets, and tinware) is mainly want of organisation. It was arranged with the prisons that a stock of articles should be kept, but this was not carried into effect. The present state of things could not exist if prison industries received proper attention at the board; everything is subservient to discipline; the governors have no object in keeping a manufacture, and the warders (witness speaks now from personal observation) lack interest, receiving nothing for superintending prison industries, 11,157–61, 11,166, 11,169–70.

There should be no difficulty in allocating the industries to the proper centres, but this is not done; tin paper-trays should not be made at Portland, nor baskets for Government use at Dartmoor, but in London; then there was the proposal to do washing for the public offices at Manchester, 11,162–4.

Carpet-beating not unhealthy. Feels sure the difficulties raised came from the staff, 11,167–9.

Improvements which witness agrees to be necessary are as follows:—Warders should have some incentive to take further interest in the work of teaching and supervising prison industries.

There should be a better supply of skilled artizan teachers; and

A highly responsible official in the prisons department should be entrusted with the organisation of labour, according to local requirements, and the individual capacities of prisons to produce certain articles, 11,180–4.

BARKER, Colonel (Salvation Army):

[Lamb, Major (Salvation Army), also in attendance].

For 14 years an officer of the Salvation Army; secretary for the social operations of the Army in the Darkest England scheme, 8256–59.

Work of the Army in Australia in connexion with prisons explained, 8260–82, 8295, 8483.

The Prison Gate Home receives convicts and first sentence men; the casual is dealt with at temporary relief works, of which there are five in London. Since the Home was opened in February 1891, 1,197 discharged prisoners have been dealt with; of this number 383 have obtained employment after from one to 18 months (of these 87 per cent. are doing well, 10 per cent. have been lost sight of, 2 per cent. have returned to crime, and then there are the doubtfuls who, although not lost sight of, have not satisfied the authorities that they are reformed); 7 have enlisted in the army. 376 after working well and giving satisfaction, have left to seek work; 128 out of the 1,197 have been discharged as unsatisfactory and unwilling to work, 8310–18, 8385–95; perhaps three-fourths of the whole number are first offenders, 8396–400; of those received a great number are mentally weak and wasted, a considerable number colour blind, 8333–40; of the physically weak the larger proportion would come from the local prisons, the statement as to the feeble-minded applies more to convicts, 8401–29; the figures 1,197 apply to London alone, 8348–49. The various shelters cover 1,000 each day, mostly casuals; 20 per cent., perhaps, find their way to prison, 8352–56. All classes received, drunken and refractory cases not kept at the home, but sent to other departments of the scheme; they would number 264 out of the 1,197, 8364–73. Perhaps 10 a day, or 500 in the year, are received at the prison gate but do not pass into the Home, being sent elsewhere, and staying on an average two months; nothing definite known of their after movements, 8374–82.

Women are sent to a home in Mare Street. Mrs. Bramwell Booth recently reported that she has had 700 women through her homes, 395 of whom have been sentenced for criminal offences, 8383–84.

Work performed. The chief industry is the salvage (the collecting and sorting of waste paper mainly); other industries are tailoring, boot and shoe making, and hat-making, 8306. Men are received who have learnt a trade in prison, but they are few in number, 8319–20; weekly cost per man, 7*s.* Salvage pays for keep and something towards cost of administration. At present a loss is incurred, 8437–41. Salvage work explained, 8442–50. Task work is performed in the lower class of labour yards, and men are paid according to the value of their work; the highest rate of wage 5*s.* a week, in addition to food and lodging, 8448–49. The next step is promotion to be a foreman with, perhaps, 2*s.* or 2*s.* 6*d.* a day, 8451.

Prison work should be productive. Non-productive work a source of real satisfaction to the loafing class. Productive work would act as a deterrent, 8326–31. Out-door work strongly advocated, 8335–40.

Cumulative sentences advocated for habitual criminals, 8296–98.

Present treatment of criminals a failure so far as reformatory influence is concerned. More discrimination and individual attention needed, 8299–304. In Australia solitary confinement has a deterrent effect on short sentence prisoners, 8357–60. Plank bed a deterrent, 8361–63.

Prisoners' Aid Societies. The Army desires to be placed on an equality with other agencies, 8284, 8293–94. Measures should be taken to prevent unscrupulous prisoners taking advantage of different societies, 8286–92. Co-operation necessary, 8293. A number of agencies but few prisoners' homes in England, 8292. A notice should be handed to each prisoner before discharge giving the names of societies willing to help; representatives from special societies should be allowed access to the prison on certain week-days in addition to the ordinary visiting committee, 8295. The advantages enjoyed by the Army over other aid societies, better appliances and more agents, 8454–56; more highly organised, 8457. Communication with prisoners prior to discharge very desirable; a great help abroad, 8279–81, 8460–62, 8474. Failing this, prisoners should be allowed to put their names down to be met at the prison gate, and this should be communicated to the Army, 8475. Visiting and conducting service in prisons at Kimberley and Cape Town explained, 8466–73.

ANALYSIS.

BARRINGTON, COLONEL J. T.:

Superintendent of Inspectors of Stores at Woolwich Dockyard, 11,449.

Articles made for the War Office, representing money value for the present financial year of 2,440*l.*: rugs, mats, baskets, and oil cans. For these articles the prisons find their own material and tender as a contractor would outside. Last year a departure was made; 12,000 bed and bolster cases were ordered, the materials being supplied and carriage paid by the War Department. The contract is being continued this year on the same scale; the prison department anxious, however, for increase of orders. Prisons employed last year, Holloway, Pentonville, Wandsworth, and Wormwood Scrubs. This year five additional prisons, Knutsford, Liverpool, Stafford, Strangeways, and Wakefield (but see 11,462; as to mat-making at Lewes, Bedford, and Canterbury). Country prisons fairly up to time. No appreciable difference so far as quality of work is concerned between country and metropolitan prisons, 11,462–4. Quantities of articles made in the last five years: 26,766 oil bottles, 7,000 door mats, 1,700 passage mats, 1,800 hearthrugs, and 18,866 baskets. Quality of the work very satisfactory on the whole, especially the tin work. Rejections much lower than in the case of an outside contract. Deliveries fairly punctual, 11,451–61, 11,473. Difficulties have arisen in connexion with brush making at Gosport the short waste material having been utilized; this is used outside in the manufacture of small brushes, but the prison authorities have no outlet for it; it might possibly be sold periodically, 11,464–6; prison prices compare favourably with trade prices, 11,475.

Work which might be undertaken. Sand bags, corn bags, sackings for beds, sacks of various kinds, barrack sheets, tent valises, pin bags, and canvas fencing jackets. The tin work at present is almost exclusively confined to oil bottles. Articles which might be added are meat dishes, funnels, dust pans, pudding shapes, baking tins, and drums and cylinders for oil and paint. Then in woodwork, inventory, knife, and notice boards, boxes, cradles for camp kettles, trestles, bed boards for field service, and soldiers' boxes (each soldier gets a box); and the brush and bass broom industry could be extended, 11,465.

For explanation of, and suggestions as to, arrangements for manufacture and delivery of stores by the Prisons Department, see 11,467–72.

BELL, MISS MARY JANE:

Matron at Holloway for past three years, formerly warder and chief warder at Walton, 5351–6.

Prisoners at Holloway. No sentence of three months at present time, 150 for one month or under, 5358–9; a large proportion in bad health on reception; drink and mode of living the causes, 5378–9; receptions average 50 or 60 a day, 78 the highest number (in 1893); reception work not over, as a rule, before 10 p.m., at times later, between 11 and 12, 5386–91; association, due to overcrowding, necessary on one or two occasions, but quite three years back, 5431–4.

Prison work. Little opportunity to teach work owing to short sentences, 5357; prisoners not anxious to receive instruction, 5360; those who can do nothing else employed picking oakum, others make mail-bags and mattresses for the War Department; the mail-bag work can be learned in a few days, 5361–3; thinks the dislike for oakum-picking at Holloway does but point to idleness and dislike for work in any form, 5367–9; has not noticed that prisoners' fingers are torn at this employment; the stain of tar complained of as preventing laundry work can be washed off in half a day, 5437–8; associated work popular, 5376–7.

Punishments. For light offences a day's close confinement; sometimes, but not frequently, No. 2 diet; favours latter punishment for prisoners receiving a fairly good diet, 5370–1; punishment by withdrawal from association little resorted to; prisoners in kitchen and laundry seldom offend, 5373–4.

No. 1. diet much disliked and is largely the cause of insubordination at the prison, 5380–5. A large number of women are in repeatedly with short sentences (out on Saturday, in on Monday), the No. 1 diet in a number of these cases is departed from 5416–22. Alternative diet recommended a pint of gruel (made with 2 ozs. of meal), and 6 ozs. of bread at breakfast; and a pint of gruel with 5 ozs. of bread for dinner and supper respectively 5423–4.

Warders three days out of four are on duty from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m.; on the fourth day, from 6 a.m. to 10 p.m. (rarely later), with a break of 1¾ hours at 4 p.m.; warder on late duty afterwards sleeps in prison and is liable to be rung up by prisoners; all the warders, excepting one in each wing, being in their quarters; the strain on officers is great, though sick warders more often suffer from colds than overwork; hours of duty should be shorter 5393–5407.

Classification. First offenders should be detained in a separate prison, 5441, 5446; case practically hopeless after second or third offence, and classification would not apply, 5444–5.

Juveniles. Is opposed to imprisonment of young girls; perhaps even to the age of 18 or 19 they should receive other treatment, 5442–51.

Mental cases at Holloway, mostly cases remanded for inquiry; proportion of convicts very small, 5410–5.

BRAYN, DR.:

Governor and Medical Officer at Woking Female Convict Prison; experience since 1875 exclusively in convict prisons, 4805–7; 207 convicts, number decreasing, prison three parts empty, 4809; a good system to unite the offices he holds, 4890.

Classification of prisoners, ample opportunities for, 4812; facilities for placing jealous and quarrelsome prisoners apart, and for separating "star class" from others, desirable, and are adequate, 4814–16; star class, 4817–20, 4960, 4976; old women, 4916–18.

Medical condition of prisoners inquired into on reception, 4821; the "medical history" sent with them from local prisons is verified at convict prison, 4823; "hospital cases," which include everything however trivial, average about 7 per cent., 4872.

Work is productive, and carried on partly in cells and partly in association in the manufactory, 4841, 4842, 4843; knitting, sewing, twine spinning, and laundry, 4844; is beneficial to the women, 4849; 134 of whom work, 4842; twine spinning is for the roughest women, 4920; laundry work the most useful after expiry of sentence, 4922; star class cook for officers, 4960.

Exercise never less than one hour a day, more on Sundays, 4852–54.

Mortality unusually high last year, viz., five, 4855; with small numbers there must be great fluctuations, 4861; mortality much the same as outside prisons, 4876; deaths in prison avoided where possible, 4950; nursing carried out by two officers who are trained nurses, one of great experience, assisted by prisoners, who act solely under directions, 4864–69.

No regular lady visitor; Mrs. Stidson comes occasionally, 4902; doubtful whether a general system of lady visitors is desirable, 5032.

Discipline. Caution usually given for first offence, then separate confinement, then loss of marks or privileges, 4877, 4896; governor can give bread and water for three days, directors up to 42 days; the latter very unusual, 4882; lowest diet is No. 4 local prison diet, 4880; No. 2, the usual punishment diet, that is, 2 ozs. Indian meal and 2 ozs. oatmeal made into about a pint of stirabout, 4878; silence enforced on those in separate confinement, others have one hour's talking in groups of two or three every day; talking also allowed in laundry and twine shop about the work, 4886–88, 4949, 5022–29, 5835; and among the old women, 4917; this is different from male convict prisons, 4937; reformatory effect only occasional; Woking prisoners mostly incorrigible, many with 40 or more convictions, 4888; some previous convictions are for drunkenness, many for theft, 4887; outbreaks of disorder occasional, 4874; handcuffs never used, loose canvas restraint jacket used for protection, not punishment, 4896–98; has a good effect, and need rarely be used for 24 hours, one hour often enough, 4899.

The system of marks should be the same in every prison, so as not to deceive prisoners, 4913–15.

Would prefer to have prisoners for the first nine months without detention in local prisons, because it is easier to teach them, 4910–12, 5021; existing arrangements, 4982.

Refuges and aid societies. Refuges not suitable for three years' prisoners, 4831–32, 5009–15; a good system, 5003; discipline of, 5018.

Discharges of London prisoners take place through Holloway, others are sent to their place of conviction, 4926, 4927; a month before discharge prisoners are told of the aid societies in the neighbourhood, 4925; and a form is sent to the society they choose; there should be State assistance for prisoners on discharge, 5055; workshops, 5057; the Roman Catholic Refuge at Finchley does good work in that way, 5056.

Remission of part of sentence for industry, &c., produces good results, 4933–35; might be extended to two year prisoners, 4936.

Medical staff of two sufficient for a prison of 1,400 even in an epidemic, 4827–30.

Sanitary arrangements at Woking not of newest type; but satisfactory, 4832; ventilation is from corridors into cells, which is bad, 4833–36.

Chaplains do not consult with medical officers with a view to complete diagnosis of mental and physical character of prisoner on reception; they report not unfrequently as to mental condition in an informal way, 4837–40; visits to prisoners explained, 4904.

As to scripture reader at Woking, 4906–7; necessary because she can become much more intimate with prisoners than chaplain, 4908.

Insanity of prisoners. Figures laid before Committee were deceptive, 4966; daily average of prisoners an unfair basis, 4966, 5044; insane paupers much more numerous than insane prisoners; never knew a case of insanity produced by prison life, though vicious habits in prison may have had some effect in one case, 5046.

Roman Catholics are 70 in number, 5047; there is a priest on the staff; prisoners say they sometimes wrongly register themselves as Protestants, so as to get out of their cells, 5052.

BUCHANAN, Colonel:

Secretary to the Royal Society for the Assistance of Discharged Prisoners for the past eight years, 7207–8.

As to the society's origin and constitution, 7210; its connexion with Wormwood Scrubs, 7211–3, 7217; its competition and co-operation with other similar societies, 7214–6, 7223–4, 7269–76; its procedure in dealing with discharged prisoners, 7222, 7225; number of prisoners aided, 7279; its government grant, 7280–3.

As to those societies generally: opposed to undue competition amongst prisoners and societies, 7263–8; amalgamation impracticable, 7277–8.

Difficulty in dealing with habitual offenders, 7230–1.

As to discharged prisoners: importance of interview before discharge, 7225; and separation from old surroundings, 7229.

As to various classes of prisoners: bad character of Wormwood Scrubs prisoners, 7226–8, coiners and receivers of stolen goods corrupting influence, 7233, 7242–4.

As to prison life: convict and local prisons as a deterrent compared, 7233–9; small amount of contamination, 7254–5; desirability of improving the kind of labour in 7256–9; associated labour preferred to solitary work, 7260–2.

As to sentences: importance of long sentences on coiners and receivers of stolen goods, 7240–1; and of evidence as to the character of prisoners being placed before the judges before passing sentence, 7245–53.

COLLETT, Mr. JOHN:

Director of Contracts for the Admiralty, 11,103.

Articles supplied include coal sacks and bags, hammocks, baskets, mats, matting, and clothing for the Royal Hospital School at Greenwich, value of work some thousands of pounds a year, 11,104–7. Quality of work rough, but satisfactory, 1114–6; articles very seldom rejected, 11,126; what little tinware is still made by hand is given to the prisons; it would not pay to set up machinery in the prisons in connexion with this industry, 11,127; there are difficulties in the way of giving orders for skilled work, the simpler the articles the better, 11,132–5.

System of contracts and accounts with prisons explained, 11,105–6, 11,112–3, 11,128–31; orders are given for a year's requirements and difficulties as to supply of articles are now met by keeping a six months' stock of goods in hand, 11,119.

The tendency of late years has been for the prisons to refuse orders on the ground of having too much work in hand. In 1889 they were offered the supply of uniforms for admiralty messengers. For one year the work was undertaken, after that refused; an immense amount of delay and inconvenience was experienced. Then in May 1891, a small order for hampers (rough work that could easily be performed), and in February 1892 an order for canvas dresses for dockyard hands, were refused, 11,108–11,111.

D——, Mr.:

Now and for the past two years in the Salvation Army Home, 8485–86.

Seven years' prison experience at Reading, Gloucester, Exeter, Bodmin, and St. Albans, 8488–89, 8548–57. Received no assistance from Prisoners' Aid Society on leaving Gloucester, 8561–65, 8575–78. For detailed account of witness's prison career after being twice sentenced, see 8579–90. For sentences passed, 8597–8605, 8609–22. Witness's attempts on his life and reasons therefor, 8583, 8633–35. Witness's last sentence remitted by Home Secretary on condition that he went to the Salvation Army Home, 8590.

Convicts in local prisons. Their presence undesirable, 8544–46.

System of communication between prisoner and prisoner explained, 8493–97; evil results of, 8498–8503, 8623–25; stricter rules now, 8504.

Productive work. Importance of, 8514–17. Mat-making and oakum-picking should not be carried on in cells where prisoners sleep, 8507–12. Need of skilled instructor at Reading in prisoner's time, 8579–81.

Associated labour advocated, 8507–18. Solitary system condemned, 8519.

Reformatory influence of present prison system nil, 8685–88.

Association. Evil effects of. Necessity for classification, 8528–29.

Habitual criminals and drunkards. Special treatment advocated, 8661–64, 8672–78.

Dietary. No special hardship arising therefrom, 8530–37. Witness's diet as a remand prisoner very poor, 8606–8.

Medical treatment satisfactory, 8538–40.

Warders. Witness's experience is that they are as a whole well selected men, 8541–43, 8636–40.

Prisoners' Aid Societies. Prisoners need a home, not money, on leaving prison. A large number of prisoners would, if they had a chance, go into the Salvation Army Home, 8592–96; and see 8661–64. Favours prisoner's gratuity being handed over to a home, 8595, 8647–49.

Literature: One book a week, a rule strictly adhered to in prisoner's experience, insufficient, 8519–23, 8527.

Chaplains: Sermons from other than the regular chaplains greatly appreciated, 8524. A change of preacher advocated, 8690. Owing perhaps to the chaplain's time being so much taken up, prisoners have very little personal dealing with him, 8659, 8690.

DAVITT, Mr. MICHAEL:

His prison experience: eight years and six months' penal servitude and six months in Irish prison as a first-class misdemeanant; was tried at the Old Bailey on charge of treason felony, and sentenced to 15 years' penal servitude; had experience as an untried prisoner of Clerkenwell House of Detention and Newgate; after sentence was at Millbank as a probationary prisoner; at Dartmoor for two years; at Portsea for six weeks; and at Dartmoor again until discharged on ticket-of-leave on December 19th, 1877. In 1881 was re-arrested and detained at Portland for 15 months, 11,185–6; as to special and harsher treatment as a Fenian prisoner see 11,331–8.

Unconvicted prisoners were harshly treated, being placed in punishment cells, denied access to newspapers and visits from friends, except in the presence of prison officials; diet being the ordinary prison diet and insufficient in quantity unless prisoner provided his own food; had two days' experience of prison diet at Newgate, but could not eat it; then prisoners were roughly handled by the police when taken from the cells to the court, 11,188–93; no evils to be feared from visits without supervision, reasonable precautions being taken against admitting unsuitable visitors, 11,270–6.

Suggested reforms: nine months' solitary confinement should be abolished, or failing this, reduced to one or two months at the beginning and the same period at the end of a sentence for first offenders, only the old offenders being sent at once to hard labour; by this means prisoners would have the benefit of such reformatory influence (visits from chaplain and schoolmaster) as could be brought to bear upon him, just before his release. Solitary punishment has an injurious effect on prisoner's stemper and bodily system, and produces insanity; several cases at Millbank during witness's nine months' experience of that prison. In 1875 or 1876 when convicts were allowed to talk at exercise and on Sunday, witness conversed with every class of criminal, and has no hesitation in saying, notwithstanding evidence given before the Committee to the contrary, that the hardened offender does not dread solitary confinement; he uses this period for malingering purposes in order to get invalided to some prison where he may escape hard manual labour, 11,197–11,201, 11,289–91, 11,311–3, 11,322–5; witness's experience of solitary confinement, 11,284–8; "the irreclaimable class who are thieves by conviction" should be kept in a separate prison; these criminals in the process of time become men of very weak intellect; treatment recommended: not long or severe punishment (does not believe in cumulative sentences), but detention (with productive labour, 11,296–9), and such treatment as experts in mental diseases and kindred ailments would suggest; similar treatment to be extended to those guilty of larceny, petty theft, &c., if over 30 years of age, 11,211–9; under 25 or 30 they might be reclaimed; not much hope for "third timers," 11,214, 11,257–8. Irreclaimable criminality a form of insanity, 11,242, see conversation with well-educated burglar at Dartmoor to bear out this view, 11,293; no belief in reclamation by punishment, 11,294–5; strongly urges the re-institution of local control and the decentralization of the present system, much of the unnecessary harshness of the present system of penal servitude due to a too centralized control; favours independent inspection of all prisons, the privilege to be extended to all Magistrates, Members of Parliament and County Councillors of visiting and reporting independently to the Home Office, 11,221–5, 11,350–2; as to punishments awarded by directors, some 16 or 18 years back, floggings at Dartmoor were very frequent and generally undeserved, 11,220: no appeal from sentence by a director; a local magistrate or justice of the peace, with concurrent authority or power to appeal to the Home Secretary to stay punishment, should be present when a case is being investigated by a director, 11,346–7. Prisoners, whether convict or local should be far more leniently treated; conversation should be allowed as a reward for good behaviour when the third class is reached after 12 months' penal servitude; hardened offenders, however, to be kept apart; a very large percentage of the convicts who go through their period of detention without punishment are of the hardened criminal class, 11,211, 11,226–34, 11,319–21. Organised systems of communication exist, but these subterfuges would in a great measure cease if present rules were relaxed, 11,268–9. Prohibition of speech absolutely indefensible; a fruitful source of offence against prison rules, and an encouragement to deceit and cunning, helping to keep in activity practices and faculties peculiar to the criminal class, 11,318; a pipe of tobacco on Sunday for prisoners in the third, second, or first class would be a wonderful inducement to good behaviour, 11,235; prisoners should be allowed to ornament their cell walls if they have the taste and ability, 11,319; favours "shorter sentences all worked out" instead of long sentences of penal servitude; the ticket-of-leave should be reserved for old offenders; it operates against the first offender to have to report to the police, and this class should work out a short sentence instead; very strong grounds for complaints against detectives; has in conversation with prisoners who have returned after a first conviction, heard frequent complaints as to not being allowed a fair chance on discharge, 11,314–5; even in the case of a third or fourth term prisoner would give governor, chaplain, and doctor power to recommend discharge without ticket given real evidence of reformation, 11,369, see also 11,374; objection to ticket-of-leave system would fall through if regulations, which are admirable, were carried out, but they are not, 11,371–3.

Reformatories. Strongly in favour of raising the age of admission to 18, and the establishment of a half-way house between the reformatory and the prison, 11,259–63.

A proper classification would remedy many existing evils, and promote the interests of order and economic management, 11,302; prisoners convicted of unnatural offences and murder, first offenders, those intellectually weak and the utterly depraved to be separately treated, 11,305–10. See witness's evidence before the Kimberley Commission in 1878, and article in the "Nineteenth Century" of December, 1894.

Treatment of insanity. Strongly urges the appointment of a higher class of medical officer (men skilled in mental diseases); many cases at Dartmoor of prisoners manifestly insane treated for insubordination, 11,301; insanity more prevalent than appears from official reports; thinks that in Irish prisons insanity has not increased to such an extent as in English prisons, the treatment being, on the whole, more humane, 11,316.

Development of prison labour would not interfere with the free industry; the views of certain trade unionists are very narrow; competition in the mat-making industry would be infinitesimal as compared with foreign labour; opposed to under-selling the product of skilled industry outside, 11,242–7; utterly opposed to treadmill and crank, 11,249.

Warders. Special cases of harshness towards prisoners at Dartmoor, 11,203, 11,326–7; strong disinclination amongst prisoners to report these cases, warders having power to refuse marks, and thus prolong sentence, 11,204–6, 11,339–40; cases reported do not furnish a fair standard of the amount of illtreatment on the part of warders, 11,341; harsh treatment of prisoners explained if training of warders, mostly old soldiers and sailors who have undergone severe discipline, is taken into account; at Dartmoor certain officers were recruited from the agricultural class, and a few were artizans, they appeared to be more considerate and humane, 11,207, 11,380; a better class of men should be induced, by increase of pay and reduction of hours of labour, to enter the service, 11,210, 11,342; hours excessively long; strongly urges the application of the eight hours' rule to warders, 11,334–4.

Education in convict prisons insufficient; the status of the schoolmaster should be improved, and he should be allowed to visit prisoners in their cells as does the chaplain; teaching should be as far as possible manual and technical, 11,250–3; advocates lectures on industries, thrift, &c., by chaplain, governor, or deputy governor, or any competent person approved by the governor, during last 12 months of sentence, 11,254; favours Sir E. Du Cane's view that music should be taught, 11,255–6. Choir practice at Dartmoor was considered a very great privilege, 11,361–4.

Prison Chaplains and Prison Services. At Dartmoor practically no reformatory influence was exercised by the chaplains; younger and more enthusiastic men required, and a change of preachers, looked forward to with much pleasure at Dartmoor, is desirable; chaplains should vary their discourses occasionally, 11,264–7; would give the fullest liberty to Nonconformist ministers to visit prisoners of that persuasion, and selected officers of the Salvation Army would do far more good with certain classes of criminals than either the Protestant or Roman Catholic chaplains, 11,281–3.

Prisoners' Aid Societies. Has no knowledge of the working of these societies, but the prisoners' views, gathered in conversation, are not favourable; they say the societies are too much under the control of Scotland Yard, 1278.

DU CANE, Sir E. F., K.C.B., R.E.:

Chairman of Commissioners of Prisons, and Directors of Convict Prisons, and Surveyor-General of Prisons, 10,764.

Statement of the various steps taken in fixing the staff of local prisons since their transfer, 10,765; warders bear a certain per-centage to officers, but allowances are made for the special circumstances of particular prisons; so too with medical staff, 10,776–83; female prisoners probably require more individual treatment than the men, and therefore larger staff, 10,766, 10,767; sleeping in to answer bells is not reckoned as night duty either for male or female officers, 10,768–71.

No reason to suppose medical staff is not up to the mark for dealing with mental cases, 10,772; epileptic and weak-minded criminals might be concentrated under a specialist, if numerous enough, and the best way to deal with all whose weak-mindedness leads them into crime would be to keep them permanently under control, a step for which public opinion is not prepared, 10,773–75, 10,923, 10,951.

A prison of 1,200 not too large given the assistance of a deputy governor; a governor not to be expected to take the same intimate personal part in the management of individual prisoners as the manager of a reformatory, 10,784–86.

As to deputy governors, prison population of 700 a good enough standard, 10,787–89; as to extra responsibility of having women prisoners, it must be borne in mind that in the matron the governor has a deputy, 10,790–92; governors are allowed discretion as to how they share work with their deputy, 10,793, 10,794; system of deputy governors useful for training up governors, 10,795, 10,796, 10,802.

Proposal to have training prisons for warders attractive, but there are difficulties, e.g., the expense of moving the warders up to and down from their probationary stage, especially where you are dealing with married men, 10,797–801.

Approves of system of chief warders in charge, a reward for efficient service which he would be prepared to extend to the clerks; in future it will be a practicable economy for the officer in charge of small prisons to be also in charge of stores and do the ordinary clerical work himself, 10,803; does not attach much importance to the wearing of uniform, nor to the retention of the title "chief warder in charge," 10,804.

No ground whatever for Mr. Morrison's charge that convict officers have been unduly favoured as compared with local officers; out of 25 appointments since 1877, 23 have gone to local prison chief warders, 10,806–8; object now is, and rightly, to amalgamate the local and convict prison services, 10,809, 10,810.

Keeping of convicts for nine months in local prisons no new thing; was contemplated when Pentonville was established in 1842 as a model cellular prison for convicts prior to transportation; the nine months' separate confinement practically a necessary preliminary to the milder atmosphere of a public works prison; there is economy in selecting 10 or 12 local prisons as collecting prisons in which this first stage shall be passed, and, given efficient governors, there is no difficulty in managing both convict and local prisoners, 10,811–24.

The crank, treadwheel, &c. a painful necessity until some other form of first-class hard labour equally penal can be invented; regimen in this respect is less severe than 16 years ago, and when the best has been said all punishment is unnatural, 10,825–33; treadwheel and crank do not exist in France or Switzerland, 10,845, 10,846.

Prefers the cellular system to that of association; that the former is better is the experience of all countries; cases of convicts and local prisoners different; latter discharged in batches, former in driblets; latter in their own locality, former all over the country; latter under short, former under long sentences; labour in associated workshops only advisable when prisoners have served some time, and masses of local prisoners are only in for periods up to three weeks, 10,834–44; the present system has been so far deterrent that of those who once enter prison two-thirds do not come back, 10,841, 10,842.

Approves of No. 1 diet quâ punishment; it is controlled by the medical officer, 10,847–49.

As to whether the diet for convicts is sufficient, two Royal Commissions on which there were doctors investigated it, and have been satisfied; modifications on medical grounds may always be allowed, 10,850–55

Is satisfied with unconvicted prisoners' treatment as to diet; the diet is not a penal one, the food is adequate, and it may be modified to any reasonable extent by the prisoner's own action, 10,856–70.

Statement of the position and powers of the visiting committees; it is inconsistent with their position under the Act that they should take part in the management of the prisons, make contracts for supplies, &c., but they have really almost as much power as they had if they care to use it; they are independent judges to whom any prisoner may complain, and the whole life of the prison is open to their criticism, 10,871–74.

Thinks it would be detrimental to allow more than one aid society access inside a prison; there should not be more than one accredited channel of communication between the prisoner and rescue agencies; let the prisoner if he likes select the agency he prefers, and let the recognised aid society of the prison communicate with that agency; individual agencies, such as the Salvation Army, do good, no doubt, but competition for a prisoner's favours is bad, 10,875–96; case of Mr. Wheatley, of the St. Giles' Christian Mission, from whom the privilege of standing under an archway was taken away because the Salvation Army claimed to have the same privilege, 10,899, 10,900.

No objection to extending privileges of letters and visits in case of well-conducted prisoners, so long as "marks" system is not interfered with; the discretion as to special cases might be left to governor or visiting committee; not prepared to draw a distinction between letters and visits, 10,897–901; as to Sunday privileges, is strongly against food privileges, a low form of reward, 10,902, 10,903; doubts if the loss of exercise on Sunday is a serious one; medical advisers were consulted before Sunday exercise was abolished in order to allow warders a Sunday off, and did not object on medical grounds; so long as the prisoners have books there is nothing terrible in their being kept in on Sundays; if Sunday exercise were instituted it would necessitate increase of staff, 10,904–13.

Parkhurst Reformatory was a farm establishment for juveniles sentenced to long terms; it was not a failure, but died out in consequence of the establishment of reformatories all over the country under the Act of 1863, 10,914–18.

Prefers to leave reformatories in the hands of voluntary agencies, but no reason why a Government reformatory should not be successful, 10,919, 10,920; doubtful about advisability of raising age for reformatories from 16 to 18; age a very uncertain test; but a special reformatory on the Parkhurst lines for the older and bad lads a good idea, 10,936–38; figures to show large proportion of criminals between 16 and 21 years of age, 10,939, 10,940; to young offenders a long sentence to a reformatory might be more deterrent than a short sentence to prison, 10,941, 10,942; to the Government or penal reformatory might be transferred, on a magistrate's order, boys who could not be coped with by the voluntary agency, 10,943–45.

As to classification, there are at present kept separate in local prisons juveniles, debtors, first-class misdemeanants, and those awaiting trial, 10,921, 10,922; advisable to extend classification to mentally weak, 10,773–75, 10,923, 10,951; and habitual drunkards who need special treatment, 10,924–35.

Thinks habitual or frequent offenders should be more severely treated than those who have been only once or twice guilty, but prefers to leave such severity to the discretion of a judge than to have a mechanical system of cumulative sentences, or the indeterminate sentence implying there is somebody who has the power of telling when a man is reformed, which person does not exist, 10,946–49; an intermediate prison must after all be a prison, 10,950.

While classification might by concentration aid the solution of the problem of prison labour, the main difficulties, the finding of work and short sentences, remain, 10,952–67; organisation for prison labour under present system the Board primarily responsible, then Mr. Duncan, store accountant, and Mr. Whiteley, who looks after the manufacturing business, 10,960–66.

Criminals drawn from a class mentally, morally, and physically below average of population, therefore higher ratio of insanity naturally to be expected, 10,968–72; doubts whether separate system increases any morbid predisposition; Dr. Gover's figures tend to show that insanity rate diminishes the longer prisoners' stay in prison, 10,973–82; power and duty of medical officer to modify system where any suspicion of mental unsoundness, 10,983; medical officers of large prisons might be required to have some special training in lunacy, but there are difficulties in carrying out the proposal in practice, 10,983–87.

Describes present method of appointment of medical officers and their salaries, 10,988–92.

Has always understood that the health of prisoners is creditable; Parkhurst is the invalid prison for convicts, though there are a few at Dartmoor, 10,993–99.

Save in cases recommended by medical officer, hopes there will be no change in salutary rule of nine months' separate confinement for convicts, 11,000.

Besides case of "J. E.," apparently sentenced by the visiting committee to an illegal punishment, which, however, was never carried out, recollects a case of illegally placing in irons, to prevent recurrence of which Secretary of State was asked to make a rule, 11,001–5.

Regular Board meetings not often held, since they are not often required; system works automatically, 11,005–8.

Thinks it a good thing for prisoners to be preached to by outside clergy now and then; also in favour of lectures to prisoners, and music and singing where any aptitude is shown, 11,009–14.

As to schooling it was found that the teaching of prisoners in class led to abuses, hence education has been cellular; with compulsory education outside there cannot be so much need now for education in prison, 11,015; thinks it advisable that schoolmasters should be uniformed officers, a practice copied from that which obtained in local prisons before the transfer, 11,016.

ANALYSIS.

Advantage in female prison being governed by a medical officer, 11,017.

In favour of lady visitors who may exercise a moral influence over women in prison, and help them when they come out; plan has been adopted in local prisons, but did not work well in convict prisons, 11,020, 11,021.

As to over-crowding in female reception cells, e.g., Strangeways, this is a matter which largely depends on organising power of governors, 11,021*a*–23.

Removals from one prison to another cannot be effected without Secretary of State's warrant, but there should be no difficulty with proper foresight; it would save the Secretary of State much trouble if Commissioners could sign the warrants, 11,024–26.

Not in favour of homes on the intermediate system; if the association of criminals in common lodging-houses be dreaded, regulated homes perhaps the less of two evils, 11,027–29.

DUNCAN, JAMES.

Store Accountant in Prison Department of Home Office since 1889. From 1877–87 engaged in establishing system of book-keeping for local prisons. Visited prisons, reporting to Government as to amounts, trade, &c. Prior to 1877 was for many years steward and manufacturer at Pentonville, with duties very similar to those of present storekeeper. For 39 years connected with prison industries, 4322–30.

Under old system of prison labour administration remunerative occupation held a prominent place, though in a few prisons penal labour predominated. Governors and other officers encouraged by bonuses and other payments to take an active interest in trade. Trade profits taken largely into account by visiting justices when dealing with applications for increase of pay, 4331–3. For sale of goods a commercial traveller was appointed. Trade managers controlled industrial department. Deserving prisoners were rewarded by gratuities and in other ways, 4331–5. In many prisons the inmates not sentenced to hard labour, or who were excused hard labour by medical officer, were employed in industrial pursuits instead of as now being confined to their cells for the first month. This practice might be resumed in a modified form, 4340–1. Total earnings in local prisons for year ending 30th September 1876 111,710*l.* 12*s.*, an average of 5*l.* 18*s.* per man. Average earnings of mat makers at Preston 18*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.* per man, and of laundry women 22*l.* 5*s.*, 4336–8. Mat making was probably the most suitable as well as the most flourishing of all prison industries. 2,800 prisoners so employed when prisons were taken over, 4351: about 70 now employed. When agitation outside first arose prison mat makers exceeded by 23·87 per cent. the number given in the Census Returns as employed outside, 11,809–13. At one time 5*l.* or 6*l.* profit per ton was made by oakum picking; now it is difficult to make both ends meet; but at the present moment there is a slight improvement. Great exertions are being made to find alternative forms of labour, 4352–60. Industries existing before the transfer supplemented in an important degree by the introduction of manufacture of articles for prison use, 4342–50.

For number of prisoners employed in various trades in 1876 and in 1893–4, see Appendix IV.

Explanation of these figures under the different heads:—

(1.) Basket, brush, and broom makers have increased from 39 to 221. Increase entirely due to Government orders, 4362–4.

(2.) Bookbinders. Figures, 22 and 1 respectively, do not point to employment having died out. The drop is more apparent than real, and is due to classification, for at present there are four large centres for this industry, which is carried on to a large extent for the Prison Department, but not for other Government Departments, 4365–8.

(3.) Gardeners and labourers, 135 and 70. Decrease attributed to larger number of prisons in 1876. At present time, 38 out of total number 56, have garden ground in cultivation. This number could probably be increased. Advocates this form of employment, 4369–72. Total area under cultivation at local prisons, 43a. 1r. 35p., 4,465–6.

(4.) Mat and matting weavers, 2,283 and 186. Believes that all or nearly all the mats supplied for Government use are of prison make, 4373–4, 4454–8. No harmful effect on outside manufacture, 4473. Importation of foreign made mats increasing in face of prison and outside manufacture, 4476.

(5.) Shoemakers, 313 and 50. Classification again accounts for reduced numbers. Prior to 1877, boots were made for prison use and for sale outside, now for prison use only. Shoes for postmen were formerly made at Pentonville. Something might be done to increase this branch of industry, 4375–83.

(6.) Stone-breakers, 404 and 49. Stone crushing by steam a factor in this decrease, also abolition of this form of labour at certain prisons, 4384–5.

(7.) Tailors, 289 and 213. Decrease due to fall in number of prisoners and to classification. Governors report too a falling off in the industrial qualities of prisoners, 4386–9. Warders' clothes were formerly made in prison. System abolished owing to irregularities, 4493–5.

(8.) Non-effective, sick, debtors, those awaiting trial and under punishment, 2,107 and 3,114. Difference largely due to classification. Some of the 3,114 could be brought into industrial labour with profit, 4390–4.

Government departments (the large providing departments) of late far more accessible. The Post Office the department most ready to help; but War Office and Admiralty now assisting in every possible way, 4395. Work done for these departments and for Board of Trade explained, 4397. Prisoners employed in manufacturing for War Office, 28; Admiralty, 289; Office of Works, 16; Post Office, 624; if skilled instruction were provided an immense extension of work for War Office and Admiralty would result, 4398. List of additional articles which could be supplied to Office of Works, 4400. In favour of a furniture department, 4402. Believes that enough work could be found in Government departments for the whole prison population if facilities existed for instructing prisoners in workshops, 4463–4.

The question of the valuation of labour has been for some time under consideration, 4522. Explains cessation of Admiralty coal sack making at Lewes a few years back. The prison now undertakes the work again, an order for 1,000 sacks having recently been given. Very large order for coal sacks, hammocks, &c., (154,910 articles in all) lately received from the Admiralty. Excellent work done at Reading. Output of sacks increased from 1,000 to 8,000 a year, 11,814–5.

Prisoners available for trades. Of the total prison population, 3,825 are on first-class hard labour; 3,261 are non-effective; domestic service engages 2,450; and 35 per cent. or 5,077 remain, of which number it is already possible to employ 3,004. A proportion of the residue, 2,073 (classed as oakum pickers) would under improved system, be taken for industrial pursuits, and the output of the 3,004 would be increased, still there would be no ground for agitation as the increased interference with outside labour would amount only to ·04 per cent., 4462, 4478–81, 4482–4. Or, taking into account the fact that the amount of work done by a prisoner is much less than that performed by a free workman, ·02 per cent., or 1 in 5,000 workers would be the more reliable figures. These figures refer only to the particular trades proposed to be increased, the addition to the present number of workers being estimated at 1,100. Estimates the total present interference with outside labour at ·053 per cent., or 1 prisoner to every 1,886 free workmen; the total interference after proposed increase of prison workers would be ·063 per cent., or 1 to every 1,587. See 11,799–808.

An extension of workshops with necessary instructing officers would, he believes, in spite of heavy outlay, prove very nearly, if not quite, a financial success. As regards workshops, Wandsworth might be taken as a model, 4435–40. Skilled officers should receive extra pay, and the ordinary warder encouraged to take an interest in trade with a view to promotion, 4444–47. Favours revival of trade gratuities to prisoners, 4459–60. Any unfairness, so far as prisoners on domestic work are concerned, might be met by granting rewards, 4504. The prison most likely to prove self-supporting would be one for female prisoners engaged in laundry work, 4496–4503. Few instructing officers since transfer, and officers not so highly qualified as prior to 1877. No incentive, 4403–5. Improved industrial system would leave no ground for agitation, as the per-centage of increased interference with outside labour would amount only to ·04, 4482–4; or, taking the labour of a prisoner to be half that of a free workman, ·02 per cent., or 1 in 5,000 workers, 11,862. (See under Prisoners available for Trades.)

Present system of contracts for making list slippers and rugs, coir brushes, and for oakum picking. Contractors supply material, but are not allowed in prison to supervise work, 4414–21.

The number of short sentence prisoners (48 per cent. in 1893–4) hampers industrial progress. Then there is the large class (22 per cent. in March 1894) of sick prisoners under punishment; untried prisoners, &c.; who are unavailable for labour and those on first-class hard labour, comparatively speaking unremunerative work, 4406–8.

Prison labour: Productive labour beneficial; does not attach much importance to strict isolation in regard to the work of prisons, 4423–4. Strongly in favour of a substitute for the treadwheel, 4426–7. Oakum picking should be strictly confined to penal purposes; it is viewed by prisoners as a degrading form of occupation, and an alternative form of employment is being sought for, 4428–34. Long-term prisoners, the more readily trained, should be kept together in convenient prisons. Short-term prisoners might be engaged in gardening and mat making, which can be learnt in seven or eight days, 4448–53. No case of a prison proving self-supporting, 4477. Convicts in convict prisons to the number of 700 employed on work for Government departments (hammock and coal sack making for the Admiralty, for instance), which would be a boon to local prisons, if work in quarries could be found for the convicts, 4472. Laundry work the most profitable industry for women; 20*l.* a head made at Strangeways in 1894, 4496–7. Hammock making introduced into local prisons in the last year or two, 4531; rough estimate of value of prison labour, 117,000*l.*, 4536–7.

For (1) particulars as to employment of prison population, and (2) regulations with regard to task work and value of labour, see Appendix IV.

E——, Mr., Boot and Shoe Maker (ex-convict), 9575, 9576.

Record of convictions:—(1) 12 months at Springfield when 16 years of age for stealing wearing apparel (his first offence); on discharge obtains work only to lose it when it is known that he has been in prison. Eight or nine minor offences follow, ending (2) with seven years penal servitude at Portland for housebreaking. Some five or six offences on discharge, then (3) eight years penal servitude at Woking for attempt to rob a house; and (4) after again breaking the law is taken with a jemmy in his possession and sentenced to 10 years penal servitude at Portsmouth, followed by seven years supervision. Serves seven and a half years. Is helped by "Salvation Army" on discharge, 9577–9600, 9698–9707, 9762, 9763.

Always experienced serious difficulty in getting work, 9601, 9591, 9600.

Police supervision, demoralising effect of, 9603, 9604, 9685–96.

Habitual criminals. Is sure 80 per cent.; perhaps even 90 per cent., would work if they could obtain employment, 9607; only way to reclaim 10 per cent. hardened criminals is to keep them from their old associates, 9617; treatment recommended for hardened criminal who with, say, six convictions and intervals of crime is convicted a seventh time, three or four years in a local prison; monotony much dreaded, and worse punishment than convict prison, 9615; favours suggestion of half-way house between convict prison and liberty; if Government establishment were set up the men would voluntarily enter, 9618, 9619.

Classification of prisoners. Present system of first, second, and third class unsatisfactory; convicts should be separated according to their moral character; some of the best behaved in prison are the worst characters outside; such are aided in avoiding offences by better education or fuller knowledge of prison disciplines; certain ignorant convicts unable to meet officers' wishes lose thereby the whole of their remission, 9674–7, 9772–7; young prisoners might be kept apart and allowed to converse at exercise, 9778, 9740–50.

Separate confinement. Advocates absolute separate confinement or none at all; nine months useless; the public works stage throws a man back morally and physically, 9741–50.

Advocates three or four years in local prison as alternative to 10 years penal servitude, with two hours exercise a day and occasional permission to talk at exercise, 9746–54; six, or perhaps four years cellular confinement should be the longest term; evils of association avoided, 9764–71.

Prison punishments. Four cases of suicide at Portsmouth attributed to severity of punishment, 9660, 9661, 9726–38; also cases of malingering at Chatham and Portland, 9664, 9755–61; punishments for speaking, three or four a day at Portsmouth; talking when necessary at work sometimes leads to punishment; convict entirely at mercy of officer, 9719–23; punishments at Portsmouth for not keeping step when going to chapel, 9640–2. "Dietary punishment," see "Convict Prison Diet."

Convict prison rules so minute that prisoner can hardly fail to infringe them, 9638, 9639; mental and nervous condition suffer in effort to earn remission, 9739; rules as to speaking too harsh; convicts should be allowed to converse at recreation on Sundays, 9656–58; talking without punishment due to lenient officer, 9764; it should be possible to earn money until discharge, 9678–80.

Convict prison diet. Sufficient in case of sedentary employment, but not for men on the works, 9625–30; dietary punishment of men in quarries of 1 lb. of bread a day with water, too severe, 9631–6, 9708–10; sentence of 28 days bread and water by director (governor cannot punish with more than three days) for threatening officer at Portsmouth, 9711–7; men on public works lose weight unless allowed extra diet, 9745.

Industrial work good for prisoners, but no man on leaving prison qualified for high-class work; cannot compete with outside public; knows of cases, however, of work learned in prison proving useful, 9670–72.

Prisoners' Aid Societies satisfactorily distribute money earnt, 9678–84; powerless to aid habitual criminal, 9602.

Mental or nervous deterioration in consequence of imprisonment due to minuteness of rules, 9739; and to change from separate confinement to public works, 9740–44.

Warders. Individual officers prejudiced against individual prisoners, 9724, 9725; ill-treatment of prisoners by warders at Portsmouth and Woking, 9650–53; some warders little-minded and uneducated, 9649; killed by convicts, 9653–5.

Cell accommodation at Portland and Portsmouth. Cells too small, convicts suffer from cold in winter, vitiated atmosphere in summer. At Woking, cells large, 9643–47.

Suicide. Four cases at Portsmouth, attributed to severity of punishment, 9660–61, 9726–38.

Medical supervision unsatisfactory at Portsmouth and Woking, 9659–60, 9662.

Malingering he believes to be due to severity of punishment; instances at Chatham and Portland, 9664, 9755–61.

Civil guard. Prisoners not brought into contact with, 9665.

Long-term sentences. Hardship and demoralising effect of, 9597, 9608–13.

"Salvation Army." Improving effect of discipline at the home, 9669.

FRY, Miss:

Honorary Secretary to the "Elizabeth Fry Refuge" for past 10 years, 5454–5.

Refuge started in memory of Mrs. Elizabeth Fry; has been in existence nearly 50 years; female prisoners (but not of the lowest class) received, principally from Holloway, and are kept about six months; any period above six months exceptional; a year's detention would give the authorities a chance to make respectable servant girls of the inmates. A gratuity of 1*l.* is received from the State with each woman; 32 can be received and as a rule the refuge is full; age of reception, 16–40, 5456–60, 5507–10, 5557–62. Of late years, other cases failing, remand cases (first offenders charged with petty theft as a rule and drunk and disorderly women), have been brought from the police courts. In 1893 of 91 cases 28 were of this class; they are very troublesome in the home, and when they go out to service; only four of the 28 have done well. After a term of imprisonment the women get on better. Drink perhaps has accounted for one half of the 91 cases; 56 are looked upon as hopeful, 27 doubtful, and of 8 nothing is known. Of the 91 women 61 were imprisoned for theft. The home is purely voluntary, except so far as the remand class is concerned; remand cases are not as a rule bound over in any recognisances, 5461–8, 5563–89, 5616–20. As a rule the women received are not of good constitution (impoverished by prison diet), 56,223–30, and voluntarily stay in the home for the whole period of six months, 5663–7; one of the drawbacks is that there are no compulsory powers of detention; this should be altered, 5669–70; women should be sent to a home for a given period, and should be liable to be brought before the court again, 5672–3.

ANALYSIS.

Excellent matron at the refuge to whom the women become attached; discipline not disagreeable; rewards granted at end of a year if situations are retained and character good, 5472; given state aid would recommend extension of the home which is looked upon by the chaplain at Holloway as one of the first refuges, 5474; but home sufficiently large for one matron if a real influence is to be exercised over the women, 5643–7; women from the refuge are favourites with a certain class who, anxious to help in philanthropic work, keep one servant, 5473. The first imprisonment no disadvantage to a woman who goes into service. If after a year she does well and enters another family the new employer is not informed of prison record of servant, 5648–53. Of the convicts sent to the home for nine months before being set at large some have done well. The presence of convicts has an evil influence on the other women, 5475. No convicts at present; have had cases not suited to the home, and have raised objection, 5501–3. Has heard no complaint from convicts with three years' sentence that they are debarred the benefit of a home, 5504–6.

The first imprisonment (the disgrace of being in prison, prison discipline, and diet) has a wholesome effect, except in the case of low women. Not in favour of the First Offenders Act, 5469, 5514–6, 5595–5604, 5631–4; thinks Mr. Trevarthen of Redhill Reformatory is right when he expresses himself anxious that all boys sent to him should have been purged by imprisonment, 5469.

Of the drunkards, not one in 20 reforms, 5469. There should be a home for habitual drunkards, which ought to a certain extent to prove self-supporting, laundry and needlework being remunerative occupations; period of detention two years, 5476–9, 5533–4; see also 5611–4; short sentences for this class futile, 5593–4.

Religious worship at the refuge undenominational. Enjoy benefit of the services of a City missionary, the clergyman of the parish and his curates, and of a lay reader; daily prayers by the matron. There should be a Scripture reader at large prisons like Holloway, in addition to the Chaplain, 5517–24.

Weekly committee meeting at the refuge; a good practical working committee composed of ladies, 5699–62.

Medical supervision. A certificate is furnished with women from Holloway to the effect that they are free from disease, and a medical man attends the home once a week and sees every new arrival; women are sent to London Hospital as out-patients, 5674–5.

Work, meals, and recreation. Laundry and needle work, cooking, and housework generally; the women make every article of dress used in the home, and outfits supplied when leaving for service. Most go to domestic service in London; house work especially useful, laundry work in so far as it takes the women to the public laundries has a bad effect, 5481–9, 5529–32; no lack of work, 5537–8; breakfast at 8, work ceases at 6, an occasional extra hour in laundry when work presses; reading and writing is taught to the needle workers, work being interrupted for this purpose; an hour in the garden after dinner; read to in the evening, 5541–52, 5637–40. Good ordinary diet such as a general servant would receive; a good dinner each day; tea and coffee for breakfast, with bread and butter, 5635–6; women improved physically on leaving, 5641; women never allowed outside the gates, excepting one occasionally sent to the post; to allow women out for a day would be a dangerous experiment, 5490–5500.

REYNOLDS, MISS:

Co-Secretary with Miss Fry, whose duty it is to see the women outside, concurs with, and entirely endorses, Miss Fry's remarks as to the "remand" cases. They do very badly in service, 5676–7.

GARSIA, COLONEL, M. C.:

Secretary to Prisons Board and Inspector; 17 years in prison service as deputy governor of various prisons, and, in 1891, secretary to Departmental Committee on Prison Officers' Grievances, 6393–4.

Duties as secretary to board, 6395, 6616–23.

Duties as inspector, 6396–7.

There are four inspectors who relieve Commissioners by their visits of inspection, and reports; they hear prisoners' grievances, grant extra letters, &c. but have no executive power, though their being in touch with the Commissioners gives their suggestions some of the force of an order, 6398–404. Some danger of inspection becoming perfunctory owing to permanence of districts, 6405, 6520–5.

In favour of encouraging visiting justices, much of whose work is similar to that of inspectors; section 14 of the Act of 1877 gives them great powers if they would only use them; good might be done by giving them more direct responsibility, e.g., recommending candidates for prison offices, though final appointment should rest with central authority, 6406–13, 6744; at present the visiting justices, as indeed governors, are not informed of the visits of inspectors and commissioners, 6517–9; admits that the present powers of the visiting committee are mainly judicial rather than administrative, but they have a free hand to criticise, 6558–69, 6745–7.

Cannot admit that the visiting committees could replace the inspectors altogether, 6743–55. Home Office letter to the Strangeways Visiting Committee in 1879, the purport of which was communicated to other visiting committees, did not result in any marked increase of zeal in the performance of the duties imposed on the committees and individual justices by the Act of 1877, 11,651–9. Visiting justices have no power to relax regulations as regards letters, but can extend the duration of a visit. Prison Commissioners have recently issued a Standing Order, No. 228 (see Appendix V.) giving governors increased powers as to extra letters and visits, 11,681–4.

Medical inspector does not pay periodical visits, which would, perhaps, be an advantage, 6414–7.

As to prisoners' complaints, describes the facilities given for making them in both convict and local prisons; does not see how better facilities could possibly be given, 6418.

Prison labour. Has strong views as to the advantage of. Cites case of Wormwood Scrubs which was built by convicts, and is a record of prison labour, 6419–20. Not afraid of contamination resulting from associated labour if you have classification and supervision, 6421–3, 6426. The convicts who built Wormwood Scrubs were trained by skilled instructors, 6424–5. Store accountant at Home Office responsible, under the Board, for the direction of prison industries, 6427–32. Care should be taken in distributing work suitable for the long and short-sentence prisoners; this would be facilitated by a more systematic grouping of prisoners, 6433–8. A store depôt would secure greater punctuality in the execution of prison orders, 6439–42. As regards female labour approves of laundry work as carried on at Strangeways, which might well be imitated elsewhere; in selection of work range is limited, but the prisoners' wishes largely consulted; unable to state what general principles guide the Commissioners in the matter, 6535–45.

Before 1877 when prison labour was supervised by the justices admits there may have been more work for prisoners, but statements to this effect generally exaggerated, 6570–6. Describes steps taken by Prisons Board to get work mainly from government departments, 6577–8. If sack-making taken away from Lewes it was a temporary measure, 6579. No difficulty in setting convicts and long sentence prisoners to work on public works, 6581–3; printing as at Parkhurst, 6584–6; bootmaking, 6587–91; no lack of work for convicts at the present time, 6592. Facilities for indoor work for short sentence prisoners what is wanted, 6593.

Not in favour of allowing prisoners to earn premiums, but they should be allowed to earn better gratuities than now, 6760–1. A prisoner in the infirmary would not earn the gratuity of 10*s.* this is a hardship; but a check must be put upon malingering. Witness favours very liberal consideration being given to these cases on medical recommendation, 11,690–3.

Difficulties in the way of extra payments to artizan warders, 6762–3.

Industrial employment for prisoners from the time they enter prison strongly advocated. Hard labour prisoners should at once be put to work at their own trades; task work, 11,676–9; 11,759–61.

Gratuities to Prisoners' Aid Societies and Homes. Government grant reduced in 1888 to 1,500*l.* Advocates increase of grant and a new and more equitable method of distribution according to the work done by the different societies, 11,703–10. As to circular having reference to "Assistance to Prisoners on Discharge" which the Surrey Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society objected to being posted in prison. (See Captain Schuyler's Evidence, 2576.) For regulations governing Prisoners' Aid Societies and the Government grant, see Appendix V.

Thinks governor possesses quite sufficient power of punishment; the right system is to give a prisoner the minimum punishment, not with regard to the offence, but to deter other prisoners from doing the the same thing, 6443.

Wormwood Scrubs outbreak. Rebuts evidence of Captain Schuyler and Mr. Morrison; there were not 2 outbreaks, the outbreak which occurred has been greatly exaggerated, it was not due to cruel treatment of the prisoners; Captain Schuyler went in command of the prison with but three months experience of prison service, discipline was relaxed and the prisoners got out of hand; the real origin of the disturbance was relaxed discipline and the grievances of certain convicts who were discontented with their treatment in a local prison 6444–6, 6594–6606; hands in abstract of punishments inflicted during the 7 days he was in charge before the outbreak; calls attention to an instance of insufficient punishment awarded by Captain Schuyler (who ought by law to have referred the case to the visiting Justices) to a prisoner guilty of violence to an officer, 6447–8, 6595–8.

Case of local prisoner, "J. E."; he was an incorrigible prisoner, who had previously done a sentence of penal servitude; he was not inhumanly punished, but forced the visiting committee to punish him by his conduct; he assaulted an officer, and becoming a marked man witness recommended his transfer to Wandsworth, where he might have a fresh chance; he was discharged from Wormwood Scrubs and received at Wandsworth in good health, 6448–52, 6599, 6600; goes in detail into the career of "J. E." at Wormwood Scrubs; if he had a heavy record of punishment his was a heavy record of offence, 6659–84, 6693–6. This prisoner had nothing whatever to do with the outbreak at Wormwood Scrubs, which was confined to convicts, 6446–8, 6453, 6698–6701; nor was the outbreak due to young officers, for those in charge of the convicts were selected officers, 6453. Witness explains that prisoner was not sentenced to 42 days in a punishment cell, as has been stated, but to 42 days crank labour on No. 3 diet. "P. Cell," meaning "Penal Cell," was afterwards added. This would be a cell fitted with the crank, 11,742–5. No such thing at Wormwood Scrubs as a certified punishment cell, which means a semi-dark cell devoid of any appliances for labour, or even of furniture, in which a prisoner is shut up, in a state of idleness, deprived of exercise, deprived of going to chapel, and kept in close confinement, 11,730–8.

Does not see much advantage in keeping convicts for their nine months' separate confinement in a local prison, but with an intelligent governor there can be no harm, and the plan is economical, 6454–9, 6510–13, 6631–8.

Would make two or three large prisons training schools for warders, 6460–2. Same plan would work well for deputy-governors; it did obtain, so long as Millbank existed, 6463–6. Practice of employing temporary officers virtually at an end, as regards male staff, save in very exceptional cases, 6467. Male staff generally is adequate, 6468, 6471; Holloway staff in particular is adequate, 6719–23. And their hours (the subject of Lord De Ramsay's recent committee) reasonable, 6607–9. Female staff requires looking into, 6469. Admits a block of promotion generally, but not that it is due to the closing of prisons, most of those closed being small, and promotion having now a wider scope than formerly, 6702–12. As to apparent discrepancy between actual staff and staff estimated for, 6470.

Trafficking between warders and prisoners' friends does exist, but not to any great extent, 6472–3. On the whole satisfied with the class of men got as warders, 6474. And their hours are fair, 6475–7.

With regard to classification in favour of extension of star class to local prisons, 6478, 6500, 1.

Short sentences of no use to reform habitual criminals; in favour of cumulative sentences, 6479–80.

If you raise age for admission to reformatories up to 18, you must have classification, so as to separate the older lads from young boys, 6481–3.

GARSIA, Colonel M. C.—cont. Analysis.

Weak-minded prisoners come from the great towns mostly, 6437–9.

If you find openings for industrial employment, and induce the visiting committees to take a greater interest in prisons, cannot see in what direction system requires greater elasticity; there is great advantage in there being distinct rules which governor and prisoners alike can count upon, discretionary powers, e.g. as to letters and visits, are better vested in the visiting committee, 6490–5. There has perhaps been less differential treatment since 1877, but the great danger in trying it is that you create feeling there is one law for the rich and another for the poor; imprisonment is and must remain unequal in its operation; blame the legislature not the prison administration, 6607–15. As regards the sentences inflicted by visiting committees to punishment cells, agrees that this punishment should at once be stopped if prisoner shows signs of repentance, but the Governor should not have discretionary power to remove prisoners from the punishment cells even provisionally, but should communicate with the chairman of the committee with whom he is in constant touch, 11,666–71. He has this power now, but ought to exercise it more than he does, 11,755–8.

Opposed to treadwheel, which involves premature association of prisoners, and is not deterrent, 6502. Explains cases in which prisoners are kept to No. 1 hard labour beyond the statutory period, 11,672–5.

Sees no special hardship in plank beds, 6503–5.

Thinks that such debtors as are now committed to prison should be treated as ordinary prisoners, 6506–7.

There would be great advantage in bringing into prison chapels outside preachers occasionally, 6509–9.

In favour of chief warders in charge wearing uniform, 6514–6.

Admits deficiency of accommodation in female reception cells in certain cases; this a defect which ought to be set right, 6526–9. At chapel too, e.g., Wormwood Scrubs, the women are sometimes placed too close together; the remedy is either increased accommodation, or to let them attend half at a time, 6530–4.

In favour of lady visitors under proper regulations to avoid interference with matron and chaplain, and the carrying of messages which would break down the marks system, 6546–51.

Does not think it necessary to have more than one convict prison for females simply in order to secure possibility of change; convict discipline is very uniform, and two prisons would mean money, 6552–7.

Habitual criminals register is superintended by Sir E. Du Cane, who draws an allowance of 100*l.* in connexion with it, 6624–30.

Would sentence a man to deprivation of chapel, not as a punishment but as a preventive measure in cases where the prisoner misbehaves himself in chapel, 6639–41; questioned whether a governor has power to keep a prisoner from chapel, witness states that the Commissioners are so empowered and in most cases delegate their responsibilities in this respect to the governors, 11,741; witness's views as to the construction to be placed upon Rule 46 of the First Schedule of the Act of 1865 which dispenses under certain circumstances with the obligation imposed upon a prisoner to attend at chapel, 11,770–6; most Catholic convicts go to service every day; the fact there is not daily Catholic service in all local prisons where they are confined is engaging the attention of the Board, 6642–6; has not heard that Catholics represent themselves to be Protestants in order to get daily service, but has heard the converse, the object being to get under a governor who was supposed to be milder, 6647–8.

As to over-crowding it is the governor's duty to report when he expects to have too many prisoners in time to get some transferred; if there was actual overcrowding at Wandsworth the governor was to blame, although an excellent officer, 6649–58; see also 11,748; present system of weekly returns as to accommodation explained; an estimate of the number of prisoners likely to be received in the following week might be included in these returns but what witness favours is a distinct order to the governors binding them to send in a demand for the removal of prisoners, 11,779–89.

Admits that Newcastle is a bad prison, accommodation being inadequate as regards space, but Government was practically forced to take it over from the local authority, and the building of a new prison is now under consideration, 6724–32, 11,721–6.

Analysis.

Return of re-convictions at three decennial periods, designed to show whether the prison system is or is not deterrent, 6733–43.

On the subject of prison punishment, points out the impossibility of instituting a reliable comparison between one prison and another, the classes of inmates differ, and so do the classes of punishments —cumulative in some prisons, not in others, 6685–92, 6756–9. No reason why the inspectors should not certify that they have examined the punishment book; they virtually do this now. Witness explains the perfect system of check on the governor that prison punishments are strictly correct, adequate, and legal. This system obtains in every convict prison, and in local prisons as regards convict. The same system should be extended to the local prisons, 11,747, 11,777–8.

Not in favour of allowing well-conducted prisoners to earn sums which they might expend on luxuries, 6767.

Thinks that long-sentence local prisoners ought to be able to earn some remission of sentence; at present, a three year convict is better off than a two year local prisoner, 6768–70.

Visits to prisoners. Cannot agree with Captain Johnson that a prisoner having earned a visit should have that visit whether he be under punishment or not. Explains present practice, 11,727–9, and see 11,762–4.

Captain Schuyler (see Question 2530) refers to the form "L.P.C. 3." This is a form of notification to prisoner's friends that he has been received at a prison. Captain Schuyler allowed prisoners to add to this form; but it is not at Wandsworth alone that this is allowed, the practice is general, 11,694–5.

Witness does not agree with Colonel Plummer's evidence (see 9013) as to the unsatisfactory working of rules with regard to the "Special Class." An improvement, however, might be effected. What is most important to a prisoner relating to this class is the money gratuity attached to it, and when a man does not in the opinion of the governor merit the special class owing to some little misconduct in the latter part of the sentence (because a special class carries not only a special gratuity of 3*l.*, but a week's extra remission of sentence), then the extra remission should be withheld, to mark the difference between that man and the prisoner whose conduct is really exemplary, 11,730.

Prison staff in female prisons at times in excess of requirements so far as work to be performed is concerned. Dorchester with an average of six female prisoners would have at least two officers; and Oxford with three prisoners has two warders, the permanent staff: but a second officer is necessary for purpose of relief. Female prisoners have been drafted to other prisons to a certain extent, but this course meets with local opposition, 11,659–65.

Prisoner's card posted in prison cell was revised by witness in order that a man's identity might be concealed, his number only appearing on the exposed face. Certain visiting committees objected to the change, and it has only partially been adopted, 11,716–20.

Amalgamation of convict and local prisons would be a great convenience. No difficulty in the way, 11,749–54.

There is a standing rule that the Governors shall send in suggestions to the Commissioners: it is not often acted upon, 11,765–7.

The Secretary of State should have power to alter at his discretion the rules of the Prison Act of 1865: such alterations to be laid on the table of the House for sanction, 11,731.

Is not unfavourable to the suggestion made that certain governors, medical officers, and chaplains, should assemble annually to discuss prison matters, and give to the Commissioners, and, through the Commissioners, to the Secretary of State, the benefit of their individual experiences, 11,732–40, 11,768–9.

"Standing Orders," no objection to the publication of, 11,746.

For report of the Directors called for by the Committee with regard to certain evidence given by Mr. E——, see Appendix IX.

GEE, Miss JANE TAYLOR:

Matron at Liverpool Prison. Entered prison service December 1867 as warder at Manchester City Gaol, and at same gaol filled the posts of schoolmistress, chief warder, and matron, 5779–86.

Of the prisoners at Liverpool (351) few are first offenders. No convicts at present. System of sending convicts to prison on their way to a convict establishment a good one, 5788–92. Prisoners an exceptionally low class; very few fail to return; often they leave on Saturday to return on Monday. A woman has been known to commit wilful damage as soon as released in order to return. One woman now at Liverpool has been sentenced more than 200 times. A case like this is hopeless, but accumulative sentences should be possible, 5925–34, 5946. Many of the prisoners are below the common standard of intelligence, 5896–9. Drink accounts for large proportion of prisoners, who are mainly habitual criminals. Sentences as a rule very short, one to 14 days or a month, sentences of one day often passed by Recorder, 5793–5802.

Prison work: washing for prisoners and officers only, and knitting; oakum picking, which has an ill-effect, is being replaced by bean picking, 5803–11; also mail bag making, 5908; short sentences mitigate against teaching of prison industries; laundry work leads women to the public laundries, with evil results, 5880–90; a warder superintends laundry; good work can be taught in a week, 5822–3, 5903–5.

Prisoners received up to 8 p.m.; two reception warders are told off to wait for the van and are relieved of late duty on that account, 5830–3; two warders sleep in guard-room and answer bells; the strain is great, but warders are not over-worked, 5870–6; do not complain of over-work; hours of duty 6 a.m. to 6 p.m. except on two days in the week when they are on duty till 10; on these days they have two hours' relief in the afternoon (40 minutes for breakfast, 70 minutes for dinner and tea respectively), 5824–9.

For long-sentence prisoners on release there should be some institution where they could have partial freedom; does not favour mitigation of sentence, 5891–3.

Habitual drunkards. The removal of this class from the prisons would have a good effect on prison discipline; they should be in a separate institution, which, if laundry work could be found, should prove self-supporting, 5937–45.

First offenders. Chaplain takes great interest in first offenders; young prisoners (two at present aged 17) generally kept in a ward apart; cases under 14 reported at once to Secretary of State, 5817–20; first sentence not harmful, may have good effect, 5863–4.

Would abolish No. 1 Diet (19 out of 20 women refuse it, they are not in a fit state to eat it), and give something warm in the morning (a pint of gruel); is satisfied with other classes of diet, 5837–42; officers have a general mess; a prisoner cooks; this duty should be in the hands of an official, 5865–9.

A very good visiting committee in communication with the South-West Lancashire and Wirrall Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society; prisoners informed by notices placed in the cells that they can see a member of the society if they wish to do so, 5812–5. Would allow ladies to address prisoners in chapel or in a room in the prison, but would object to visits to individual prisoners, 5861–2, 5913–22, 5935–6; preachers should be allowed to visit the prison, 5859–60.

Prisoners should not be crowded in chapel; 200 females are associated at prison service, but with six officers in attendance they have no opportunity to talk; first offenders kept apart in chapel, 5849–55.

GORST, Mr. R.:

Secretary of National Association of Certified Reformatory and Industrial Schools, representing two-thirds of schools under Government inspection, 6104–9.

Agrees with Mr. Trevarthen that age for admission for both boys and girls should be raised to 18, and limit for detention, lowered by Lord Leigh's Act, raised to 21, 6111–6, 6189–92; if age raised Treasury grant must be increased, 6153–4, 6157.

Redhill the leading institution of its kind, 6117–8.

In favour of boys being purged by punishment before their admission to reformatory, and there should be an interval to be passed in houses of detention (as a substitute for prison), under county councils, where the boys might be sifted and the proper school found for each, 6119–29, 6141, 6155, 6203; penal and reformatory elements should be separated, 6212–30.

Association does not think having been in a reformatory, with preliminary imprisonment, leaves a taint interfering with subsequent employment, but English and Scotch opinion differs on the subject, 6146–50, 6204–7.

Chief sources of income to reformatories the Government and the local authority grants; these, with earnings from labour, make most self-supporting, 6130–3.

There are 50 reformatories, not too many, although, of late, admissions have been falling off, 6134–5; falling off due to sentiment against sending children to prison, a difficulty now removed, 6208–9, 6220–1.

Believes that from 80 to 86 per cent. of boys who have passed through reformatories lead honest lives; inquiries on the subject are carefully made, 6136–40.

Does not think it is generally true that managers are tempted to keep older boys longer than necessary because of their earnings, 6142.

In cases of long sentences favours a power of conditional discharge in managers' hands for emigration, &c., 6143–5.

Reformatories should be classified as schools for boys and girls between 10 and 12 or 14, and between 14 and 18, and for cripples, &c., 6151–2; such classification essential if age is to be raised, though the classification might be contrived by having entirely separate houses in the same school, 6193–6202; schools necessary for cripples, &c., in order to receive boys ill-suited to industrial training and therefore rejected by ordinary reformatories, 6231–6, 6242–4.

Some reformatories are more successful than others in a pecuniary sense, but knows of none where a profit realised is appropriated to private uses, 6162–71.

Not aware of any special observation as to insanity in reformatories, 6172–4.

Very little exists beyond moral insanity, which, however, he regards as something more than the result of some physical defect, 6175–6.

Admits that some reformatories show better results than others; this due to some being more favourably circumstanced than others as to the material they get, and their means of disposing of it afterwards; also, perhaps, to character of manager, and structure of buildings, e.g., the exceptional means of classification at Redhill cannot but lead to good results, 6177–84.

As to failures, there must be a certain percentage of incurables; dishonesty the main cause of failure, 6185–8.

Objects to penal reformatories except as a special institution, with severe discipline, to which unmanageable boys can be drafted, 6212, 6222, 6226.

Association is anxious to memorialise Home Secretary on the danger of too much use of voluntary homes not under Government control, and the confusion in magistrates' minds as to the spheres of the different classes of schools, 6240–1.

Association in favour of a power to Secretary of State to transfer cases from an industrial to a reformatory school and vice versa, 6240.

GOVER, Dr. R. M.:

Chief medical officer of prisons, 1172; medical officer at Millbank from 1860 to 1878, 1298.

Table of death-rate in prisons for last 20 years, p. 66 of Appendix to Commissioners' 16th Report, 1175; death-rate has declined since 1877, 1177–79. For local prisons now a little over 9 per 1,000, 1180–86. For convict prisons 12 per 1,000, 1187–88; average age in convict higher than in local prisons, 1189, 1192; mortality in convict prisons exactly that of general population, 1193–94. See Dr. Walker's paper, Appendix VII.

Statistics as to sickness in prisons; apparent increase in recent years due to increased facilities for admission to hospital, 1195–98, 1325–29.

Statistics as to suicide; about 8 per annum in local prisons for last six years, tendency greater in local than in convict prisons, and early in sentence than later, 1199–1203, 1368–75.

Statistics as to insanity, 34 in 1893 became insane who were fairly sane on admission to prison, 1204–27, 1432–41, 1446–52; growing practice of magistrates sending for examination persons of doubtful intellect, 1430, 1431, 1487–95; naturally prison doctors less cause than ordinary practitioners for reluctance to sign up an insane prisoner, 1442–45; doubts whether imprisonment is the actual cause of insanity in any instance, 1211–15; in very few cases low diet may have contributed, but this is guarded against by the medical officers, 1218–25.

Qualifications of medical officers, 1226, 1227, 1238. Nature of prisoner's examination on admission, 1229–37; any information about prisoner obtained from prisoner himself, 1239, 1240; as to prison infirmaries, in large prisons there is always the element of skilled nursing, in small prisons where hospital often empty special arrangements made, 1241–50; ventilation, 1251–53; cells at Portland too small and warming by gas jets bad, still not unhealthy because convicts have so much out-door exercise, 1254–62, 1411–13; duty of medical officer to report on insanitary defects, 1263, 1264.

Dietaries: based on reports of committees; not prepared to recommend any alteration; No. 1 is frequently modified according to circumstances, 1265–75, 1453–59, 1471–83; clothing of male prisoners, same inside prisons winter and summer, the prison being warmed in winter, but extra clothing allowed for out-door exercise or work in winter, 1276–79; a difference between summer and winter clothing is made in the case of females, 1390; has never known of real injury from flogging, 1280–83.

Out-door labour better than in-door, speaking medically, 1284–90; prisoners quite strong enough after discharge to undertake the ordinary task of labour, 1376–84, 1400–10; extent to which medical officer can exercise discretion with regard to employment of weakly or feeble-minded prisoner, 1291–94; no decided opinion as to the superiority of productive over unproductive labour from a moral point of view, 1421–27; as to associated labour, whether that is the best form, is a matter for decision in each case, 1428, 1429.

Children should be kept separate, 1295.

No prison with three medical officers; considering how wearing are the duties, it would be well if there were in such prisons as Holloway and Walton, 1299–1324, 1385–89, 1397–99.

Discussion as to whether greater discrimination in the matter of diet and occupation should be allowed in the case of prisoners from very different conditions of society, e.g., a senior wrangler and a tramp; doubts propriety of extending the present amount of discretion to meet such cases, 1332–67, 1453–60.

Knows of no serious trouble arising from a mother being deprived of a child born in prison, 1391–96.

Interprets "under special circumstances" in Rule 26 as confined to medical reasons, 1414–20.

Warders' work not so depressing as to be productive of insanity, 1464–1466. Their hours reasonable, 1467–70.

HALL, Mr. CHARLES:

First-class clerk and acting storekeeper at Lewes, a small prison; 24 years' service in that prison, 4556–57.

His duties include control of clerical, financial, and industrial accounts, preparation of estimates, superintendence under the governor of the criminal work, and examination of building materials, and annual returns and statistics, 4561–64.

Industrial work carried on at Lewes was considerable before the transfer, but afterwards reduced, 4566, 4589; e.g., mat-making by 40 or 50 men produced 1,000*l.* a year profit, 4567, 4718–28, 4746–48; no use to prisoners after discharge, 4659–68, 4678, 4757–59; the kind and amount of work done in a prison decided by Commissioners, 4795; many prisoners now employed on coir and wool-picking, unskilled work suitable for short-sentence prisoners, 4573; sack-making and firewood chopping also suitable for such prisoners, 4576–83, also 4614; also agriculture and gardening, 4643; mat-making suitable for prisoners whose sentences exceed two months, 4575, 4647–50; one-third of the sentences under one month, one-half under three months, 4612; would like to see laundry work and knitting for women, and basket-making and corn-grinding by the crank introduced for long-sentence prisoners, 4798–4804.

Workshop at the prison formerly used by 50 mat-makers an excellent arrangement, 4855, 4586; work in cells does not give same opportunity of learning, 4673, 4674, 4680–82, and is sometimes dusty, &c., 4675; association at work when under proper supervision does not lead to bad results, 4590–95.

Instructors difficult to get; warders able to act as, 4597–4611; warders do not care for the work, 4602–3; under the county management they used to be paid extra for it, 4603–10, 4651–54, 4703–10; tradesmen and skilled artizans rare in prison, 4687–89; there should be inspectors of prisons as regards the work carried out, 4779; and skilled instructors exempt from discipline duties, 4784–88.

Analysis.

Quality of prisoners' work good, but lacking finish, 4616–18; work rejected sometimes because not of description desired; inspection of work by qualified men would obviate this, 4623–28; introduction of a little machinery would improve work, but it is objected to in prisons, 4669–72, 4679.

A central prison store or depôt would obviate inconvenience caused by fluctuations in number of prisoners and orders received, 4619–22.

Agriculture and gardening good work for prisoners, 4633; the prison garden supplies all vegetables, 4634–42; is not highly penal work, 4690, 4691, but suitable for first offenders, and it is not considered light, 4696, 4697; and tasks could be proportioned for town prisoners and agricultural labourers 4759–63.

Warders not so good now as under county management, 4644–46; more care was exercised in selection, 4736–40.

Gratuities should be continued beyond 10*s.* to long-sentence prisoners, 4655–59; they used to go to 2*l.*, 4742–45.

Removals. Long-sentence and short-sentence prisoners should be congregated in separate prisons so as to admit of better industrial arrangements, 4765–68; it would give rise to little hardship; visits are only fairly frequent, 4767.

Materials always procured from Commissioners without difficulty, 4774.

HELBY, Capt., R.N.:

Governor of Wandsworth. Formerly Governor of Lewes, Coldbath Fields (for seven years), and Pentonville (for three years), 29 years' service, 4043–6.

Insufficient accommodation at Wandsworth: on three occasions in 1891, once in 1893, 4216–34; over-pressure on six consecutive days in 1894, 4253. For statement as to separate cell accommodation in relation to statutory requirement, see footnote to pp. 144–5.

Staff: hours of work, 6 a.m. to 6 p.m., with intervals for breakfast and dinner, making 10 hours, but some warders and assistant warders occasionally work till 10 p.m., and principal warders are, in turn, on duty all night, 6 a.m. to 7.30 a.m. on following day, a day's rest follows, 4257–71.

Transfer of prisons a success, 4047–8; old system less progressive, though personal experience at Lewes most satisfactory, 4185–7; the Act of 1865 discouraged industrial labour: penal labour was too heavy: reduction to one month a distinct advantage, 4188–9. Dietary more varied and more satisfactory than under the old system: governor has sufficient discretionary powers, 4190–6. Better field of promotion now for officers, and prisoners are better protected. Headquarters sufficiently in touch with prisons through medium of the inspectors, 4208–15.

Association of prisoners very undesirable, but rendered necessary at Wandsworth during last five years (29 days in all) owing to lack of separate cell accommodation; only prisoners with short sentences associated, viz., the vagrant class, and those who in the course of two or three days will be discharged, 4049–62.

System of associated prison labour at Wandsworth works very well: the best conducted long sentence prisoners associated, 4101–7; would not, however, approve of any considerable extension thereof, with short sentences: separate confinement is better as a deterrent, 4197; see also 4198–4200.

No need for any great extension of workshops at Wandsworth, work done almost entirely for Government, 4108–4110; oakum picking not followed if any other form of employment is available, number of oakum pickers reduced of late, sack making for private firms having been started, 4111–5; digging could only be introduced by extending prison area, building large wall, and adding to prison staff, 4123; necessity for real form of hard labour, crank and tread wheel therefore upheld. The first month only of prisoner's sentence given over to hard labour; 85*l.* a year saved by pumping water, 4116–25.

Artizan warders superintend shoemaking and brush-making, and two tradesmen the pouchmaking for postmen, legging making, &c.: in favour of extra pay for these officers, 4126–31; no labour master at Wandsworth, industrial population under no special superintending control but the governor's, 4281–4; with regard to task expected of prisoners, and appropriateness of same, the governor is much in the hands of a subordinate officer, whose observation enables him to judge; no officially recorded standard for each form of work, 4285–91.

System of stages, marks, and gratuities works well, but money value (10*s.* the limit at Wandsworth) might be extended in the case of long service prisoners, 4092; a premium on specially good labour would not work equably: the limit of eight marks a day is fair on the whole, 4093–5; does not approve of proposal to allow local prisoners to earn remission, 4096–4100.

Letters and visits to prisoners. Recent arrangements suffice: uses his discretion as to extension of existing privileges in cases of emergency, without consulting Home Office, but does not advocate general adoption of this course; visiting committee might decide in such cases. The "three months" rule a deterrent, and should be preserved, 4063–70.

Offences and punishments. No necessity for alteration, no objection to plank bed, 4071–2; dietary punishments moderate in character, and the most effective, 4073–4, 4087; not in favour of removal of privileges, 4087; or of suggestion that the severer form of punishment should come at the end of prisoner's term, 4308; withdrawal from associated labour not very effective as a deterrent, 4088–90; has observry no ill effects of No. 1 diet, but this is a matter for the medical officer, 4137; when heavy dietary punishment is necessary, the case is submitted to visiting committee: it is assumed that the committee has power to impose heavier punishment than the governor, 4075–86.

Character of warders. Average standard satisfactory, 4148–9; prisoners' grievances against warders carefully considered; evidence taken of fellow-prisoners, 4151–2.

Short sentences for habitual criminals have no deterrent effect; favours cumulative sentence, 4159–68.

Greater danger of contamination among the younger than among the older prisoners; risk incurred by reformatory system, 4132–3.

Reformatory system. On question of extending age of admission thinks a separate institution would be necessary; a working-class boy between 16 and 17, generally speaking, has acquired all the habits and notions of a man, and should not mix with the younger boys, 4153–8; no objection to experiment of some kind of reformatory treatment for persons over 16 being made, 4202–7.

Prison chaplains. Present system a good one, but would supplement it by allowing a Scripture reader in large prisons; cell visitation the weak point; inadequate, 4320–1.

Deputy governors desirable in large prisons, but not required with only 500 or 600 prisoners, 4172–82.

Chief warders in charge. Appointments should be limited; system of leaving prison to chief warder during governor's absence does not work badly, 4183–4.

Inspector visits Wandsworth twice a month (for three or four hours a day), not once according to rule, the prison being a large one; he has no power to give orders, but can call governor's attention to any matters, 4138–44.

Convicts received at Wandsworth for periods of three or four weeks only; of late for a shorter period still, 4056; not more difficult to manage than short-sentence prisoners, 4168; only two or three convicts now at Wandsworth; they are more quickly removed, 4171.

Debtors (average number 9 or 10). A well-behaved class; are kept quite apart, 4163–7; sees no reason for treating debtors and other prisoners alike as regards diet, 4312.

Insanity. During past 12 months, four prisoners (three of them insane on admission to prison) have been sent to lunatic asylums, 4292.

Very efficient Prisoners' Aid Society worked by visiting committee; several hours each week spent in considering cases; and the St. Giles' Mission Room is outside. If prisoners express a wish to see the agent of a particular society leave is granted, 4145–6.

Literature. Would not alter present system of allowing a new book once a week; chaplain can exercise his discretion in special cases, 4134–6.

HILL, Captain C. W.:

Governor of Strangeways since January 1894; previously governor of Winchester from 1869, 7284–87.

Strangeways has about 400 cells for males, and 60 for females; accommodation inadequate on two occasions in 1894, but witness thinks that it will prove adequate in the future, 7297–7305. Further as to cell accommodation, 7697–7715. No convicts received, 7309. 1,200 prisoners at Strangeways; 600 a fairer charge for a governor if he is to remain in touch with the prisoners, 7473–78. A large number of prisoners received for drunkenness, 7591–95.

Present system works well. No need to extend discretionary powers of governor or visiting committee in regard to prison regulations, 7291–96. Good work done by visiting justices at Strangeways; visits made nearly every day; no interest taken at Winchester, 7552–68; see also 7772–80. Helpful influence of the magistrates under the old system; local prisons in process of improvement when taken over, 7716–21.

System of sending convicts to local prisons beneficial, 7312–23, 7584–87.

Prison labour should be productive, 7392–93; no unproductive labour at Strangeways, 7796–97; associated labour advisable, given proper supervision, and workshops similar to those at Wandsworth, 7416–21. Warders at Strangeways capable of training prisoners for productive labour, 7422–23.

Complaints as to lack of finish apply, in witness's experience, only to mail-bag work, 7427–30. Various industries explained, 7798–7820. Would be glad to revert to mat making, 7806–9.

Punishments. Approves of the plank-bed, but not of flogging, which should be avoided if possible, 7394–97. Favours suspension of privileges rather than the penal method, 7398; would not give three days bread and water for a first offence, unless a very serious case; too severe punishments defeat their own purpose; no revolt amongst prisoners at Strangeways, 7736–40.

Insanity. Present prison system not responsible for producing madness, 7491–95; weak-minded prisoners requiring special supervision number seven or eight, 7844. A great many admitted to Strangeways on remand to have their sanity tested, 7847–59.

Privileges enjoyed by prisoners sufficient at present time, 7399; but would enable prisoners to earn additional remuneration, 30*s.* a good maximum, 7403–13. Not in favour of a long-sentence local prisoner earning remission as does a convict, 7831–41.

Unconvicted prisoners. Diet unsatisfactory, 7496–511.

Association means ruination, 7306–7.

Habitual drunkards. In favour of recommendation of Inebriates Committee, 7324–36.

Habitual criminals should undergo cumulative sentences, 7337–43; and should be detained in a special prison, 7344–47; said to be manufactured between the ages of 16 and 20, but witness thinks they commence their career much earlier, 7377–81. Thinks that the comparative destruction of prison industries under the present system has nothing whatever to do with the increase of old offenders, 7733.

Warders. Favours the introduction of a greater number of skilled workmen, with special remuneration, 7432–33. Speaking generally, the warders are adequate for their duties, 7446; but harshness towards prisoners a general failure, resulting sometimes in the latter being unjustly punished by visiting committee; Strangeways is improving in this respect, 7612–39. A great deal depends on the governor, and the reforming influence exercised by him. 7741–50, 7765–71. Pay and hours satisfactory, 7447–48. Hours, night duty, &c., explained, 7449–62, 7673–79, 7551–57. Number of officers on the women's side insufficient, 7463–65. Strongly in favour of warders, and, perhaps, deputy-governors, being trained at two or three specially selected prisons, 7467–71. A warder acts as schoolmaster; his duties and hours explained, 7680–92, 7734–35.

Chief warder in charge for prisons under 100; the system works well, 7434–43; he should be allowed to dress in plain clothes, 7821–27.

Two medical officers at Strangeways; an assistant needed, 7860–64.

Inspectors. Attaches importance to their work, and is satisfied with existing arrangements, 7512–16.

One visit by a Commissioner in witness's time, 7693–96.

Reformatories. Is satisfied with the present age limit; prisoners from reformatories the most troublesome, 7348–57. A very complete system of classification essential, 7362–63. Thinks, with proper treatment, the prison is a better reforming agency for boys and girls between 16 and 21 than the reformatory, 7365, 7372–74, 7540–43, 7596–7601. As much good might be done in prison in three months under judicious treatment as in a reformatory school under a four years' term, 7602–5. It is the herding together of bad boys in reformatories which does the mischief, 7606; see also 7607–12. Favours the idea of a Government penal reformatory, a mid-way house between the prison and the reformatory, 7383–89. Why Parkhurst was a failure, 7390–91.

Prisoners' Aid Societies. The Manchester Prisoners' Aid Society commenced its work at Strangeways in March, 1894, and up to the 28th November of that year had helped 432 prisoners. An effective society, witness himself one of the agents, the other agent is outside the prison, Government grant 100*l.* a year, 7517–28. System explained, 7529–39, 7571–83.

In absence of the governor, thinks it as well that the male chief warder should be in charge rather than that the responsibility should rest with the matron, 7479–84. No third-class matron at Strangeways; it has been given in evidence that this class of matron has no power to visit the prisoners; this should not be, she should have that power, 7485–90, 7640–42.

Standing orders and circular letters. In favour of the compilation of a book of instructions in respect of prison administration, 7643–72.

JOHNSON, Captain FRANK:

Governor of Dartmoor Convict Prison; joined the prison service in September 1877, as Deputy-Governor at Dartmoor; went to Portland, February 1880; to Dover as Governor in November 1886; to Parkhurst in March 1889; to Dartmoor in February 1892, 8691–93.

Dartmoor Prison has about 730 large cells and 586 old corrugated iron cells, the latter are too small and should be abolished, 8759–69; and see 8897–902. Death rate for 1893, 15 per 1,000; for the five years ending 1894, 7·7 per 1,000. Influenza responsible in a great measure for 1893 death rate, 8860–70, 8885–87. Youngest prisoner about 20 or 21. Several of 60 years of age, not many over 70. Many of the older men return, 8917–21.

Prison labour almost entirely associated labour, 8724. Of the 1,030 convicts 300 are employed on the farm, 8725–26. Of this number 80 would be employed reclaiming land (1,050 acres are under cultivation and about 950 acres require to be reclaimed), and 14 are engaged building a wall as part and parcel of the reclamation of the land, 8727–29. Work on the land a very good form of prison labour, 8734. A convict is kept to his own occupation, but he sometimes considers it a grievance that he is not allowed on the farm instead, 8732–39. When farm labour is interfered with by the weather, stone-breaking, and oakum-picking or other indoor labour is resorted to, 8905–15. No unproductive labour except (as a punishment) the crank, 8740–41. On the question of the better distribution of labour between convict and local prisons agrees as to the desirability of giving to the local prisons that class of work most suited to them, coal-sacks, hammocks, mail-bags, &c., 8742–48. Difficulty experienced, not want of skilled warders but insufficient work, 8751. Only the separate confinement convicts work in the cells, others in the workshops, 8757–58.

Princetown School. A school for the warders' children. Managed by a school board, of which witness as Governor is chairman and correspondent, but children in the neighbourhood admitted, 8922–23.

Ticket of leave. The power to earn remission has a marked effect on convicts. It promotes good conduct, and should be extended to the local prisons with a two years' sentence, 8931–40.

Punishments. In certain cases the Governor should have power to order a flogging, but not as a general rule, 8856. Could not dispense with flogging at Dartmoor, 8872–73.

Nine months' solitary system debilitating, 8891.

Classification. No "star" class at Dartmoor; first offenders removed to Portland and Parkhurst, 8706–13; no classification except that the young convicts are put to work at trades as much as possible, 8714.

Habitual criminals. Favours long sentences arrived at by a cumulative process, but deterrent effect of same nil, 8807–12.

Prisoners benefit both physically and mentally by the time they are discharged, 8716–19.

Visits to prisoners and letters. Some further discretion should be given to Governors. If a visit is due prisoner should not be prevented from having it by a subsequent offence, 8770–2, 8903–4.

System of inspection by director and visitors explained, 8813–23.

Warders. Is satisfied with the class of men as a whole. Cases of ill-treatment of prisoners very rare. They have not complained recently of their hours of labour, but might be allowed to come in at six instead of shortly after five, 8776-84.

Analysis.

Prisoners' Aid Societies. In favour of opportunities being afforded to accredited officials to see prisoners before discharge. Agrees that anything which would give the societies a better hold on a prisoner should be encouraged, 8786-93. A home where a discharged prisoner could shelter for a time would be of benefit, 8929-30.

Prison Chaplain needs an assistant, 8794-8802, 8941-43.

KNOX, Major JAMES:

Governor of Leeds Prison.

In charge of Kingswood Reformatory, near Bristol, for four years. Governor of Gloucester Prison for 19 years 10 months, and for the past six months Governor of Leeds, 7865-68.

Leeds Prison, 505 prisoners, 7988, 8101; average number of women received daily, four or five, 8073.

Prison Labour at Leeds. Not in favour of unproductive labour, 7920, 7930-31. No crank in the cells, 7922. The tread-wheel grinds the whole meal for Stafford, Derby, and Wakefield, and for witness's use, 7921. 40 or 50 hand-looms in the cells for weaving of flannel, it is very undesirable that they should be placed there, owing to dust and diminished air space, but witness has no alternative, 7932-39.

Trades acquired in prison not in witness's experience followed when prisoner is released, 7940-42. At Gloucester witness learned printing and some 16 or 17 prisoners were taught the calling, does not think one of them afterwards became a printer; industrial labour in prison more likely to prove a moral than an industrial training, 7943-47. Advocates associated labour with proper supervision, 7952-53; and additional payment to skilled instructors, 8041-43. At Gloucester the female prisoners earn 240*l.* a year at washing; at Leeds the prison washing only is done; this is as much as can be performed, 8067-71. Some women are employed on needlework and knitting on repairs that is, 8072.

Effect produced by the change of administration in 1878 at Gloucester, so far as industries are concerned, 8161-66.

A prison of 300 as much as a governor can properly look after, 7986-87. At present witness is in charge of 505 prisoners at Leeds, but has not felt the need of a deputy-governor of his own class, 7988-92. With a larger number of prisoners would need assistance, 8106.

Privileges. Would allow women to earn some small wage, 8050-53.

Classification. Would treat as a separate class persons guilty of offences which fall short of "crimes," 7876-84; such offences enumerated, 7881; re-convictions in this class 40 per cent., 8244-45.

Unconvicted prisoners should have a better diet, 8017-23.

Punishments. Approves of dietary punishment, 7923-28. Opposed to flogging; had four cases at Gloucester, but none at Leeds in witness's time, 8141-57. Would allow publicity to the trial by visiting justices of such offences as may entail corporal punishment, 8147-50.

Habitual drunkards. Separate treatment advocated, 7884-91.

Habitual criminals. Cumulative sentences advocated, 7892-95, 8241-42. Of the prisoners at Leeds 25 per cent. are of this class; 30·58 of the women, 8096.

Reformatories. Does not favour a hard and fast rule as to age, but would take from the prison as many of the younger prisoners as possible and detain them in reformatories; advocates separate institutions for the younger boys and girls, 7896-7911. It should be possible to transfer an offender who is incorrigible from a reformatory to a prison, 7916.

Warders. As a rule a very good class of men, 7960-61. Hours not too long; no complaint on this ground, 7963-64; but staff insufficient, 8126-28; temporary officer constantly employed for the last two years, 8199-8209. Witness's experience of Gloucester is that it too was understaffed, 8188-98. Night duty is performed once a week, which means an addition to the ordinary 10 hours a day; when a warder has been kept up by special circumstances for two or three hours, witness has taken upon himself the responsibility of allowing that man two hours at another time. Warders' duties explained, 7965-77. Hours and duties on the female side, 8084-93. A warder acts as schoolmaster, and his hours are longer than if he were a schoolmaster only, 8134-40.

Chief warder in charge in small prisons. Their appointment a retrograde movement; a man may be found admirably fitted for this duty and should not be debarred from getting on; as a rule, however, witness favours the appointment of a better class of officers, 7993-98.

Matron at Leeds, whether 1st class or 3rd class, visits the female prisoners each day, 7978-83. Present relation of matron to the chief warder in governor's absence satisfactory, 7984-85.

Insanity. Prison discipline not productive of; quotes an instance, however, of a prisoner being removed to an asylum after receiving 30 lashes with 20 to follow; the medical officer being of opinion that the man's mental condition was due to fear of the second punishment, 8005-16, 8141-42.

No resident medical officer at Leeds; he has frequently to be sent for, 8111-25. Room for improvement, 8127.

Visiting justices' powers with regard to matters of prison discipline should be increased, 7871-74; they take no interest in the work of the prison at Leeds, never visiting except on quarter day, although asked to come oftener. At Gloucester they visited every other week, 8032-36, 8175-87. Does not favour the suggestion of a Ladies' Aid Committee to deal with the women's side of the prison, the female agent of the Aid Society is sufficient, 8037-39; justices' duties, 8060-66.

Prisoners' Aid Societies. One at Leeds and one at Bradford; do admirable work. The Leeds society has a very good male and a very good female agent, who visit the prison every morning and see prisoners before they leave. It was the custom at Leeds before witness's time for these agents to be allowed inside in the prison. At Gloucester witness had authority from the Commissioners to allow such visits, 8024-31; and see 8249-55.

Chaplains. Favours a change of chaplain, say every five years, 8040.

Statistics as to re-convictions and length of sentences. On November 14th, 1894, of the 396 men and 97 women at Leeds Prison, 231 men had been re-convicted 412 times, and 61 women 121 times, recidivism has increased, 8211-13. Diminution of prison population due to shorter sentences, 8216. In 1880 the average length of sentence was 48 days; in 1894, 34 days, 8217-18. Percentage of previous convictions now going up, 8219-21; re-committals for drunkenness at Leeds (the first conviction not necessarily for drunkenness), 21·76 per cent., 8232-35. See diagram Appendix III. Of the prisoners in the whole country, 96·22 have sentences of three months and less. Two-thirds of the prison population have sentences of less than 14 days, 8237-40.

LEWIS, Dr. BEVAN:

Superintendent at Wakefield Asylum, assistant medical officer and superintendent for over 20 years, 9065-67. Author of a text book on mental diseases, 9072.

Wakefield Asylum a school of research into medical psychology. Criminal lunatics are sent to Wakefield from the prison there and at Leeds; number received in the last 10 years 126; then in addition there would be 40 patients not admitted as criminals, but transferred to the asylum on expiration of sentence; present inmates belonging to these two classes, 3 and 23 respectively, 9073-4 (see also 9151-72). Asylum population 1400, admission rate 460, 9142. Criminal lunatics admitted have not been charged with the gravest of crimes, but with theft, larceny, and other petty offences, and drunkenness and disorderliness frequently repeated, 9075-77. Patients discharged often return confirmed paralytics, and die in the institution, 9081; cases received from prison embrace a large per-centage of general paralytics, 9115; recoveries 40 per cent. of the total admissions, 9118-20.

Criminals and paupers should not be associated in asylum as at present; remedial measures contemplated, 9144-51.

Crime and insanity. Witness goes far with those who hold that crime is nearly always connected with mental unsoundness, 9082; but crime is by no means in itself evidence of an unsound mental constitution; witness believes that on the border line between insanity and crime a very large proportion of the criminal class stand, 9084-85.

The habitual criminal simply a degenerate offspring of a very degenerate stock; given a certain environment you will have crime, given a more favourable environment simply insanity, 9083.

The habitual drunkard should be compulsorily detained, and, accorded special treatment, he might thereby be saved from ultimate insanity, 9128–29; would be inclined to keep this class entirely apart, but sees no reason why they should not be associated with the feeble-minded in large asylums, 9130.

Evolution of crime in the offspring. About 67 per cent. of the whole criminal community supposed to be of drunken parentage; per-centage sprung from drunken fathers 43·5, or, taking epileptic criminals only, the cases of ancestral intemperance rise to 49·5, the remaining 18·2 being almost certainly in the same category, 9086; ancestral intemperance an inciting cause, 9089. Out of 4,125 insane admissions during the past 10 years only 6·6 per cent. have been traced to ancestral intemperance, but great difficulty is experienced in eliciting information as to family intemperate habits, 9091.

Lunacy not manufactured in prison, but there are cases in which prison treatment may have hastened the development of insanity, 9124. The proportion of all classes of lunatics in a town of 10,000 inhabitants would be about 30, 9097–99.

Treatment of prisoners under observation in prison calculated, so far as solitary confinement is concerned, to prejudice their mental condition, 9101–5. The mentally-enfeebled class should be segregated entirely apart from the criminal class; outdoor employment an all-important factor in their treatment, 9107–9; to concentrate in particular prisons for special observation the weak-minded and neurotic prisoners would be a most progressive movement, and one of vital importance, 9126; is inclined to think that there is a heavy per-centage of such cases, and that it would be found necessary to multiply such institutions if the question were once taken up, 9127.

The prison medical officer. Such men as have not special psychological knowledge or training are not the men for the prison service, 9110. To detect malingering requires a large experience in the study of mental diseases, 9113. Advocates a much more thorough inspection, under different conditions, of the whole prison community, 9125; all important that there should be ample opportunity and facilities for a correct diagnosis of a man's mental condition when taken to prison, 9133. A medical officer should be recognised as an enthusiast in the study of craniology, and should have, say, six months' preparatory training in an asylum, 9134; occasionally an officer is drafted from the asylum service, but this class would be very largely in the minority, 9135. 50 admissions a day would tax the energies of one medical officer if duties were efficiently performed, 9137–40.

LITTLE, Miss ELIZABETH:

Matron at Strangeways for past 20 years. Deputy matron for six years, and warder for 10 years at same prison, 5061–3.

Large receptions at Strangeways: 64 in one day in 1894; average about 20; only six reception cells or boxes; should have quite 20; would be glad of a set of boxes in which to place prisoners on reception, and separate cells for them after the bath, 5067–81; medical officer always sees prisoners on the day they arrive, 5082–5; many prisoners return very often; some express pleasure at returning, but these seem to have no home and prefer the prison to the workhouse, 5195–5202, 5311–5; remanded and untried prisoners separately treated, 5203–8. In November 1894, 351 women at Strangeways (400 several times of late), 362 certified cells, not including 21 hospital cells and a room where eight prisoners can be associated, 5234–5, 5262–6; prison often overcrowded; cannot set apart a portion for first offenders as should be done; suggests that certain prisoners might be sent to other prisons quite as close to the Manchester Courts as is Strangeways, 5256, 5267–72; few first offenders (barely 30) now at Strangeways; of the 6000 women passing through the prison in 1894, about 1,000 were of this class, 5257–9; drink accounts in great measure for habitual offenders, 5273–7; few feeble-minded prisoners, 5279–80; has made no complaints as to overcrowding; that is for the governor to remedy, 5285–6; prisoners are transferred to Knutsford, Liverpool, and Preston, 5287–9, 5309–10; transfers on a large scale would not work well; some prisoners averse to transfer; regard for matron rather than the question of locality accounts for this feeling, though the latter factor might weigh with prisoners, 5305–8; Overcrowding is reported to the governor, but sometimes three or four days elapse before relief comes by discharge or transfer; on the occasion of any great influx, ordersare given for transfer, 5324–37; inspector visits once a month, 5348.

Staff at Strangeways insufficient. In a large prison a deputy matron is essential; a good active matron ought not to have to control more than 200 prisoners. Is allowed six weeks' leave, but, being short-handed, generally takes three; responsibility rests with chief warder in matron's absence; the introduction of temporary warders in time of pressure not good for discipline of prison; warders' hours respected as much as possible, but while on duty they have to work very hard, 5099–5114; warders all reside in prison and mess together; an officer should be appointed to cook for them, at present a prisoner acts as cook, 5299, 5338–44.

Prison work: prisoners in charge of children have work to perform, but not in association, 5132–3; laundry work preferred: Strangeways possesses a very good laundry (employing about 46 prisoners), and does high-class work for the Judges on circuit, Members of Parliament, and private families, over 1,000*l.* a year earned; prisoner's training completed in a week; the work is liked, and has a beneficial effect, 5134–49, 5209–10; skilled instructors not employed, if warder has no previous knowledge of industry she qualifies after arrival, 5211–14; other industries, mail-bag making, sewing, knitting, and making surplices for English prisons; excellent needlework done by hand only, 5150–2; warders have not always the training required so far as prison industries are concerned, this defect should be remedied by an addition to the regulations of appointment, 5153–7; favours occupation being found for untried prisoners in their cells, they often apply for work, 5187–8; prisoners might be allowed to earn wages, not, however, to be expended in luxuries, 5215–9. Speaks of beneficial effect of a higher standard of work as a reward for good behaviour; prisoners should always have some occupation, and their work should be as advanced and cheerful and possible, 5250–3; prisoners capable of performing laundry work have no difficulty in obtaining employment outside, are accepted without character, 1*l.* and 30*s.* a week earned; has heard no complaint from outside as to skilled laundry work done at Strangeways, 5281–4.

Prison punishments. Dietary punishment not much resorted to; has a lowering effect on constitution; would be glad of an alternative, 5086–92, 5293–7; salutary effect of withdrawal from associated work; very little trouble caused by breaking of prison rules, 5093–7.

1st class diet insufficient, 5128–9; modification suggested, 5130.

Matron's influence over warders and prisoners would be improved if she were not a uniform officer, 5189–94.

Classification. First offenders should be kept as much as possible apart, 5224–5256; prison, however, too crowded to allow of separate department for this class, 5270.

Short sentences have no deterrent effect, several prisoners have expressed a wish to remain rather than leave on expiration of sentence, 5158–63.

Visits to prisoners under sentence not so frequent, as, according to regulations, they might be, 5172; letter-writing looked forward to, would be glad of an extension of this privilege, 5174–5.

Reformatory treatment. Some girls return to prison not improved thereby, 5184–6.

Juveniles. Girls of 13, 14, or 15 (even up to 17) sentenced for the first time should be sent direct to reformatories not first to prison, 5236–47.

In governor's absence the male chief warder is responsible; an unsatisfactory arrangement so far as the matron is concerned, 5226–33.

No lady visitor ever at Strangeways, 5176; work of Prisoners' Aid Societies explained, 5178–83.

Chapel at Strangeways not large enough to allow of prisoners being separated as they should be; difficulty could be met by holding two services a day, but more warders would be required, 5115–21, 5301–4; a Roman Catholic service is held on alternate days, 5164–70.

LUSHINGTON, Sir GODFREY, K.C.B.

Late Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department for period of nine years, 25 years in the Department, 11,385.

Analysis.

Transfer. Consequent anomalies. Secretary of State has no power to alter any rules in the Act of 1865, though he can add to them; he should certainly be given this power. Again, while the inspectors, and visiting justices under the name of the visiting committee are retained, their functions are inverted. Inspectors were State officers inspecting the institutions of a local authority, now they are State officers inspecting a State institution carried on by their own official inferiors. So visiting justices were members of the local authority, they practically managed the prison, and acted for that authority, now they are independent critics of State conducted prisons, 11,387–8; transfer eminently beneficial, not merely as the cause of a better administration of the law, but as being much more humane towards prisoners. Immediate purposes of transfer, economy and uniformity, entirely fulfilled. The prisons under the Commissioners are as a whole superior in every respect but one, the use of productive labour, 11,389, 11,393–4; speaking of the period before the transfer witness thinks that the personal influence of the justices over prisoners has been very much exaggerated, and that the question whether the visiting committee has a greater or smaller share in the actual administration of the prison than was enjoyed by the visiting justices does not affect prison administration as a whole, 11,390–2; under the Act of 1877 it is possible for visiting committees to exercise a very direct power of interference with the administration of the prisons, but not advisable, 11,410–3.

On the question of the necessity for further expenditure on prisons, witness would not be surprised if the Committee come to the conclusion that there are sundry matters calling for development; the reason why this result is more to be expected in the case of prisons than of other institutions is that the operation of the prison machine is necessarily drawn from the public eye; the administration of the Mines Acts benefits by the thousand and one suggestions constantly streaming in; the Prison Commissioners, however, do not enjoy like advantages; superior officers would hesitate to offer suggestions involving an important alteration of machinery or serious addition to expense; as the general civilisation outside advances, however, so the improvements from this general civilisation gradually win their way into prison administration, 11,395–8; as to increased expenditure see also under heading "General administration of prisons."

Attaches much importance to any means that can be devised for bringing outside feeling to bear upon the work of the Prison Commissioners; the best means now available for this purpose seem to be the visiting committees; they should, however, have little or nothing to do with the everyday affairs and arrangements of the prison; is quite opposed to a dual administration; their true and important function, in addition to hearing complaints in the prison, is in their annual report to review prison administration in its larger features, and to submit general observations and suggestions; this they occasionally do now, but not nearly so often as might be desired; a recent improvement effected by this means is the discontinuance of the small iron cells at Dartmoor; again, the question of useless labour has been referred to this committee owing to the remonstrances of the Bristol visiting committee; visiting justices and justices in sessions assembled have, to a great extent, tolerated useless labour for years, and bad cells too, 11,399–403; a circular should be issued to the visiting committees every year by the Secretary of State (at the beginning of the year, perhaps, rather than at the end, or there might be two circulars), specifying the principal features of prison administration upon which he requests full observations and suggestions; the reports with an analysis to be laid before Parliament, 11,404–7; a periodical revision of prison administration by an independent body has been suggested; is quite certain that a yearly revision would degenerate into a mere form, but advocates an occasional revision, the Secretary of State to nominate members from time to time; in the intervals the revising body to be non-existent, 11,414–6

The general administration of prisons might be improved in one or two particulars; too great importance cannot be attached to the personnel; everything should be done to secure the utmost influence of the Commissioners on the governors and superior officers, and of the governors upon the officers and all the warders. In the local as distinguished from the convict prisons the Commissioners rarely inspect themselves, and the inspection by the inspectors is not altogether satisfactory, for they can never have the same personal influence on the governor and warders as a commissioner; one inspection from a commissioner would be worth three or four from an inspector. If necessary there might be an additional commissioner in lieu of the inspectors. Some of the commissioners' visits should be surprise visits, others would be pre-arranged; in the latter case a notification should be sent to the visiting committee to give them an opportunity of attending. The commissioners and the visiting committees should be brought into as close contact as possible. Again, in a large prison (and the line should be drawn at a much lower level than it now is) there should be a deputy governor; and every prison should have a governor. A warder, however, might be promoted if found to possess the qualities recognised as essential for a governor, as distinguished from a principal warder. Lastly, warders before being appointed should pass through a period of probation, during which they should be regularly trained at certain prisons set apart for the purpose, 11,417–9.

As to reformatory character of present prison system, points out the elements in prison life which seem to make for, and those which seem to make against, reformation, 11,480; does not think it possible to introduce a reformatory element into the prison, 11,481–3; the prison system should be simply punitive and deterrent; does not see how any effort to produce a contrary effect can be made successfully, 11,484–5. On the question of deterrence see 11,476–9.

Prisoners' Aid Societies. Attaches very great importance (perhaps more than most people) to the action of these societies; they could to a certain extent be helped by the visiting committee taking a personal interest in the prisoners; this help to be efficient must consist of a methodical sifting of the antecedents of prisoners about to leave prison, 11,392; hitherto the work of these societies, except so far as formal communications with the governors are concerned, has been altogether outside the sphere of prison administration; and witness is inclined to think it had better remain so; they should be more sub-divided, however, and in some respects have greater facilities allowed them, 11,485. Recognises the evil of societies competing for prisoners; arrangements might be made by the governor for an equitable distribution of work amongst the various societies; good work might be done in aiding families of prisoners during their detention, 11,487; agrees that more inter-communication between societies for the purpose of identifying criminals who make an improper use of the societies is necessary, 11,488–90.

Imprisonment of juveniles. Is entirely against the imprisonment of children under 16; this could be avoided if the Bill brought in by Mr. Henry Matthews in 1891—the Summary Jurisdiction (Youthful Offenders) Bill—were brought into operation; the Bill was opposed because it authorised flogging; even without that proviso it would be worth having, 11,492–3; witness is in favour of whipping, 11,526–30.

Not in favour of a Government reformatory where boys could be subjected to a long period of penal treatment without the stigma of having been in prison; a new Parkhurst would be a prison in another name, 11,494; witness's objections extend to a penal reformatory for a rather older class of youthful offender; does not share the view that such an establishment would have a reforming influence; as it is, reformatory managers notoriously keep the boys too long, 11,496–7; and they are anxious to extend the age of detention, 11,497; this, witness would not accede to, 11,502; agrees that the system of conducting Redhill reformatory is the right one, 11,500; witness, asked whether his views as to reformatories were due to their not having been well administered during the last 20 years, replied:—"No, I should not like to say "that; I would rather say that at its best the life "offered by a reformatory has most serious defects, "however vigilant and kindly managers may be; "that these defects are liable to be aggravated by "special causes, as by insufficiency of funds, or by "the inmates being too numerous for good manage-"ment, or, in rare instances, by remissness on the "part of the managers," 11,551.

Sunday exercise a necessity for all prisoners, 11,507–8.

Insane prisoners. Witness believes there are sufficient safeguards against penal treatment being imposed upon, or continued to, persons who are insane or on the verge of insanity; the statistics as to insanity offered to the public can hardly be accepted, 11,503–6; of the conditions of prison life the first shock of imprisonment is the most liable to lead to insanity, 11,539; thinks there would be considerable difficulty in the way of a compulsory entry in the calendar as to the state of a man's mind; would not suggest this course until the judges generally had been approached on the subject, 11,531–8.

Habitual drunkards would be more effectually treated in an asylum than in a gaol. The practical difficulty is whether they could be committed long enough (the period of deprivation from drink must be a long one) to produce good results without causing excessive hardship to themselves and to their families, 11,509–10.

Debtors a dishonest class: no reason whatever why they should not be treated as criminal prisoners, 11,511.

Prison labour. Absolutely unproductive labour should be abolished, or at all events never imposed, except as it is in convict prisons by way of a special punishment. For prisoners under sentences too short to admit of their being taught a trade, labour not useless but purely mechanical seems the very last resource; but for all others work requiring some intelligence should be found. The lowest class of useful labour—the treadmill which grinds. It may be necessary to remove prisoners to a greater extent away from the prisons near which their friends reside, 11,512–5. Wherever it can be managed it would be a great advantage to employ prisoners in outside labour. The extra cost involved should not be allowed to prevent this being done, 11,517.

Prison offences and punishments. Dietary punishments, if strictly limited, the least objectionable. The system of marks seems well adopted to diminish the number of special punishments, but defective in stopping short when the full gratuity has been learned. If there are objections (witness is not aware of any) to extending the system in this direction, it would be advantageous that a prisoner with more than a seven months sentence should, like a convict, be able to earn some remission. To meet the case of violently refractory prisoners, visiting committees might be empowered to add to a sentence, within very strict limits, say not more than a period equal to the original sentence or not more than a month, whichever was the least, 11,518.

Relations between Home Office and Prisons Commissioners. Present system works satisfactorily; no necessity for more co-operation, 11,520–5.

Nine months' separate confinement. Has not arrived at any definite conclusion as to the desirability of continuing this treatment; is not aware that the punishment is too deterrent, 11,540–2.

Medical officers' reports. Questioned whether more could not be done to encourage suggestions by medical officers, the Secretary of State making it understood by the Prison Commissioners that such suggestions were to be encouraged and not discouraged, witness replied:—"The Secretary of State "would be willing to do anything which was necessary "for that purpose; but I think he would be un- "willing to do anything which threw the slightest "doubt upon that being the rule at present." It is not for every medical officer to be constantly reviewing the whole of the prison system, but it is certainly his duty to refer to any special practice in his prison which he considers to be injurious, and if he has a strong opinion upon the physical result of any general feature of prison life he ought to state it. Again if he considers that the time allowed for the examination of prisoners was not sufficient or that his duties were excessive, it is undoubtedly his duty to make a representation and the Secretary of State could only rely on the Prison Commissioners to bring the matter to his attention. Medical officers' reports do not necessarily come before the Home Office. In the annual reports extracts are given, 11,543–50.

Wormwood Scrubs outbreak explained. No recurrence of trouble either at that prison or elsewhere, 11,552–5.

MANNING, MR. JOHN BURGESS:

Governor of Pentonville. Previously of Wakefield and of Chester; in prison service 35 years, 695–98.

As a matter of fact has never had more prisoners than could be accommodated in certified cells and in hospital, 703; no cells used for storage purposes, 1170; has applied for removal orders in anticipation of a rush, 701, 702; on one occasion, 12th December 1893, placed prisoners to sleep in association in hospital with an officer to look after them, 704–706. Interpretation of section 17 of Act of 1865, 707–24. Strongly objects to association cells, on special grounds, 728–42.

As to visits to prisoners, does not advocate a freer system, 743–48, 949–59, 1046; but greater latitude might be allowed after prisoner has served three months, and in case of trial prisoners' bailing should be encouraged, 807–14; Governor and Deputy-Governor see, each of them, half the prisoners daily, 749–51; chaplain and his assistant divide prisoners generally by length of their sentences, 752; Home Office circular issued at end of 1893 as to Prisoners' Aid Societies, 753–61; sees no objection to allowing a prisoner to see a list of all help agencies if he asks for it, 762, 763.

Does not think more than 600 prisoners can be managed without a deputy, 764–68, 1135–41; thinks it better to have one prison of 1,200 with a governor and deputy than two prisons of 600 each with a governor alone, 769; a prison of 100 prisoners is too important to place in charge of a uniformed chief warder, it is right though to have some small governorships reserved for chief warders, 770–75.

Present system of punishments satisfactory; they should be light and short, but progressive, 776–79; cannot go far with dietary punishment, 783; flogging should only be a last resort, 784–86, 1134; no punishment cell at Pentonville, 792, 793; magistrates more inclined to inflict severe punishment than governors, but the system works well, 788, 789; power of governor is not too limited, nor does it call for further limitation, 790, 791; present mark system good, and works equally, 794–797.

On the whole, prefers military men for warders and prison officers generally; no danger of "militaryism" in the service; no bias is shown in favour of either a soldier or a civilian as warder; the latter, specially if he knows a trade, is very welcome, 798–802, 1129–33, 1164–68; since the transfer of local prisons to Government, a sounder system of appointment has been instituted, 802, 803; warders' hours not too long, 804–806.

As to labour, about one-fourth of prisoners in Pentonville in association at treadmill, in workshops, laundry, bakehouse, &c., 815–22; no great belief in reformatory influence of associated labour, 823–825; no unproductive labour at Pentonville; would welcome introduction of suitable employment, e.g., matmaking, loss of which is much to be regretted, 826–844; some prisoners on entry physically quite unfit for skilled labour, 835; out-door agricultural work would be most valuable, specially for juveniles and the weak-minded, 1045; the maximum hours of hard labour not too high, 838–840.

Books changed at Pentonville once a week: sees no objection beyond administrative difficulties to allowing as many books as prisoner can read, 845–855.

Insanity. Prisoners showing signs of, are placed in observation cells, 856; the weak-minded, but not insane, kept as a class apart, and placed in hospital association room if isolation bad for them, 1031–37; prisoners are sometimes sent to prison even though there are primâ facie grounds for supposing them to be insane, 856–58; prison life no tendency to produce insanity; the strain greatest during first portion of first imprisonment, 860–4.

Juveniles under 16 should not be sent to prison; they lose the dread of prison, and generally the punishment loses its deterrent effect, while at the same time the stigma of having been in prison clings to them through life, 866–82, 973–1000; difficulty of interim between sentence and committal to reformatory should be met by providing another place than prison for detention, 1047–60, 1119–28; Act of 1893 should have been compulsory; the danger is that children will still be sent to prison before going to a reformatory, much as before, 883–91; young offenders up to 20 and 21, carefully sifted, so as to exclude habituals of that age, should be treated as a class apart, 894–941, 1001–11, 1103–18.

An habitual criminal one who has the determination to live by crime, 905.

Analysis.

Reformatories have done great good, 910; though there is a small thoroughly hopeless residuum, 910, 1012–14, 1043, 1044; not much contamination in prison, precautions so great, but the great danger of present system that juveniles may be dragged into crime again by those who have been in prison with them and recognise them outside, 926–939, 1065–71; it is not the police who drag them back; the police very willing to help them, 930.

Governors have generally quite enough discretionary power, e.g., as regards prisoners' letters, 946–59.

Transfer of local prisons to Government has been a distinct change for the good all round, 960–66, 971, 972; such unfair anomalies as variations in dietary put an end to, 967–70, 1024–30.

A sentence to two years' hard labour more severe than one to three years' penal servitude, with its nine months remitted, 1143–1155.

System of visiting boxes requires careful supervision to prevent shouting, 1156–63.

MEREDITH, Mrs.:

For 25 years engaged in mission work (the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society for Female Prisoners); Prison Commissioners are communicated with, and women are also met at the prison gate by one of the Sisters and are asked if they want employment, 5678–87.

Industry followed is laundry work; average takings 100*l.* to 150*l.* a week; require 80 or 100 women daily, could find work for 200, but cannot get the women, and a few paid hands are necessarily employed, 5688–91; laundry established at cost of 6,000*l.* or 8,000*l.*, anxious for public support to recover heavy outlay; quite self-supporting, but not profitable, owing to unremunerative nature of the work, 5692–3; 78 women at present employed, mostly from Holloway, of this number 12 are convicts; this class preferred because of their prison training, but only 28 convicts in the institution in the last six years, 5694–7, 5707–10; the women are sent to lodging-houses in the neighbourhood, the society guaranteeing cost of lodging; has always been opposed to their living in the institution, 5698; system works well, but under no circumstances are two women placed in one house, 5716; they earn 1*s.* a day, of which 4*d.* is stopped to pay for lodging; women paid each night; is afraid the 8*d.* is spent on beer, 5716–26; there is a penny bank, however, and those who will may put in money once a week, buying clothes from the institution with the amount saved, 5728–30; after two years hopeful cases are helped to buy furniture, 5730–1.

Hours 8 a.m. till 7 p.m.; meals supplied (but no drink) out of the Prison Mission Fund subscribed to by the public, 5701–4; women perfectly free to leave when work is finished; would be glad, however, of police supervision, though the fact that the women work until they are tired is a safeguard, and further they are refused admittance in the morning if they do not arrive before 8 o'clock (prayer time), 5699–700; if a woman leaves to resume evil habits the police are informed, and the society has nothing more to do with her until a further sentence has been served, 5744–6. Some women go from 10 to 12 years with no breakdown; so long as work can be provided and the women be made to feel comfortable they keep from prison, 5705–6. See also 5744. Result of work perfectly satisfactory, 5747.

Convicts should be found employment on leaving prison, and should be allowed partial freedom, not compelled to reside in a home; a kind of licence should be issued, and they should be under control for some months; would add a year of semi-independence to a five years' sentence, the woman to be detained in one neighbourhood where she should be sure of employment, 5748–51, 5762–6.

Habitual drunkards should be kept in homes for inebriates for at least five years. Their craving for drink aggravated by prison diet. Greater attention should be paid to food and medical treatment in convict prisons, 5714–5, 5743.

The Princess Mary Village Homes have at the present time 200 children whose parents are prisoners. They are taken in at as early an age as possible; preferably soon after birth. No money is received from the Government until the children are seven years of age. They remain until 16 and are principally trained for domestic service. Failures about four per cent, 5734–8. Once in three months on a proper recommendation they see their parents or relations; but only if the latter are of good character, 5739–41.

Lady visitors. Favours a return to the system of visiting prisoners which obtained prior to 1877, but would not allow private interviews in the cells. Ladies should be allowed to address prisoners in chapel or one of the large rooms of the prison, and female Scripture readers should be appointed. Lady Elizabeth Biddulph would be useful on the Prison Commission to regulate such matters as visiting, reading, &c., by volunteers, 5752–8, 5770–8.

MERRICK, Rev. G. P.:

Chaplain at Holloway and Newgate. Previously at Wormwood Scrubs, Millbank, and Tothill Fields, 1496–1500; has about 800 prisoners (400 women, 350 men) to deal with, 1501–2, 1507–8; himself attends to trial prisoners at Newgate, and the women; his assistant looks after the men; there is also a Roman Catholic chaplain, 1503–10; could not deal adequately with more than the 400 under his charge, because they are in for short terms, and the number of admissions is greater than in other prisons, 1511–14; in hardly any case does prisoner object to go to chapel, 1515–16.

Objects to dietary punishment, and would substitute for it, in the case of women, a light form of handcuff; this better too than punishment cell; loss of marks not sufficient, 1517–27, 1724, 1725; women more difficult to deal with than men; more given to "breaking out"; statistics on this head deceptive, since latitude is allowed to women, 1528–31, 1737–40.

Labour should not be unproductive, but such as will exercise the mind; the cessation of prison industries, e.g., mat making, owing to opposition of trade unions, a misfortune, 1775–79; does not regard withdrawal from associated work as best punishment for women, 1747–50; is not in fact prepared to recommend associated labour for women at all, 1741–60; neither men nor women ask for work in association, all they want is to get out of their cells, 1760–63.

Would give governors discretionary power to allow more frequent intercourse between prisoners and reputable friends likely to do them good, 1532–38; but not too much to be expected from visits of philanthropic persons from outside, 1727–30; nearly all prisoners have some sense of shame, and this would be deepened as prisoner is elevated by such means, 1539–41; a number of prisoners' aid societies at Holloway; there is practically provision for every case where assistance is asked for by the prisoner; he is allowed to make his own choice of the agency to help him, 1542–44, 1561–66.

Would allow prisoners more books on first admission, and generally as many books as they wish provided work is not interfered with, 1545–51; women seem to like story books, men, books of instruction, 1548.

The germ of some good in all prisoners; a large proportion of prison offences committed by habitual drunkards, 1552–54.

Juveniles under 16 should be and are as far as possible kept apart; there is the danger of contamination in prison, and perhaps more on women's than men's side, 1555–57; it is after 16 that the real criminal age begins; instances in support of this view; criminal habits rather than criminal instincts the cause, 1558–60, 1567–69; suggests as a classification separation of prisoners under 16 from those over, of the relatively innocent from the vicious, and of cases where the viciousness is hereditary from cases where it is the result of circumstances; much to this end can be done under existing system by zealous officials, 1570–76, 1594, 1692–96; approves suggestion of separate prison with special treatment for juveniles, but doubts advantage of fixing age higher than 16; soon after that age character is more or less formed, 1577–82, 1595–1603, 1693, 1771, 1772; would not look for substantial diminution in prison population if age for committal to reformatories were raised above 16, 1604, 1605, 1620–35.

Influence of prison not so generally contaminating as supposed, nor prison stigma so prejudicial in after life, 1583–87; how contamination is possible, at exercise, in cell, in chapel, 1670–77, 1679–91.

Does not consider proportion of re-committals to be relatively large; those who come back to prison come back frequently, 1588–93, 1610, 1611; short sentences partly the cause of increase of committals and re-committals, 1612–15; these short sentences have done good as regards first offenders, but cumulative sentences advisable in case of habituals, 1616–19.

Would not divide prisoners among different prisons according to the moral obliquity implied in the crime e.g., one prison for smuggling, another for burglary with violence, 1636–39.

Attaches great importance to the influence of religion which is greatest with the young, and during the early part of a prisoner's term, 1640–43, 1678; a daily service for Protestants in all prisons, and for Roman Catholics where they are numerous; in other cases the daily ministration is left to the discretion of the priest, 1644–67.

Has heard, but generally speaking does not credit, statements that prisoners after discharge are harassed by the police, 1668–69.

Recognises existence of "moral insanity," 1697; in some cases congenital, in others result of surroundings, 1698–1701; notices that congenital cases have large ears, a square head, and small furtive eyes; they seem to possess cunning, 1702; a number of weak-minded prisoners who are not however fit subjects for an asylum, 1703–11; these are generally undergrown physically, 1712–14; such cases are kept under medical officer's observation and have light work, e.g., needlework, in separate cells unless for medical reasons placed in association, 1715–19.

No. 1 diet may become practically continuous in case of repeated short sentences; this perhaps salutary in cases of drunkards; but the rule is frequently modified by the medical officer, 1720–26.

Character of warders of great importance, and generally speaking the more educated the warder the better; has no bias in favour either of military or of civilian warders, 1764–66; hours of warders rather long, 1767–70; but their work generally very well done, 1731–36.

Agrees with Sir J. Jebb that male convicts must be treated in the mass, while individuality is of more importance with female convicts, 1774.

MILMAN, Lieut.-Col. E. S.:

Governor of Holloway Prison for past 15½ years, and now also responsible for Newgate; the five years previous were spent in prison service; four in Monmouthshire; one in Leicester, 6771–4.

These prisons not over-crowded, Newgate being a sort of chapel of ease to Holloway; has now authority to remove prisoners from Holloway to Newgate, and inform Commissioners afterwards, 6775–6, 6789–91; cells at Newgate are not too small, they are the same size as at Holloway, 6834–5.

Prisoners at Newgate entirely remand cases, 6777.

Satisfied on the whole with treatment of remand and unconvicted prisoners; they get a newspaper, but prison diet and accommodation, unless they pay for better food and accommodation, and the injustice of the distinction between rich and poor thus set up is more apparent than real, 6778–88.

Seldom receives prisoners after 8 p.m., but thinks hours of his officers are too long, and the strain is greater on the female than on the male side; the warders do not complain, but the prison, being one for remand cases, is in an exceptional position, and has, he admits, a higher percentage of officers to prisoners than other prisons, 6792–4, 6796, 6842–50.

There is no alternative diet to stirabout, the latter according to his experience being universally rejected, 6795.

As to prison labour at Holloway, has only males on remand whom he cannot compel to work, and a few well-educated prisoners loaned him from Holloway to do certain necessary work, e.g., cleaning prison vans; has a few short-sentence female prisoners, who help in the kitchen and the laundry, 6797–6801, 6805–12.

Perhaps three-fourths of his female short-sentence prisoners are old offenders, e.g., Mrs. J. C., said to have been convicted 260 times, 6802–4, 6836–7.

In favour of cumulative sentences for habitual offenders, 6813–18; and special treatment for inebriates, e.g., Mrs. J. C., 6821–2, 6838–41.

Classification difficult with short sentence prisoners, but first offenders are, if they can be detected, kept by the matron in a special gallery, 6819–20.

Debtors now committed to prison should be treated as ordinary prisoners, except perhaps some committed in respect of rates, 6826–33.

Agrees generally with evidence given by Mr. Manning and Captain Helby, 6823–5.

MITFORD, Mr. R. S.:

Appointed Commissioner in 1882, Director in 1892, previously 14 years in Home Office, 10,413–14.

Goes in detail into case of apparently illegal sentence by visiting committee on "J. E."; the sentence was awarded at Wormwood Scrubs, but the prisoner was transferred to Wandsworth before it was carried out; the governor of Wandsworth called attention to it and it was quashed by the Commissioners, so that it was never undergone by the prisoner, 10,415–33; the attention of the visiting committee was not called to the case, 10,434–43; with reference to case of "J. E.," the checks against illegal punishment are the governor, the inspector, and the visiting committee, 10,647–53; the state of Wormwood Scrubs was unsettled in 1891, 10,444–46; it was in transition stage from a convict to a local prison, 10,654–71.

Does not see how it is possible to do without cumulative punishments; the time is limited; there are modifications of diet, and the medical officer watches the case, 10,447–57; approves of No. 1 diet as a punishment, 10,458.

In favour of classification so far as possible, 10,459; you might treat separately inebriates, 10,460; habitual criminals, 10,461; epileptics and weak-minded, 10,462, 10,463; in such cases medical specialists desirable, 10,464, 10,465.

Considers prison staff, as recently increased, adequate, 10,466–69.

In favour of establishing training prisons for discipline officers, 10,470.

Objects to system of chief warders in charge; in any case they should be called "governors," but thinks generally men of more education than chief warders are required, 10,471–74.

Does not see the necessity for relaxing a convict's diet in view of his discharge, 10,475–78.

Thinks it would be a dangerous system to allow convicts to talk to one another; there are great difficulties in devising a classification reliable enough to render conversations among convicts innocuous; the silence at present is not absolute, men talk about their work, 10,479–99.

Sees no objection to allowing a prisoner before discharge to see and choose from a bonâ fide list of aid societies, 10,500–502.

Considers present treatment of unconvicted prisoners, as to food, &c., as fair, broadly speaking, as can be devised, 10,503–17.

All inquiries of a serious nature, by directors in convict prisons, by visiting committee in local prisons, on oath, 10,518–30.

All prisoners are examined by surgeon before discharge, 10,531–32.

All official chaplains, either Anglican or Roman Catholic; for special cases other ministers allowed to visit; no representations have been made by dissenting bodies in favour of having chaplains of their persuasion, 10,533–36.

Present system of secular instruction works well, except perhaps as regards the four months' time limit, 10,537–43; no objection to teaching in classes with proper supervision, 10,544, 10,545.

Would be glad to extend prison labour, which is not perhaps at present arranged to the best advantage; to make one particular official responsible would be good, but not necessarily better than the present responsibility of the Commissioners; more openings for work wanted, 10,546–54.

As to constitution of the Board; meetings held seldom, generally about appointments of governors; each Commissioner has his special duties and his special district, 10,555–59, 10,561–67, 10,592, 10,593, 10,595, 10,596; chairman is accounting officer and responsible for expenditure, 10,568–73; he would not necessarily discuss with the Board the proposed closing of a prison, 10,574–84; officials below governor and deputy-governor appointed by chairman and his private secretary as head of the staff department, 10,585–94; Board does not always meet to consider the report of the Commissioners; practically it is drawn up by the chairman, 10,625–28.

Inspectors report each to the Commissioner for his district, 10,597–600, 10,610; some dangers from the inspectors, having fixed districts of inspection, running into grooves, 10,611–14.

Secretary is the officer of the joint Board; but decisions on general questions of administration, and on particular questions of discipline, might be settled between the chairman and Secretary of State, and only communicated to the Commissioner and Directors generally, after a decision has been arrived at, 10,560, 10,601–9.

ANALYSIS.

System of chaplains, some of whom give their whole time, others only a portion, not perfect but difficult to improve, 10,615–18.

In favour of an intermediate place of detention, 10,620, 10,621.

Does not think that a lady inspector is necessary, 10,622, 10,623.

Agrees with last report of Commissioners that practice of committing lunatics to prison for observation is undesirable, but would not say it is unjustifiable because it can hardly be avoided, 10,629–32.

As to visiting committees, thinks they attend regularly; used to let them know when he was coming on a visit, but they did not meet him; therefore the practice dropped; would give them certain powers to grant extra visits, &c. to prisoners, but not to appoint warders, though their recommendation is always received gladly, 10,633–46.

Nothing unusual in sending a deputy governor to take charge of the prison; it is what happens in any large prison when the governor goes on leave; even a chief warder may be in charge of a large prison, 10,672–81.

Nothing irregular if a man misbehaves in chapel in prohibiting him for a time access to chapel, 10,683–88.

Cannot account for higher punishment rate in English than in Irish prisons, especially with regard to flogging, 10,689–704; nor for higher death-rate, 10,705.

Very large number of punishments for talking, but the rule against it is salutary, 10,706–709, 10,751–54.

As to apparent discrepancy between actual numbers of staff and numbers estimated for, 10,710–12; as to complaints of over-work on the part of prison officials, these, when made, are dealt with by the Commissioner for the particular prison, 10,713–25; so too with similar complaints by chaplains, if made, 10,755–59.

Would prefer that convicts should do their nine months' separate confinement in a special prison, though no great objection to using the local prisons, 10,726–30.

Thinks convict diet adequate both for those who work in-doors and those who work out of doors; figures in proof of this, 10,731–41.

No preference as between military men and civilians for prison officers; admits that only military men have been appointed as governors in his time, 10,760, 10,761.

Dietary punishment. No explicit statutory authority for the infliction of this by visiting justices, but that they have the authority is implied in the general continuance by the Act of 1877 of their duty of sitting in judgment on prisoners and punishing them if necessary, 10,762, 10,763.

MORRISON, REV. W. D.:

Assistant chaplain at Wandsworth for last eight years, 2919.

Statement of duties, visits, letters, applications for relief on discharge, &c., 2921. Impossible to know prisoners properly when 11,000 or 12,000 are coming in yearly; total number, not merely daily average, important point, 2922. Most prisoners only too glad to get to chapel as an escape from the cell, 2923–25. Recommitted prisoners sometimes vary their description of religious faith, 2926.

In calculating ordinary certified cell accommodation in a prison punishment, hospital, &c. cells should be omitted, 2927–29. Prisoners in association under Rule 26 should by right be in hospital, 2930–32. Convicts now kept in local prisons nine months, therefore they should not be omitted in making calculation for purposes of s. 17 of Act of 1865, 2935, 2950. Evils of association resulting from insufficient cell accommodation, 2936–38. There has been over-crowding at Wandsworth every year but one since witness has been there, 2939–41, 3467, 3468; cannot give dates from memory, they can be found in blue books, 3399–405. Complaints of this from better class of prisoners, 2936, 2942. There should never be association without supervision, 2943–46. Prisoners like to have some time to themselves, 2947. Margin of accommodation in London prisons decidedly insufficient, 2948. Suggests form of return for insertion in Commissioners' Annual Report, so as to show precise condition of each prison in this respect, 2949, 3469–74. And amendments of s. 17 of Act of 1865, 2950.

No strong opinion as to appointment of deputy-governors to prisons of over 700, save that it affords useful field of training for governors, 2951–57. As to appointment of chief warders to be in charge of prisons with 100 or fewer prisoners, it is important as a premium on efficient service, in respect of which local prison warders have been placed unwisely at some disadvantage as compared with those in convict service, 2958–60.

Distribution of books practically a discretion left to officials of the particular prison, a discretion liberally interpreted at Wandsworth, 2961–65.

Strongly in favour of extending associated labour, where not against prisoner's own wish; provision at present insufficient, 2966–71, 3361–65; all labour, cell or associated, should be productive, e.g., mat making, an industry unfortunately destroyed, 2984–97, 3096, 3366, 3367; Dr. Mouat's views, 3530–31. Not afraid of prisoners talking to one another; danger in too strict a rule of silence, 2972, 2973, 3643–55, especially in convict prisons, 2973–76; of which, however, witness has not had much personal experience, 3426–42; association with conversation though undesirable in local prisons not in the same measure objectionable in convict prisons where not all are habitual offenders, 3346–60. Sitting close together in chapel a temptation to talk, which might be obviated by sending half the prisoners to chapel one day, the other half the next day, 2977–83, 3096.

As to suicide and insanity in prisons, tendency greater inside than outside prison, greater on first reception than afterwards, greater with prisoners under remand than convicted, greater with first offenders than habituals, 2998–3006, 3580–82. Prison population specially affected by congenital infirmities, but this insufficient to account for large proportion of insanity and suicides, which last has recently been reduced by mechanical means, transmuting the tendency to suicide into insanity, 2999, 3007–10, 3613–17. General statistics of insanity discussed, 3011–13. Doubts accuracy of prison statistics of insanity, particularly in connexion with practice of magistrates committing persons for inquiry as to mental condition; medical staff is numerically inadequate to form a decisive judgment, 3014–27. 3481–85; manner in which cases are dealt with at Wandsworth, 3494–3500. Question of insanity surrounded with difficulties, 3028. But is of opinion there has been increase since transfer of local prisons to the Government, largely owing to the loss of personal interest and influence on the part of magistrates, and the loss of emulation between counties, 3028–32; medical officers should have opportunity before appointment of studying lunacy, 3486.

As to communications with prisoners, regulations should be left as they are, so far as affects old offenders, save that children should not be allowed to visit them except under exceptional circumstances, e.g., death in a family, 3033, 3036–38. Interviews should be allowed between husband and wife without humiliating barriers in case of first offenders, at governor's discretion, 3034, 3035. As regards juveniles, even up to age of 21, three months' rule should be relaxed in favour of parents, 3039, 3040. So too with first offenders, though what a "first offender" is is hard to know, 3041. Prisoners should be allowed to send for schoolmaster who is nearer them in social position; his position unfortunately degraded in local prison service, a discipline officer now and wearing a uniform, which is a mistake, 3042–61. A question whether Nonconformist prisoners should not be allowed a choice of chaplain or schoolmaster, 3042. As to visits by outside agencies, women attached to Prisoners' Aid Societies should be allowed under conditions to visit female prisoners and boys under 16, 3062, 3368, 3369; there are women visitors now in certain cases, 3463*a*–66. Present system of Prisoners' Aid Societies works satisfactorily, 3064–68. Dangers in allowing a prisoner to see list of all societies willing to help him, and to make a choice, 3069–3072.

As to prison offences, three times as many in local as in convict prisons, 3074–77; many produced by nature of prison life and degrading labour, 3073; by action of indiscreet or inexperienced officers, 3078, 3089; outbreak at Wormwood Scrubs arose from indiscreet handling of prison, e.g., in inflicting undue punishment 3078–84; see case of prisoner J. E——, 3085–95, 3443–63, 3532–34; flogging, how ordered and carried out, 3535–42; recommendations in respect of prison offences, 3096; diet should be improved, 3096, 3097, 3331; hours of officers should be shortened, and power of prison directors to inflict punishment abolished, 3097; doubts wisdom of suggestion that in case of women a light form of leather handcuff should be substituted for penal diet, 3098–3100.

Does not see why long sentence local prisoner should not have power of earning remission, 3101.

As to juveniles, they mind imprisonment less than older prisoners, rules less rigorous with them, 3101–3104; imprisonment for children under 14 should be abolished, and Home Secretary should be apprised, as in Belgium, of imprisonment of child under 16, 3104–3106, 3316–18; 18 not too old to deal with children in a reformatory, but if in prison those between 18 and 21 should be subjected to educative influences, 3319–21; it is not realised what a high per-centage of the general population between 16 and 21 come into our prisons; hands in returns showing this (see Appendix III.) and the parentage, social condition, and occupation of young prisoners, 3106–3108; also returns showing per-centage of labourers to general and to prison population; the relation between crime (juvenile and other), and density of population; between pauperism and crime; and between pauperism and illegitimacy, 3109–13; these returns show juvenile offender the product of bad parental, economic, and social conditions, therefore juveniles between 16 and 18, or 16 and 21, should be placed in special establishments, or, where few, in special divisions of prisons, administered more on reformatory than prison lines, under officers of proved character; their diet should be good, and their employment non-cellular; on discharge juvenile offenders from towns should be found employment in country; e.g., the German Prison Code, 3113–18, 3123, 3124; criminal juveniles more immature in proportion to age than children of well-to-do, 3119–21; in classification of first offenders, juvenile or otherwise, would allow considerable discretion to prison authorities, 3516–19.

Generally, present system too centralised, insufficient discretion being allowed to officials of prisons, 3125–27; this is where the old system of local control was superior; there is now a want of elasticity, 3311–15; would allow more latitude to prison officials (medical officer for choice) in discriminating between prisoners according to their antecedents, especially in the matter of visits, diet, occupation; this difficult in face of public feeling, 3322–45; had no personal experience of system before transfer of local prisons to Government, but is of opinion that the magistrates now do not know as much as they used to, 3378–80. 3390–98.

Witness's criticism of secretaries of benevolent societies not intended to apply to such men as Lords Leigh and Norton, Colonel Ross, and Mr. Wheatley, 3406–25.

No. 1 diet too low; practically continuous in case of repeated short sentences unless modified by medical officer, 3331, 3475–80, 3571–76.

More attention should be given to individual character of each prisoner, 3501; 300 cells as many as a chaplain can adequately attend to, 3502–3505. Criminal anthropology deserving of more systematic study in connexion with prisons; has led to practical results in Belgium, where generally the method of selection of prison officers, e.g., inspectors, might well be imitated, 3371–76, 3506–15, 3554–63; there are admirable points too in the Elmira system, 3520–29.

At Wakefield, Roman Catholic convicts had a daily service; not sure whether this is so at Wandsworth, 3586–3604.

Constitution and duties of visiting justices, 3567, 3568, 3605–12.

Short sentence prisoners a great difficulty, for in, say, three months little can be done either to reform or to produce deterrent effects by punishment, 3620–33. Again take habitual offenders for petty offences, physically and mentally degenerate, what can be done with them but lock them up for an indeterminate period? 3634–42.

Reports of prison officers appearing in the blue books are edited by the Commissioners, 3551–53.

NICOLSON, Dr. DAVID:

Superintendent of Broadmoor since 1886; 18 years at Broadmoor in all as deputy-superintendent and superintendent. Previous prison service, assistant surgeon at Portland for four years, then at Woking and Millbank, and medical officer at Portsmouth for three years (10 years in all). President of the Medico-Psychological Association, 9258–65. Is frequently consulted by the Secretary of State in cases of criminals under sentence of death with regard to whom allegations of insanity have been made, 9287–88.

Broadmoor inmates, 480 males and 160 females. 53 per cent., taking both sexes, have committed homicide. Mortality about 3 per cent. per annum, 9268–78. Cost of a prisoner's maintenance, excluding outlay on the building, from 43*l.* to 44*l.*, 9307–11, 9334–36. Only a small proportion of the inmates have committed minor offences, 9325. Only the convicts, numbering about 100, are on sentence; the "Queen's Pleasure" inmates, about 540, are dealt with on order of Court, 9329–30. All cases of lunacy occurring in convict prisons are sent to Broadmoor, and the establishment would require enlargement if local prisoners were included, 9331–33. From 15 to 20 convicts are received in a year; some are received who ought not to have been sentenced; their insanity at the time of their trial should have been certified, and they should have come as "Queen's Pleasure" patients, 9343–44, 9363–65. Suicides, three in 18 years, but attempts are not at all infrequent, 9357–59.

Crime and insanity. In witness's opinion a very large proportion of criminals are sane, and responsible for their actions, 9279–83. (For statement as to convicts who have been received at Broadmoor insane for five years up to 1874, when they were taken away and kept at Working, and for five years from 1888, when they returned to Broadmoor, see Appendix VII.) Intemperate habits not such a prominent factor in producing brain disorder and insanity as is sometimes alleged, 9362.

Medical officers should have facilities for recreation and exercise; this is not the case at Holloway, and the same remark is applicable, no doubt, to other prisons, 9292–95.

Nine months separate confinement. In witness's recollection no harm, physical or mental, has resulted therefrom, 9298–9301.

For half-witted criminals, some kind of intermediate institution advocated, where they could be kept firmly under detention, but not definitely classed as lunatics. As to employment, out-door labour advocated, 9302–6. Such an institution ought to be worked at about half the cost of Broadmoor. This class probably amounts to from 2 to 3 per cent. of the prison population, and a building to accommodate 200 or 300 would meet all requirements, 9311–17.

Warders at Broadmoor: the labouring man or artisan preferred to the military man, 9353–56. Convict prisons undermanned, 9360.

PATMORE, Dr. TENNYSON DEIGHTON:

Medical officer at Wormwood Scrubs since February 1881; previously assistant surgeon at Woking for two years, 6248–52.

Prisoners at Wormwood Scrubs on November 16, 1894 196 women, 908 men; average number received each day, male and female, from 12 to 15, 6253–54, 6365–66.

Medical staff at Wormwood Scrubs (medical officer and one assistant) insufficient, 6282, 6361–62, 6367–75. The principal officer should not be trammelled by too many routine duties, 6392. Witness's duties explained, 6283–89.

Exercise for prisoners: an hour insufficient. Extension exercises: garden work and digging advocated for men; light garden work (weeding) for women.

System of medical examination explained, 6255–57.

Classification: witness objects to terms of classification "first offender" or "first conviction." Some period of youth, that period a low one, should be fixed for purpose of classification, but there should be no strict adherence to a particular age, say 16; classification should be according to actual physical age according to the view of the medical officer; a youth at 17 undeveloped might be classified with others not so old, juveniles to be kept apart, 6271–75.

Is imprisonment conducive to insanity? In witness's opinion, no, 6258.

Lunatics: very few prisoners of a decidedly low mental type on entering prison, say 1 in 30, 6259–61.

Drunkenness accounts for a large proportion of the prisoners, 6262–4.

Prison labour. Utterly opposed to useless labour except for tramps and vagabonds, 6295–96. Open-air work advocated, 6338–40; especially in cases where a tendency to mental disease is apparent, 6341–44.

Analysis.

Wormwood Scrubs outbreak not due to undue severity, but rather to want of proper firmness on part of the Governor, 6301–12. Discipline improved by firm and judicious management, 6376–86.

For the office of governor it would be an advantage to secure, if possible, medical men with the administrative qualities of military men, 6313–14.

Visiting justices take a close interest in their work, 6316–17.

Habitual drunkards. Favours separate treatment, enforced detention for a year at least, 6320–21.

System of sending convicts to local prisons not approved of, 6266–70.

Reformatory influence of prisons: favourable view of, 6276–78.

Punishments for women should be very short and very sharp. Not in favour of long dietary punishment. As to No. 1 diet, stirabout, is not liked and should be improved, 6323–25.

Female officers: hours not too long, except that the duty of answering the bell at night should count entirely as night duty, the officer on this duty to sit up instead of retiring, but the occupation monotonous and depressing, 6227–33.

Case of prisoner, J.E., referred to in evidence of Col. Garsia, explained, 6387–92.

PLUMMER, Colonel.

Governor of Borstal Convict Prison for 2 years 4 months. Formerly Deputy-Governor of Borstal 7 years; then Deputy-Governor of Dartmoor for the same period, 8956–8.

Borstal Convict Prison. Plenty of accommodation; two out of four halls only are used. Cells (of corrugated iron like those at Dartmoor, but larger), are adequate. Convicts very healthy, 8959–62. 270 convicts at present, 8986. No convict comes to Borstal who has more than five years of his sentence to do; the majority have only three years to run, 9005.

Convict labour: Borstal exists to make fortifications for Chatham. In addition, there are the shops for prison work, such as a little tailoring (chiefly mending), a little carpentering, and the mending of tools for the War Department, 8982–85. About 15 men are engaged on the farm of 70 acres; a very satisfactory form of employment, 8987–90.

No unproductive work except as a punishment. No provision for trades at Borstal; this a serious weakness, 8992–93. Would be very sorry to see the crank done away with; very valuable as a punishment, 9011–12.

Visits to prisoners. Would give the governor greater discretionary power, 9000–1.

Mark system. Very satisfied with working of. If, at Borstal, an officer stops a mark, the prisoner is down to see the governor on the following day. This interest on the part of the governor has a good effect; 220 convicts in 1893 went unpunished, 8995–99.

Rules with regard to the special class do not work well, 9013.

Punishments. Proportion of punishments to prison population has materially decreased in the past 10 years; in Borstal to a marvellous extent, 9002–3. 220 convicts in 1893 went unpunished, 8995–99, 9014–16. Cases of corporal punishment at Borstal accounted for by the periodical outbreak of certain prisoners. Irish statistics under this head very remarkable; difficult to account for absence of corporal punishment for a whole year, 9019–31.

Remedial measures. Long-sentence convicts should have some relaxation of prison discipline during their last year; a small prison might be given over to this class, where those of over five years' sentence might be allowed more talking, and greatly increased visits, to fit them for life outside, 8971–74; or, for the majority of prisoners (a small minority would refuse to take advantage thereof), an Aid Society's Home, if such a place could be found, would be equally beneficial; this last year would be very useful for the teaching of trades, 9032–45, 9059. Warders should be allowed to retire on pension after 26 years' service, 9009–10.

Does not favour the idea of convicts being allowed to earn small wages to be sent to their friends or expended on luxuries, as in some countries, 9060–61.

Practice of sending convicts to local prisons for first nine months. From the point of view of discipline sees no advantage in this arrangement; would shorten the period of detention to three months, 8964–69.

Standard of education amongst prisoners higher than it was 10 years back, but still low, 9047–58.

Warders. Their hours not now too long, but promotion hopelessly slow; advocates scheme which would allow warders to retire after 26 years' service, 9008–10.

Prisoners' Aid Societies. Not supported by the public as they ought to be; each society would benefit by a small capitation grant; and they should be allowed better opportunities of seeing prisoners before discharge, 8975–80.

PRIMROSE, Mr.:

Secretary to the Office of Works, 11,136.

The only articles now supplied to the Office of Works are tin paper-trays, and baskets for the Post Office, 11,137; considerable delay is often experienced, mainly owing to the locality of the prisons (Portland and Dartmoor) undertaking the work. The Prison Commissioners decide where the work shall be performed. Nothing in the nature of a prison labour conference between Commissioners and Office of Works during the past eight years; communications are of an informal kind, either verbal or by note, 11,138–41.

Work discontinued owing to delay and other causes. Mat-making in 1892, owing to delay alone, 11,137–11,146; the prison department has been urged to keep a stock of common articles constantly asked for; the principle of the Office of Works until quite recently has been to avoid stores, and the consequent stores accounts; a small store of household articles now kept. Raw material all found by prison department. Value of mat-making industry for London 100*l.* a year, 11,146–9; carpet-beating was undertaken from 1884 to 1889, then refused on the score of the health of the prisoners, noise, and dirt. Work now done by contract at a cost of 450*l.* a year, 11,137.

Industries which might be undertaken. In 1889 brush work was applied for, correspondence ensued with Treasury and Home Office without result. Total cost of London supply of brushes and brooms was at this time 1,600*l.* a year. One half of the articles (the commoner kinds), representing about 800*l.* a year, might be supplied by the prisons, 11,137. The present cost of washing for the Government departments is 3,500*l.* a year. Some five years back Manchester prison was understood to be willing to undertake the work, 11,145; knows of no objection to giving laundry and needle work to the large rescue homes, but as each department manages its own laundry work the authority of Government would be required before the present system could be altered, 11,151; other possible industries sewing and hemming of dusters and towels, and the supply of firewood, i.e., the small quantity of bundle wood required, faggots are principally used, 11,149–50.

ROGERS, Mr. HENRY:

Assistant Inspector of Reformatory and Industrial Schools, 2379.

Fifty-one reformatory schools, 140 industrial schools, 22 day industrial schools, 14 truant schools, 2380–82; the different characters of the two classes of schools to be noticed in the two sets of boys, 2383–86.

Preliminary imprisonment a barrier to committals to reformatory schools, 2387–89; feeling as to this stronger in Scotland than in England, 2390–92; though prison not always bad for a boy about to go to a reformatory, thinks after 40 years' experience you can get on as well without it, 2393–95.

Boys less criminal now, old training gangs broken up, 2396–402, 2534; very few incurably bad, and the younger the more hopeful the case, 2535–37.

Thinks for special cases age of admission might be extended to 18, 2403, 2404; this involves classification, e.g., schools for those above 16 on admission, and for those below 16; no difficulty in this; e.g., also Redhill, 2405–17, 2423–37, 2528.

License system not so much used as it should be; older boys kept because they are profitable, 2418–23, 2450–76, 2481–87; therefore approves Act of 1890 limiting age of detention to 19, 2449; effect of that Act, 2518, 2519.

Reformatory schools a great success; at the lowest estimate 70 per cent. reclaimed, 2438–46, 2522; various reasons for different success of different schools, 2496–503; if older boys taken necessary to increase Government grant, 2447, 2448; present voluntary system works better than would one more under official management, 2477–80; reformatories supported by Government grant of 6*s.* per head, by grant from committing authority, and by subscriptions, which have of late fallen off, 2484–87.

Knows of no case of Home Office actually revoking the certificate of a reformatory, though it has happened in the case of Industrial Schools, 2488, 2489.

Objects strongly to the mixture of reformatory and industrial school cases at Feltham, 2490–95.

Thinks limit of size for a reformatory should be 60, 2507.

Agricultural training invaluable for improving physique, 2508–12; would not give sedentary occupation, or anything like oakum picking, or the crank to boys, 2523–25; some boys do follow trades learnt in a reformatory, 2513, 2514; needlework, knitting, and machine work good for the girls, 2515; boys and girls invariably drilled to improve physique, 2516, 2517.

Does not think grave abuses in the way of punishment exist; there is corporal punishment, and every punishment is registered, but discipline mostly carried on by marks and rewards for labour, 2529–33, 2538.

RUDGE, MR. J. J.:

General Secretary of the National Flint Glass Makers' Trade Union, 11,030.

WALKER, MR. J. H.:

Corresponding Secretary of the Manchester District Flint Glass Makers' Union, and president of the executive for the whole trade, 11,031.

In attendance at the request of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Union Congress, 11,032.

Foreign prison labour: for resolution passed at Norwich this year (1895) see Report of Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Union Congress. The mat-making industry is seriously affected to-day by foreign prison labour, 11,057.

Training of Juveniles in Reformatories and Industrial Schools. At the Congress holden at Belfast in 1894 the following resolution was moved and carried:—

"That in the opinion of this Congress it is highly desirable that so much of the Industrial Act, 1886, as compels magistrates to commit children to prison prior to being sent to a reformatory should be repealed; and it be an instruction to the Parliamentary Committee to take such steps as should bring this about."

An amendment in the following terms was moved and defeated:—

"And this Congress further considers it desirable "that the Industrial Act should be amended so as to "effectually check the practice of placing upon the "public market, in competition with the products of "skilled craftsmen, articles manufactured in reformatories and industrial schools, and also to prevent "the partial training of youths in skilled trades for "the purpose of sending them out to supplant "qualified adults," 11,035–39; Trade Unionist view distinctly in favour of industrial training in reformatories and industrial schools, but the products should be utilised in the institutions, 11,037, 11,040–1, 11,073; not partial, but real training, 11,094; no serious competition on the part of reformatory schools, 11,092–3.

Adult labour. Witness (Mr. Rudge) agrees that so far as the outside markets are concerned the result of prison labour has been very much exaggerated, 11,045; and that the estimated value of prison labour (120,000*l.*) is an almost infinitesimal proportion of the labour of the country, 11,046–50. The mat-making industry is seriously affected to-day by foreign prison labour, 11,057; in fact is suffering more seriously from competition to-day than a few years back, 11,059. Trades Unions could not complain if regulations were framed for putting the products of prison labour on the market at a fair market price, 11,060–63. Agrees that articles supplied by the prisons to Government departments are probably of a special character, demands for which constitute a special class of work; and that prison labour in this direction would not come into competition in the sense that it might in the mat-making industry, 11,065–7; also as to the necessity for employing prisoners productively, but the Government should not become manufacturers on too extensive a scale, 11,082–90; knows of no industry other than mat-making, which specially interferes with outside labour, 11,102.

Mr. Walker concurs.

RUGGLES-BRISE, MR. E. J.:

Appointed Commissioner of Local and Director of Convict Prisons in January 1892, 9968–9969.

Constitution of the Board; an amalgamation of the two boards was effected about 1887, 9971–76; Board meets seldom as a board, six or seven times a year; each Commissioner has his district for which he is responsible and within which he has large powers; but large questions of general administration, and questions referred by Home Office, dealt with as a rule by chairman alone, 9977–87.

Secretary the mouthpiece of the Board, individually and collectively; his position depends largely on his individual character, 9988–92.

All clerks are clerks of the Board, but are divided into three departments, with each of which the chairman, being an absolute authority, works directly, 9993.

Chairman has a confidential clerk or private secretary with whom as a sort of staff department he settles all junior appointments in the service, 9994–10,003; but governors and deputy-governors never appointed without Board meeting, 9996; and promotions are in the hands of the Commissioner for the district, 10,004; annual report practically in the hands of the chairman and his unofficial secretary. 10,005–10,007.

Inspectors are under the Board and report to it: but each Commissioner also sees individually the inspector for his district, 10,011–10012; danger of inspection degenerating into routine; would have no fixed district for inspector but order him here and there; much of the routine might be done by visiting committees, 10,356–65; no lady inspectors, but in favour of having one, 10,014–10,015; against having inspectors report direct to Home Secretary, 10,026, 10,357.

As Commissioner, visits each local prison once a year, as Director, each convict prison once a month; discusses his notes with the Board, 10,008–10.

In favour of classification, but beyond convict "star" class very difficult; any system must not be too rigid but must leave much to discretion of governor and local magistrates, 10,015–21; if inebriates and epileptics were separated and age for reformatories raised no doubt prison population would be much reduced, 10,034–36.

Strongly in favour of encouraging local magistrates to exercise their powers under Act of 1877, but supremacy of Home Secretary must be maintained, 10,022–25; Commissioners might arrange to meet them on their visits, and the regulations might be a little altered, 10,268–79.

As to chaplains, would extend system of not appointing permanent chaplain to smaller prisons, but bring in outside clergy; difficulties in the way of extending this to ministers of dissenting bodies, 10,027–33; would increase number of female scripture readers in large prisons, 10,070–73.

Does not think an intermediate establishment between prison and liberty practicable, 10,037.

Methods of prisoners' aid societies open to improvement; there should be uniformity and the chaplain should always act as honorary secretary, 10,038–41; in favour of adding to list more rescue homes for female prisoners and admitting to prisons all representatives of societies officially recognised by Home Secretary, 10,060–65; so too with rescue agencies generally, e.g., Salvation Army, for such agencies the only hope for recidivists, 10,295–308; recidivism is large enough, even if not increasing, 10,291–95; in favour of giving more encouragement to well-behaved prisoners by wages and other rewards, but not smoking. 10,042–45.

Present system of education in prisons not satisfactory; would abolish limit preventing education before four months of sentence are completed, 10,047–51, 10,310–14, 10,367–73; would not object to collecting prisoners in small classes for instruction, 10,315–20.

Does not think silent system, as carried on in convict prisons with necessary qualifications, works badly, 10,052–59, 10,086–10,087; but cannot say that changes (few, however) consequent on Kimberley Commission, 1878, and stricter supervision, have brought better results, 10,192–203.

Trades in prisons should be taught by skilled workmen, 10,046; not sufficient care taken, save by individual governors, to select work for women likely to be profitable on discharge, 10,066–69; the organisation of work generally susceptible of improvement, 10,321–26; in favour of open air agricultural work for prisoners, 10,250–53.

ANALYSIS.

Admits over-crowding in some female reception cells may exist, but efforts made to avoid it, 10,073–75; also admits there has been over-crowding in London prisons, 10,095–107; reduction in number of prisoners due largely to shorter sentences, therefore admits necessity of care in closing prisons, 10,280–86; you might perhaps deal with cases under, e.g., the Education Acts, Vaccination Acts, &c., otherwise than by sending to prison, and so make room, 10,286–91.

Opposed to prisoners performing personal services for warders, e.g., cooking, 10,076–80.

Night duty of warders should not be reckoned as day duty, but modifications should be made in specially hard-worked cases, e.g., matron at Holloway, 10,081–85.

Flogging in convict prisons inflicted on the sentence of a director, after a trial on oath, 10,089–93.

Considers numbers and present proportion of staff generally sufficient, 10,108–14, 10,139–41, 10,352–55; and that assistant warders as a class are not more discontented than all large bodies of public servants, 10,127–31; a contented staff of great importance, 10,132; temporary officers still, but to a reduced extent, employed; does not think this results in trafficking, 10,133–38, 10,309; apparent discrepancy between staff shown on estimate and actual staff a source of discontent, 10,374–84; would, as in Scotland, take clerical from disciplinary staff by promotion and then let the clerical staff be eligible for promotion in the prison service generally, 10,346–48.

Commissioners keep themselves informed by visiting themselves, investigating complaints, reports of inspectors, and other head-quarters officials of visiting committees, 10,115–26, 10,142–47.

Outbreak at Wormwood Scrubs before his appointment, 9970, 10,148–51; does not think that the question of allocating blame for it arose, 10,182–88.

Case of apparently illegal punishment of a prisoner, J. E., 10,154–64, 10,174–80; this should have been checked by the inspector and the Commissioner, 10,165–70, 10,176.

As a matter of discipline a governor may keep a prisoner out of chapel for a short time, 10,189–91.

Cannot account for higher death-rate in English than in Irish prisons, 10,204–12; nor for fact that for a whole year there was no case of flogging in Irish prisons, though there have been cases in England, 10,213–26; does not think it a fair deduction from such figures alone to say that Irish prisons are more humanely administered than English ones, 10,218.

Important to have medical officers conversant with mental disease, but this not insisted upon at present in their qualifications, 10,227–31, 10,242; medical staff at Holloway, a special case, perhaps not strong enough, 10,243; lunacy in prisons naturally a higher per-centage than outside, many recidivists are weak-minded, 10,232–38; in weak-minded cases separate confinement should be modified, 10,923–41.

Present medical inspector does not pay periodical visits; doubts whether this is necessary, 10,244–46.

No Sunday exercise, because staff on that day not at full strength, 10,247–49.

Small cells at Dartmoor and Portland condemned and to be rebuilt, 10,254–57; there is a difficulty at Portland in that the Directors have no power under statute to hold land, 10,258–65.

In favour of small as opposed to large prisons, but the latter a necessity in London and large towns, 10,338–40; there should be a deputy governor where you have 500 prisoners all told, but he must, of course, understand he has more than mechanical duties to perform, 10,341–43; opposed to system of chief warders in charge; if a man is good enough for promotion he is good enough for title of governor, 10,344–46.

Suggests as a matter for consideration the amalgamation of the two systems of local and convict prisons, a matter touched upon by the Kimberley Commission, the minimum sentence to penal servitude is now so short that the convict might pass his whole time in the local prison, the convict prisons being set free for recidivists, persons under indeterminate sentence, &c., 10,385–88.

Also that category of first-class misdemeanants might be extended to bring in persons not ordinarily regarded as criminals, e.g., education, vaccination, &c. cases, but not debtors, 10,396–98.

The difficulty in concentrating prisoners is the difficulty of removing them from their relatives, 10,399–401.

In dealing with unconvicted prisoners in prison admit that those who have money and can buy better food than the best prison dietary have to that extent an unfair advantage over poorer men, 10,402–11.

SCHUYLER, CAPTAIN E.:

Deputy-governor at Wandsworth for past three years, 2539, 2540.

As to overcrowding. Necessary at Wandsworth in order to show compliance with s. 17 of Act of 1865 to add hospital, punishment, &c. cells to ordinary cells, and even then necessary to place prisoners in association or to transfer them, practically ignoring Rule 26, 2542–53. Association attended with serious evils and should be abolished; transfer an expensive process, 2556–59.

As to letters, a relaxation in vogue at Wandsworth is to send in prisoners' behalf form "L. P. C. 3"; this in place of governor's writing for prisoner, which is infrequent, 2560–64. Would give a larger discretionary power to governors to allow special letters, 2565–67. No necessity for same relaxation with regard to visits, 2568–69. As to Prisoners' Aid Societies, disagrees with a minute of an inspector requiring agents to apply to the Commissioners in first instance, and would allow any bonâ fide society access at governor's discretion, 2570–81.

As to prison offences, more frequent with those imprisoned for the first time, and in early stages, than with habituals, 2582–83. Governor has sufficient discretion, 2584; thinks some punishments inflicted by visiting justices, e.g., 14 days on No. 1 punishment diet too severe, 2585–90; in connexion with prison offences, prisoners at Wandsworth allowed to call other prisoners as witnesses, 3128–31.

As to marks system thinks prisoner in hospital should not have withheld from him, as at present, grant of marks towards gratuity, 2591–99.

Thinks on the whole that at present soldiers provide better warders than civilians, 2601; warders' hours are too long and the subject of complaint, 2602, 2603.

Unproductive labour objectionable, 3132, 3134–38; hands in return showing how crank labour creates prison offences, 3139–42 (see Appendix VI.); picking oakum as bad as crank labour, 3187–90, 3207–11, 3310; advocates graduated scheme of labour, 1st class, unproductive labour, 2nd class, unskilled labour, 3rd class, simple skilled labour, e.g., sack-making, knitting; 4th class, superior skilled labour, e.g., shoe-making, carpentering, &c., 3132, 3133; admits knitting a last resource, 3191–98; would be glad to add to appliances for industrial training, particularly in association after the first months's imprisonment, 3146–50, 3212; this would necessitate increase in staff, 3202–6; benefits of association outweigh the danger of talking, which is greatest in chapel, 3151–54; agricultural labour requires more land than now available, and larger staff, but would be very good for prisoners, 3231–38; little surreptitious work in well-conducted prison, 3155–57; regrets the loss of mat-making, 3158, 3159; hours of hard labour not too long, 3143–45.

Would interpret liberally rules as to books, 3160–62.

Would abolish plank bed except as special punishment, 3162, 3163, 3241–44.

As to diet would allow all prisoners of over seven days to commence on second class diet, 3164, 3165, 3225; the doctor's business to settle diet in cases of continuous short sentences, 3226–30, 3248–56; objects to substitution of light hand-cuffs for dietary punishment, 3166, 3167.

Would allow prisoners for term of over six months to earn remission, 3168–71.

Would allow more discretion to governors, 3172, 3173.

First offenders should be kept separate, 3174; not prepared to express opinion as to young offenders up to 21, though there is a chance of reclaiming the young, 3175–79.

Imprisonment harder on those from one class of society than on those from another, but does not see practical method in large prisons of making distinctions, 3180–86; differential treatment would soon get known in the prison, 3200, 3201, 3239, 3240.

Prisoners complaints generally made to the V.C. or the Inspector, though direct appeal to the Home Office is possible, 3213–17.

Ventilation at Wandsworth sometimes defective, 3221–24.

His experience at Wormwood Scrubs in connexion with the outbreak there, 3261–73.

Staff, including schoolmasters, inadequate, though not true exactly to say it is supplemented from highways and bye-ways; warder's daily hours about 10½, and only one schoolmaster with his assistant for about 1,000 prisoners, 3278–80, 3299–3307.

True, if prisoner is not employed in associated labour, that 22 hours out of the 24 are passed in the cell, 3284–85.

True that punishment diet is mere stirabout, bread and potatoes, 3286–90.

Not true that prisoner as a rule learns nothing in prison that is useful to him, 3291–94.

True that for first two months prisoner gets none but religious or school books, 3295–98.

Not true that discharged prisoners often rendered unfit for labour by needless severities, 3309.

SHAW, DR. T. CLAYE:

Principal of Banstead Lunatic Asylum for 18 years, previously at Leavesden Asylum for seven years; lecturer on lunacy at S. Bartholomew's Hospital, 5947–57.

Banstead receives pauper patients, and during 18 years the number received from prison has been 68, 36 males, 32 females; not aware how many of the latter are cases which have been sent to Holloway for examination, 5948, 5958–64.

Aware of cases in which insanity has been developed in prison; kind of evidence which leads him to this conclusion mainly derived from questioning the patient himself, 5965–71; admits that he may not discover or be told of periods of temporary insanity in earlier life, 6039–47; and that in a number of cases prison life may merely develop seeds of insanity previously existing, 6079–85.

Case of a girl, C. A., received from Wormwood Scrubs; she clearly developed adolescent insanity in prison, 5972–7.

As to prison treatment; strongly opposed to low diet and prolonged separation; latter fosters hallucinations, increases subject consciousness, and leads to self-abuse, 5978–80, 6030: want of sufficient open-air exercises, especially want of Sunday exercises, is also bad, 5987–91, 6027, 6068–73; a modified separation with good food, four hours a day exercise, and work, might last a considerable time, 6001–6.

Present system whereby medical officer has full power where he thinks fit to order association and better diet is right, 5981–6.

No moral insanity without brain impairment; if you examine prisoners by psycho-physical processes you will almost universally detect a neurotic taint, 5992–4, 6048–53; fear of punishment has not a psycho-physical effect with the insane, but admits that lunatics are more or less amenable to rewards or punishments, 6054–8; personal castigation unnecessary, 6059–61.

His experience of criminals, that of an asylum physician not that of a prison doctor, 5995.

Admits that certain crimes display high intellectual qualities but this, as in case of sparks of genius, is not inconsistent with theory of insane condition of criminal or neurosis, 5996.

Practically all criminals being lunatics should be treated more as patients than prisoners; punishment should be entirely subordinated to medical treatment, 5997–9, 6012; principal officer of a prison should be a medical man, 6013.

The majority of prisoners under his observation have been addicted to use of tonic agents, 6000; and short sentence recidivists, e.g., inebriates, who are especially liable to mental instability, 6007–11.

On question of insanity of prisoners generally admits that he would feel bound to find evidence other than the crime committed, but would fully expect to find it, 6014–24.

The class commonly called weak-minded should be seen medically every day, but it is on admission that there should be an exceedingly close medical inspection, and this is an immense undertaking, 6026, 6062–5; the proper way of dealing with this class is to keep them in an institution on the principle of Broadmoor, 6074–8.

As to employment of persons in unstable or neurotic state; that in the open air and on the land is much the best, 6027*a*, 8.

For females some light form of exercise combined with work in the open air, e.g., gardening, would be the best thing, better than walking round and round a yard, 6031–8.

The great and growing disinclination on the part of medical men to certify as to lunacy, increases the neurotic condition of individuals and population of prisons, and is likely to lead to disastrous consequences; many think that there is more neurasthenia about now than their used to be, 6086–91.

In favour of houses for inebriates, where they might be treated for long periods, 12 months at least; women are more difficult to cure than men, 6092–98, 6101–2.

In general hospitals proportion of fatal cases of kidney disease as ascertained by post-mortem examination is 25 per cent., and yet in his asylum post-mortems finds the proportion to be 45 to 47 per cent.; drink he regards as the cause; the proportion is higher with cases that have been but a short time in the asylum, 6098–100.

Qualifies his evidence that crime and lunacy are one by admitting existence of a limited class where bad initial training may cause an otherwise healthy brain so to function as to render a person a criminal, 6103.

SMITH, SUPT. G. E.:

Superintendent in the Metropolitan Police, 2249; evidence as to the preparation of Police Form No. 7; number of suspected persons at large and houses of bad character, 2252–69, 2290–301.

Does not think habitual criminals are manufactured by lads meeting in prison with men more hardened than themselves, 2272, 2273; boys growing up in evil surroundings slide easily into crime; they associate with others of about their own age, and not with older men, 2274, 2284–88; sometimes a man or lad drawn into crime again through difficulty of obtaining employment on discharge; in this respect prison acts harder on young than on old offenders, 2275–78; the difficulty of getting employment not so great in the case of women, 2315–18; women do not work in gangs so much as men, 2319, 2320; man not often drawn back into crime by meeting men he had become acquainted with in prison, 2275.

Not true that police sometimes unnecessarily give information as to the antecedents of a discharged prisoner, 2334–44.

Thinks reformatory and industrial schools and voluntary homes are all producing good results, 2345–65.

STONE, MR. J. H.:

Chairman of Visiting Committee at Birmingham, 2605, 2606.

Has only hearsay knowledge of working of system prior to transfer to Government, 2607; though not taking so strong a view as his predecessor, Mr. Manton, still, speaking as regards Birmingham, disappointed with results of Act of 1877, 2608–11; saving to Birmingham has been small, 2612.

But for Act of 1877 the magistrates would have gone on making improvements, e.g., associated labour, 2614–17; would extend associated industrial work, not for short sentence but for long sentence prisoners, 2640–46, 2714–17; this need not involve large increase in staff, 2718–20; disapproves of unproductive labour; none at Birmingham, 2647–51; aware of agitation against prison labour, but of opinion that local authority in a better position than Government to resist pressure of trade unions, 2618–21; open-air employment at Birmingham in stoneyards; this good for the men and popular, 2721–28.

As to communications with prisoners, thinks governor and visiting committee should have power to relax regulations, 2622; would enable local prisoners to earn larger gratuities, like convicts; prefers this to letting local prisoners earn remission, 2625–29; would give visiting committee power to punish prison offences by extending term of imprisonment, 2630–38; punishment at Birmingham very slight, and this policy is right, 2635, 2686–87; governor might have discretionary power to relax punishment, 2693–700; would abolish dark cell, 2638.

Very desirable that person who acts as deputy governor and has to supervise chaplain and medical officer, should be one in higher position than chief warder, 2652–61.

In favour of better classification of warders, abolishing class of assistant warders, 2662; hours and holidays of warders very fair, 2663.

Visiting justices should be consulted with reference to alterations and additions to prisons; instances to show how expense and local irritation might have been avoided, 2664–66; the ancient powers of the magistrates, or something similar, should be restored to them, 2667–71.

Analysis.

Children under 12 should not be sent to prison, and above that age does not think classification much matters, 2673; would not raise age for committal to a reformatory above 16, though you might have separate prisons under another name for older offenders, 2674–77; reformatory sentence of less than five years no good, 2677–79.

Short sentences for habituals no good, 2680.

Insanity, and cases of feeble mind, rare at Birmingham Prison, 2681–83, 2730–32.

Visiting committee visits in batches of two once a fortnight, 2684, 2685.

As to books would relax rules as to religious books only for first two months, 2688–92; teaching should be in classes, not in cells, 2703.

Staff adequate, even to secure Sunday exercise, to dispense with which would be a mistake, 2704–11; one hour a day exercise is sufficient, 2712, 2713.

STOPFORD, Captain W. J.:

A Director and a Commissioner, 1; appointed in 1863 Deputy-Governor of Chatham, and in 1870 a Director, 2; represents generally the views of the Commissioners, 4; states nature of Government inquiries into prison matters during past 30 years, 8–10; staff of Prison Department, 13.

Constitution and procedure of Board of Directors and Commissioners, 14–23, 542–46; paper work and visiting greatest part of business, 24–26; convict prisons visited by directors once a month, local prisons by inspectors once in two months, and by Commissioners once a year, 27–31; treatment of prisoners' complaints, 32–36; final appeal by prisoner to Secretary of State, 37, 38; punishment of prisoners, 39–48.

Duties and functions of inspectors, 49–54; no power beyond reporting, 55.

What are separate certified cells, 58–61, 547–51; there are a sufficient number of them, 62; explanation of discrepancies between Mr. Morton's return and the judicial statistics, 63–68; no serious over-crowding, 69–72, 364, 365, 552–61; Brixton Prison could possibly be obtained from War Department, if thought necessary, 73–77, 366; interpretation of term association "under special circumstances," 78–82; old cells at Portland and Dartmoor too small, 629–38.

Deputy-governor only appointed for prison with more than 700 prisoners, 83–85, 96; relative positions of governor and deputy-governor, 86–92; prison ought not to be for more than about 1,000 prisoners, 94, 95; chief warders (taken from convict or local services indifferently) are in charge of prisons having 100 prisoners or less, 83, 97–102; few complaints against this system, but it would be better to have a smaller number of prisons in charge of warders, 103–106.

Regulations governing visits to, and communications with prisoners, Standing Orders Nos. 203 and 213, 107–12; regulations as to visits not too strict in view of marks system, 113, 114; if certain visits tend to improve a prisoner, the privilege of receiving them not calculated to make prison discipline less penal, 115, 116; visits received from governor, chaplain (who can adequately get to know 600 prisoners), and doctor, 117–27, 366, 367; visits of prisoners' friends, mechanical arrangements perhaps defective, 457–65; discharged prisoners' aid societies, 128–30, 562–67; recent Home Office circular as to these societies, 131–9; fact that prisoners desiring help from other agencies than the aid society specially attached to the prison have to apply through that society places great responsibility in its hands; to this there are objections, 140–44; danger of allowing societies to compete for prisoners, 145, 146; no objection to let prisoners before discharge see list of agencies and make his choice, 147.

Regulations governing prison offences and book of rules, 148; rules based partly upon Act of 1865 and partly upon Act of 1877, 149–52; rules always read to prisoners, 153–56; no complaints from prisoners as to insufficient information about rules, 157; chief offenders against prison rules from the idle class of prisoners, 158; habitual criminals more amenable to prison rules, 159–60; average number of offences against rules by female prisoners less than by males, 161; "breaking out" not common with men but still prevalent among a certain class of women, 162–64; "dark cell" system has been abolished, 167; variations in number of punishments in local prisons, 168–69; prisoners in agricultural districts better behaved than those in manufacturing districts, 170; different results with different governors of prisons, and different systems of management, 171–79; London prisoners show more offences than country, 172; limitation of governor's power to punish, 180; limited by Act of 1877 and Standing Orders, e.g., No. 94, 181–84; Act of 1877 diminished the powers of governors with respect to confinement in punishment cell, 185; no disadvantage resulted from this diminution, 186–87; recommendations of Royal Commission of 1878 not acted upon as far as English prisons are concerned, 188–89; no necessity for acting upon them, 190.

Maximum of marks that prisoners can earn, 191–97; power of visiting justices and directors to restore marks forfeited, 198–200; number of prisoners who earn maximum number of marks, 201–3; marks earned by local prisons do not procure remission, 204–5, 207; in local prisons certain advantages as to treatment, 206; the rates of marks in convict prisons, 207–9; a three years' penal servitude man can earn remission, 210; a three-years' man better off than a two years' in a local prison sentenced to hard labour, 211–13, 228, 229, 230–34; three years' man gets better treatment as regards diet, 215; contrast of length of sentences of two years' and three years' men, 216–19; present system should be left as it is, 220; mark system in convict and local prisons set out in Standing Orders 494, 495, and 203 respectively, 221–28; better to "level up" local prisoner than "level down" penal servitude prisoner, 235–36; no "essential" distinction between nature of sentence in local prison as compared with sentence in convict prison, 237; mark system would have to be applied differently to local prisoners if it were to affect sentences by remission, 238–44; all classes in convict prisons arranged by marks, 245–48; strict line of demarcation between a sentence of penal servitude and one of imprisonment, 249–53; the whole subject worthy of consideration, 254.

Conduct of prisoners influenced by warders in charge of them, 255–57; no difference between warders who have served in the Army and Navy and civilians, 258–59; warders seldom changed in their wards and corridors, 260–61; warders should not be exposed to unduly long hours, 262–64; comparison of duties of warders and those of London Police, 265–67; not much dissatisfaction in the service, 268; though otherwise adequate, staff not sufficient to admit of Sunday exercise, 687–94; probation of warders, 270–77; appointment of warders, 503–4; vacancies not advertised, 278; limits of age for male warders, 279–83; for female warders, 284–5; pressure of work admittedly greater in some prisons than others, but no provision for shorter hours in specially difficult prisons, e.g., Holloway, 521–27; outside assistance for disciplinary purposes, 286–88; libraries for warders in all prisons, reading and recreation rooms in large prisons, 269.

Prison labour and occupation, 289–96; agricultural labour would be good, but facilities for it meagre, 605–14; separate confinement necessary for first month, 297–98, 478–79; convicts never put to associated work in local prisons, 299; they do their association after the first nine months, 300; as to productive and associated labour, good in itself, but a larger staff of officers required, and an extension of workshops, 301–4, 490–96; excellent arrangements at Wandsworth Prison and Wormwood Scrubs, 305–6, 600–4; difficulty in association of preventing communication between prisoners, 307–8; associated labour should be extended to sentences over six months, 309–10; isolated labour in cells a deterrent, 311–3; the question of juveniles different, 314; first offenders often thoroughly criminal, 315; associated work desirable for long sentence prisoners, 316; non-productive labour undesirable, being purely penal, 317–22; prison competition against outside labour, 323–28; all first month prisoners go to unproductive labour, 329–30; difference between strong and weak prisoners, 331–33; women prisoners engaged in different work, laundries, &c., 334, 505–17.

Chaplain has control of giving books to prisoners, 335–41; no objection to allowing prisoners to read as they wish when not at work, 342–44.

Article by Mr. Morrison in the "Fortnightly Review," 345–50; how prisoners are treated who are suspected of insanity, 351–53; Standing Order dealing with question of prisoners under medical observation (No. 134), 355–56; Dr. Gover's exact official position, 357–60; Dr. Gover appointed in consequence of recommendation of the Royal Commission of 1878, 361–63.

Juvenile and first offenders, 368–78; return of juveniles in prison, 568–71; effect of First Offenders and Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 379; boys do not mind prison as adults do, 387, 572–84; women dread imprisonment more than men, 388–90; definition of habitual criminal, 392–94; as defined in the Appendices, Nos. 8 to 11, of the 15th Report of Commissioners of Prisons, 395–98; return of number of young habitual offenders in prison, 399; circular of December 1893, with reference to contamination, issued by the Home Office; very little contamination goes on, 400–3, 592–99; separation of young from adult prisoners, 404–20; equality of treatment does not in its effect work equally well on all classes of prisoners, 420–26; resolution by Society of Chairmen and Deputy-Chairmen of Quarter Sessions to the Secretary of State (April 10th, 1894), 427–28; separate prisons for young and habitual offenders, 429–34; effect of reformatories, 435–37; age in reformatories limited by statute, 438; youths of over 17 should be sent to prison, 585–91, 678, 679; age of young offenders for separate treatment should be limited to 18, 439–40; behaviour of young offenders should affect their treatment, 441–44; question of first offenders dealt adequately with by the First Offenders Act, 449–52; first offenders of mature age are dealt with differently in the convict and local prisons, 453–56.

Visiting committees report direct to the Home Secretary, and have little contact with the Commissioners, 466–77.

Prisoners committed in default of finding sureties treated like ordinary prisoners, but without hard labour; system right, 497–502.

Prison officers supply their own food, 528–32; prisoners cook for all inmates of the prison, though wrong perhaps that they should cook the officers' meals, 529, 533–34.

Untried prisoners have no occupation but books, unless they volunteer to do work, 535–41.

Reports made by medical officer of the prison, 615–18; though trained hospital attendant upon the sick not insisted on, element of skilled nursing is present, 625–28.

No. 1 diet for seven days not injurious, 636–39; but, contrary to experience in the north, Indian meal not liked so well as oatmeal by female prisoners in London, 639–41; alteration of diet a serious consideration, 641.

Statistics of re-commitments, 647–60.

TALLACK, MR.:

Secretary of the Howard Association, 6851; claims to have more special knowledge of prison officials than of prisoners, 7015–17.

As to imprisonment generally, as a preventive against future offences and not act as a physical and moral deterioration, 6959–62; advocates more protection of prisoners in way of defence before visiting justices, 6976–81; objects to the system of posting prisoners' names outside their cells, 6905–7.

As to casual offenders, prefers this term to "first offenders"; advocates separate prisons and more relaxation in respect of penal dietary and plank bed; separation as the main element of deterrence, 6861, 6862; possibility of distinguishing them from habitual criminals, 6991–96.

As to visitation, advocates lady visitors in female prisons, 6896; general extension of the visiting system to all classes of prisoners, 6897; by local magistrates and municipal representatives and outside clergymen and ministers, 6897, 6923, 6924, 7003, 7004; admission of the public into prisons, 6971–73.

As to prison officials, advocates the improvement of warders by means of instruction and periodical meetings, 6898, 6955–58; prisons as training schools for warders, and as a reserve staff, 6899; better pay and prospects of promotion, 6900; considers that warders show harshness in some cases, 6918–20; proposes extension of the powers of visiting justices to the selection and management of warders, 6931–38; considers that the majority of large prisons are under officered, 6939–42; points out improvements which should be made in the condition of subordinate officials, 6944–54; in favour of civil to military warders, 6955–58.

As to prison accommodation, advocates limitation to 500 prisoners all told or to 1,000 of equal numbers of men and women with a proportionate increase of staff. 6901–5, 6823–30, 7007–10; increase of natural and artificial light, 6908, 6909.

As to prison labour, necessity for mental and physical occupations generally, 6868, 6869, 6963; of employment of the feeble-minded in the open air, 7027–29; oakum-picking, tread-mill, crank, and plank bed, unnecessary deterrents and unsatisfactory as a reformatory element, 6965–67. Associated employment: Failure in foreign countries, 6865–7082; mischievous effect of excess in convict prisons, 6865, 6875, 6876; objections to, generally on moral and economic grounds, 6870–74; possibility of making present position more useful, 6999. Separation in employment: Complete separation cruel in long sentences, 6867; advocated in sentences up to one year, 6867; better results of, in short sentences, 6868, 6869; with visitation advocated, 6968–70, 7019; amounting in England in some cases to isolation, 7020–22; as economical and as a factor in the decrease of crime, 6888; illustrations of cellular employment in certain foreign countries, 6877–87. As to juveniles. More juvenile imprisonment at present than there ought to be; advocates entire removal; principles of classification advocated, 6855; precocity of criminals as a difficulty in fixing the age, 6858; advocates system of probation amongst younger prisoners, 6564; objection to imprisonment generally even under separation, owing to prison stigma, 6986–90. Reformatories: Described by experts as "nests of crime," 6855; raising the age from 16 to 18 as limit of admission to, 6856; absence of public "stigma" attaching to, 6986–90; result of pernicious association with bad lads, 7030–35; establishment of "houses and homes" for detention of children pending selection of reformatory, 7044–59.

As to habitual offenders, separation of, from habitual criminals in mode of treatment, and more gradual and certain cumulation of penalty, 6863; advocates an alteration in the system of sentences, 6863; short sentences a cause of recurrence of crime, 7060–70; necessity for cumulative sentences for, 7071; relaxation of deterrent conditions of prison life a question of difficulty, 6861.

As to cumulative sentences, advocates a milder system for misdemeanants and petty offenders with a proportional milder increase for more serious offenders, 6863; system of probation under special officers as a factor leading to the decrease of crime, 6864.

As to prisoner generally, importance of placing of those of weak intellect in hospital cells, 6905–7.

Proposes that medical examination should be conducted by physicians and surgeons with hospital experience, 6909–11.

TAYLOR, MR. EDWIN:

Deputy-governor in charge at York; commenced his 38 years' service as warder at Salop in 1857, afterwards deputy-governor there and at Knutsford, and deputy-governor in charge at Aylesbury, 9371–74.

Prisoners at York, 96, 17 being females, average nearly 100, 9391, 9392, 9433.

Female prison unsatisfactory, an old dark prison of 60 or 70 years back, separate cells formed out of large rooms; number of prisoners small, however, and decreasing, 9479–81.

Male prison a good one for present number of occupants, 9482.

In general agreement with Mr. Walker, governor of Liverpool, 9376; except on following points:—(a.) Would not allow visiting justices further powers in administration, 9377–79; (b.) Mixed prison of over 700 should have deputy-governor, 9383, 9384; (c.) Size of prisons; maximum limit should be 700–1,000, 9385, 9386; (d.) Warders in charge; all officers in charge should be styled "governors," and should be classified to 5th or 6th degree; promoted warder to have 50 prisoners as outside limit, 9387–90; (e.) Prisoners' aid societies; present arrangements suffice, 9399–9409; (f.) Favours judicial inquiry into prison offences, which he understands to mean that governor judges between officers and accused; but objects to evidence by prisoners; forms his own estimate of value of officers' evidence from his knowledge of prisoner, 9411–17, 9509–14.

Association of prisoners; strongly objects to, unless under supervision, 9383.

Analysis.

Chapel services; attaches value to, 9568, but advantages nil if overcrowding is allowed; arranges prisoners 18 inches apart, and in line; against introduction of new preacher on Sundays, 9533–38; governor has no power to keep prisoner from chapel as a punishment, but has so treated prisoners on one or two occasions for misbehaviour in chapel, 9568–74.

Prison punishments; flogging necessary as a deterrent, but does not approve thereof, per se, 9418; governor has no power to keep prisoner from chapel as a punishment, 9568–74.

Prison labour should be productive; favours associated labour under proper supervision; tread-wheel at York is used for sawing and cutting of timber for military department; effect of as first stage punishment and deterrent; does not approve of the crank; females during first stage engaged in cells oakum-picking, knitting, or sewing, afterwards in laundry, 9418–34; a good word for mat-making, 9428.

Visiting justices; would not allow further powers in prison administration, 9377–79; but cannot endorse complaints of lack of interest, 9380–82; justices visit York once a month regularly, or at least 12 times a year, and examine and sign all books and journals; their powers and duties very similar to those of inspectors, 9546–52.

Prisoners' aid societies; the York Castle Prisoners' Aid Society, with fund of 50*l.* per annum, besides subscriptions from magistrates, &c. (no Government grant), does much good; of 1,300 men passed through the prison 300 or 400 have been assisted; agent sees prisoners before they leave in their cells or in governor's or chaplain's office on permission from governor, but only such prisoners as are recommended by chaplain, who is honorary secretary of society; equally satisfactory arrangements at Aylesbury and Knutsford, 9399–9410; good done rests in great measure with governor, 9539, 9540; approves suggestion that matron should act as unpaid agent in case of female prisoners; even with 200 prisoners in her charge could give time to work of society, 9541–45.

Warders in charge; all officers in charge should be styled "governors," and be classified to 5th or 6th degree; promotion from ranks not to be stopped, however, but should not be extended to clerks and storekeepers; promoted warder to have no more than 50 prisoners, 9387–90, 9469–72.

Warders on appointment should not be over 30 years of age; prefers civilian warders; favours suggestion that one or two of the smaller prisons be used as training schools for warders; one or two cases of harsh officers, but generally a satisfactory body of men; improvement since transfer, 9456–68; a good class of officers at Knutsford, 9501–9503; discipline of warders most unsatisfactory at York on his appointment; not properly trained; governor should not leave their training altogether to chief warder, 9489–9508; warders under witness when in charge of convicts contented with pay and hours, 9515; take their tone very much from governor, 9531.

Convicts in local prisons. Evidence applies only to Aylesbury and Knutsford: no convicts at York. Has witnessed no ill-effects of present practice, but convicts an undesirable element, being more difficult to manage; no other objection; no danger of contamination owing to separate treatment; larger staff necessary, 9442–49, 9483–88, 9515–26.

No overcrowding at Aylesbury, Knutsford, or York, 9450.

Prison teaching; favours cellular teaching; increased work counterbalanced by fact that fewer prisoners now require instruction; schoolmaster should be uniformed officer; at York no master; the one man being taught is in chaplain's hands; has himself helped prisoner, 9451–55; no report made at York as to education of prisoners as a body, 9563–67.

Marks system; it should be possible to earn more money, 9435.

Drunkards; favours separate treatment and compulsory detention, 9439, 9440.

Habitual criminals; favours cumulative punishment; sentences now too short, 9441.

Visits and communications; favours suggestion that governor be empowered to relax rules after first three months, but stage system answers very well, 9388, 9389.

Hopeful view of reclaiming prisoners; has seen many reclaimed, 9438.

Advocates plank bed for first month for males especially, and No. 1 diet for seven days, which has not lowering effects on male prisoners, 9473–78.

TREVARTHEN, Mr. JOHN:

Has been 32 years secretary to the Philanthropic Society's Farm School, Redhill, 2733–35.

History of the Reformatory (which is based on that of Mettray, in France, the institution being broken up into families), 2736–48; Parkhouse, a juvenile prison, referred to; it broke down, 2741–43; boys go to Redhill, about half from London and half from southern counties, 2749; despite case of Feltham, which is under a private Act, distinction between reformatory and industrial schools clear, 2750–63; admissions at Redhill confined as far as possible to the worst cases of criminal boys, practically habitual criminals, 2763, 2812, 2879–88; would be glad still, as before Reformatory Act, to take boys under conditional pardon, 2738–41, 2836; in their five houses attempt some classification of older and younger boys, and boys of different characters, 2764, 2852, 2853.

Have some youths up to 21, though Act of 1893 will prevent boys being detained in future after 19, 2765–69; boys of mature age retained for their own sake, not, as suggested by Mr. Rogers in alleging scanty use of license system, because they are profitable, 2770–73. Redhill compares unfavourably with other schools as to licenses, because of the number who are emigrated or passed into the Army, 2774, 2775, 2877; of licenses at Redhill about one-fifth revoked; the cases give no special trouble afterwards, 2873–76; disapproves of Act of 1893 limiting age for detention to 19, 2775–77; would extend age for reception up to 18, 2778, 2779; does not consider 60 youths of from 17 to 20 necessarily an unmanageable item in one house, 2854, 2859; would not be afraid to attempt reform of habitual criminals between 16 and 21, 2889–92. An institution half-way between reformatory and prison might be useful, but objects to the name "penal reformatory," 2893–97.

Redhill system of classification by houses might be extended to a system of classification by schools, for senior cases over 15 on admission, and for junior cases under 15 on admission, 2780–87; does not mean that a boy under 15 on admission should be transferred when over 15; each school should have a variety of ages within certain limits, 2870, 2871; no boy should be received for less than three years, 2786.

Thinks he represents generally the views of reformatory masters, 2788–90; as regards prior imprisonment certainly represents views of south of England, though not perhaps of the north and of Scotland, 2901–903.

Keeps record of cases discharged, and, taking an average of 10 years, finds about 92 per cent. doing well, about 7 per cent. re-convicted, and a little over 1 per cent. unknown, 2791–96, 2878.

If older boys are taken, Treasury grant should be increased, 2796–98; school has no large annual income, and has suffered severely from agricultural depression, 2799, 2800.

Act of 1893, abolishing necessity for prior imprisonment, mistaken policy, and has caused confusion. There must be an interval between the sentence and the finding of a reformatory; some boys are actually sent for some days to a workhouse despite danger of contamination, 2801–809, 2889, 2898–908. True that the objection to imprisonment was crippling reformatories, but the First Offenders Act, and the too free use of "voluntary homes" has had much to do with it, 2813–23, 2868, 2869.

Admits that varieties in rules of reformatories, some taking only the mildest cases under the Reformatory Act, introduces confusion between reformatory and industrial schools; the real distinction between them should be accentuated, 2824–29.

Defines criminal class of boys not by number of convictions, but by character; bad boys may long elude conviction; not surprised that there are many such boys in Poor Law schools; pauper lads going to Redhill generally unsatisfactory, 2830–35.

Results of reformatory system successful on the whole, 2837, 2838; boys should be kept as long as necessary, even to last hour of sentence, 2839, 2840; aggregation of large numbers is a mistake, 2841, 2842. As to labour, farm training pre-eminently the best, both morally and physically, 2843–46.

Outbreak at Gladstone House, Redhill, in 1892 not serious; ringleaders have turned out well, 2847, 2848.

Punishment used at Redhill: birching, caning, and cell confinement on bread and water for about a couple of days; this last very rare, 2849–51; house staff at Redhill consists of schoolmaster, who is as it were father of the family, and labour master; but there is a general superintendent for each department of the school, and there is a gymnasium which has been of immense service, 2855–59, 2916; there are, as a rule, three dormitories for the 60 boys in each house, 2860; status and education of officers at head of reformatories, 2861.

Not many boys who would be rejected by all reformatories as unfit for industrial training; hardly enough to justify a special institution, which would be difficult to work, 2862–67; class of boys in reformatories largely those whose environment has led them astray; in happier domestic circumstances would have turned out as well as others, 2912–15.

TROUP, MR. CHARLES EDWARD:

Senior Clerk in the Home Office (12 years in the Criminal Department), Chairman of the Judicial Statistics Departmental Committee, 11,536–8; and of the Committee on the Identification of Habitual Criminals, 11,575.

The following figures are taken from the 1893 statistics now in course of preparation. Certain tables handed in (see Appendix III.).

Decrease in the prison population. In 10 years, from 1883 to 1893, the daily average of the prison population has decreased by 33 per cent., but the reduction of the committals is but 3·5 per cent.; the reduction in the average term of commitment must therefore be about 29·5 per cent.; these percentages show that a great part of the reduction in the prison population is not due to actual decrease of crime, 11,559–62. (See Table A., Appendix III.)

A very reliable index on the whole of the increase or decrease of crime is the variation in the number of indictable offences, that is, those which can be tried on indictment; the annual averages, commencing with the year 1874, work out as follows:—For the five years from 1874 to 1878, 53,044; from 1879 to 1883, 60,080; from 1884 to 1888, 57,385; from 1889 to 1893, 56,472; the proportion per 100,000 inhabitants being respectively 217, 230, 208, and 194, showing a slight but continuous decrease for the last 15 years; diagrams to illustrate these figures will be published with the statistics for 1893, from which it will be seen that the number of crimes against property is so large compared with other crimes that the variation in the total of indictable offences is completely dominated by such offences; in fact, dominated by the offences of the larceny and embezzlement group. Larceny and one or two kindred offences constitute five-sixths of the whole, 11,563–8. Variations in the different classes of crime analysed; good ground to think that the decrease in crime, though not so great as it has often been represented, though by no means comparable, for instance, to the decrease in prison population, is, nevertheless, real and substantial, 11,568. (See Table B., Appendix III.)

Previous convictions of prisoners: 55 per cent. of persons convicted at assizes and quarter sessions in 1893 had one or more previous convictions; the proportion, however, in only 48 per cent., when all previously convicted prisoners, whether tried at assizes, quarter sessions, or by courts of summary jurisdiction are taken into account; probably, however, a good many escape identification. In 2,988 cases the previous convictions had been on indictment, and in 2,347 on summary process only, 11,569–71. In London, the proportion having previous convictions recorded against them is only 47 per cent., as against 70 per cent. in Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Staffordshire, 79 per cent. in the boroughs of Liverpool, Birmingham, and Bradford, and 61 per cent. in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk; which seems to show that in an enormous place like London the police are less able to trace a prisoner's previous history, and to record his convictions, 11,572–8. In France, 57 per cent. of persons convicted of serious offences at courts of assize in 1891 were recidivists (date of French statistics 1891, see 11,568). In England the percentage of 55 refers to a total of 9,600 cases; the French percentage to a total of about 3,000. Proportion of habitual criminals in Germany, Italy, and Switzerland also given, 11,580–7, 11,611–36. Proportion of second to first convictions for 1893 is 28 per cent.; very little increase, 11,592–3. For figures showing large increase in the number of prisoners having several previous convictions (due, partly at at any rate, to improved means of identification) see 11,594–11,601.

Sir E. Du Cane's figures very forcibly point to an improved system of identification rather than to an increase of recidivism, 11,637–42; a great advance in the last 10 years in this system at Scotland Yard, also at Birmingham, 11,643–4.

Proportion of re-committals in different classes of crime. Offences against the person, 30 per cent.; offences against property, with violence, 66 per cent., and without violence, 64 per cent.; malicious injuries to property, 42 per cent.; forgery and coining 37 per cent.; other offences in Class VI., 25 per cent. Offences particularised: larceny, 79 per cent.; simple larceny, 78 per cent.; burglary and housebreaking and kindred offences, 66 per cent.; robbery, 64 per cent.; false pretences, 44 per cent.; receiving stolen goods, 47; 11,579–80.

Ages at which prisoners are committed. The most criminal age in England is between 16 and 21, after that the numbers diminish very rapidly; in France it would appear to be between 21 and 30, 11,589; in Germany between 18 and 21 or 21 and 25, 11,591. For proportions at different age periods per 100,000 of the same age, also for the numbers of persons tried at courts of assize in France for similar age periods, see 11,589 and footnote. Of all persons convicted in 1893 the proportion under 21 is 41 per cent., but on the 31st March 1894, only 17 per cent. of prisoners were under that age, showing that the sentences of this class are very much shorter, 11,591.

For figures showing average length of sentences passed in cases of larceny in the West Riding of Yorkshire on prisoners convicted for the first time, the second time, and so on, 11,062 (see Table C. (1), Appendix III.); penal servitude figures, 11,603; similar particulars for Lancashire (excluding Liverpool City Sessions), 11,604–6 (see Table C. (2), Appendix III.). These figures point to an increase of punishment up to the fourth or fifth conviction, when the sentences fall away, the reason, in witness's opinion, being that those convicted of more serious larceny are by that time sent away to penal servitude and reduce the number of serious cases, 11,607; see also 11,605–50.

Proportion of women among criminals convicted of indictable offences at different periods of life. Under 12 the proportion of women to men is 7·32 per cent.; from 12 to 16 it is 12·18 per cent.; from 16 to 21 it is 14·48 per cent.; from 21 to 30 it is 17·93 per cent.; from 30 to 40 it is 21·74 per cent.; from 40 to 50 it is 26·42 per cent.; from 50 to 60 it is 26·66 per cent.; and above 60, 20·03 per cent. These figures do not imply that the number of female prisoners is actually increasing; probably some become criminals at a later period of life; at any rate reclamation is not so great, 11,608–10.

TURNOR, MR. ALGERNON:

Financial Secretary to the Post Office, 11,420.

Articles made for the Post Office. All the mail bags, pouches, and straps, and a variety of small articles, estimate for these articles for 1896, 20,000*l.*; also all the string required for the mail bags in London and in the travelling post office; stamping pads, notice boards, packing cases and boxes, estimated at 12,000*l.*; and waist belts, pouches, and leggings, representing another 1,000*l.* Total about 33,000*l.* a year. Work fairly done; delivery fairly punctual. No occasion to rescind orders or to cease giving orders, owing to bad workmanship, 11,421, 11,423, 11,429, 11,433. Tenders in the open markets not invariably asked for. In many cases the prison authorities are employed from year to year, and to a certain extent enjoy a monopoly. Prison prices considerably lower than the outside tender, 11437–41.

Work which might be undertaken. Boots for the telegraph messengers, 11,432; no boots made at present, 11,422; given punctuality, is quite prepared to extend work, 11,436; very much doubts the expediency of employing prisoners in making uniforms. An enormous quantity needed at a given date. At present there is one contract for the whole of Great Britain, and another for Ireland. Averse to splitting up of a contract into very small divisions, 11,442–8.

Analysis.

WALKER, Dr.

Medical officer at Holloway; in prison service 21 years, 3660–64.

Daily average at Holloway, in 1892–3, 707, maximum 826, minimum 554; annual total 22,168, 3665–75, 3822; Holloway a prison for males and females on remand, with convicted females in addition, 3671–73; ventilation good, 3676–80.

A general medical report sent in from convict but not local prisons, 3690.

Medical officer's duty to inspect prisoners on admission; daily average about 70; maximum about 160; they come in as early as 10 a.m., and as late as 10 p.m., 3693–97; description of a full day's work at Holloway, which falls on surgeon and assistant-surgeon on alternate days, from 9.30 until 9 or 10, 3698–3700, 3852, 3861–84; two men can do the work, but not properly, 3885, 3901–3904; evening group of admissions most numerous; the numbers make it necessary for the examination to be rapid, 3701–13; mental cases from 2 to 10 a day; many of them remanded from police courts for inquiry; their examination the most responsible work, which the surgeon does not leave to his assistant, 3714–28, 3870–74, 3883, 3884; a large number of these are cases of attempted suicide, 3861–65.

From brief experience in local prisons, does not think female prisoners maligner much, 3719, 3720.

Remand prisoners punished for breaches of discipline, e.g., threats, tobacco, &c., 3729–34.

Maximum time for which prisoners in time of pressure kept in admission cell awaiting medical examination perhaps two hours, 3909–3915.

Opposed to dietary punishments for long periods; majority are for two or three days, 3735–39; punishments at Holloway seen to by assistant-surgeon, 3740–45; not aware of serious physical mischief resulting from punishment, 3906–908; medical officer has power to suggest modification of punishment, 3755.

Little labour at Holloway, a remand prison; the laundry, cook-house, sewing, oakum, 3746–54.

As to diet, has represented that stirabout is not liked, and is largely wasted, 3757–59, 3891–900; danger of No. 1 diet becoming continuous in case of successive short sentences; has suggested a revision of the diet, increasing amount of nutriment, 3760–70; a low diet in prison, e.g., if the stirabout is rejected, may lead in the case of habitual drunkards to excessive drinking when released, 3928–33; this low diet does not act as a deterrent, 3771, 3772.

Position at Holloway more responsible than even in a convict prison, largely because of observations as to mental condition, 3773, 3774; about 600 remanded annually for observation, 3775–78; out of 88 cases of insanity in 1892–3 in Holloway, 72 were remand cases; some of them had frequently before been in asylums or prisons, 3780–91; bad cases are observed in hospital, others in ordinary observation cell, 3794–3800; agrees with opinion expressed by Prison Commissioners in 1880 that means should be devised to secure proper care of persons whose imbecility has conduced to crime, 3792; prisoners a class physically degenerate, and from which cases of insanity might be expected to spring, 3942–49.

Vital statistics of convict prisons; age-groups in prison records, and the Registrar-General's, should be made to correspond, 3804–12; in convict prisons finds death-rate in Group 20–30 to be 7·9, in Group 30–40 6·5, in Group 40–50 15·7, whereas in these groups for general population it is respectively 8·31, 11·52, and 16·9; not aware of similar statistics for local prisons; difficult to get any of value, sentences are so short, 3817–20.

In convict prisons mental condition of prisoners improved rather than deteriorated, 3821; work there in association, 3822; separation in case of convicts not possible as in case of short-sentence prisoners, whom it cannot injure, 3823–28; rule of silence not so rigorously enforced as might be imagined, 3829–33.

Medical officers in local and convict prison services on same footing, 3841; as to staff, discrepancy between actual number of officers and that shown on estimates, 3844–52; has noticed no effects of over-work on women warders, 3923–27; but infirmary staff too small, 3939–41; and general staff not sufficient to allow of exercise in the afternoon as well as in the morning, and Sunday exercise, 3952–56.

WALKER, Mr. MILES JOSEPH:

Governor at Liverpool since December 1893; previously governor at Preston, Leicester, Norwich, and Cambridge; entered service under the county as warder at Coldbath Fields, 1780–90.

Results of transfer of local prisons to Government satisfactory in respect of economy, discipline, and treatment of prisoners; anomalies, e.g., marks at Leicester, got rid of, 1792–95, 2219–26; but would be glad if visiting justices had some share in administration, better locus standi for recommendations, and a qualified power of appointment of officers, 2227–48.

Objects strongly to association of prisoners, unless an officer is placed with them, 1795–1801; no want of accommodation since he has been at Liverpool, but believes there has been pressure at times, 2143–50.

Has no deputy at Liverpool, though prison population averages over 1,000, of whom more than 700 are men; in his absence chief warder is in charge, and under him the matron on the female side, 1802–18; the same is the case at Strangeways, 1819–24; well satisfied with arrangement, so far as he is concerned; has very efficient chief warder, 1825, 2029–42; does not approve of system of placing chief warders in charge of prisons containing 100 prisoners; limit should be lower, say 50, 1826–33, 2035, 2036; would fix from 1,000 to 1,500 as maximum for a prison under a governor and a deputy, 2043–50.

As to visits and communications, present system operates well, but governors should have greater discretionary power, 1834–43; receptions at Liverpool average about 20,000 a year, and the total number aided in 1892–3 by Prisoners' Aid Society was 581; there is in addition a branch of the Church of England Temperance Society which meets prisoners on discharge, 1844–52, 1958–60; approves suggestion that prisoner should be enabled to see a list of agencies willing to help him, 1853–56.

As to prison offences, holds a judicial inquiry, and takes evidence from prisoners freely, 1857–61; present system of punishment works well, but governors should have more discretionary power in the way of relaxation; agrees with and adopts views expressed in Standing Order 94, 1862–67; does not approve of flogging per se, but it is necessary as a deterrent, 1868; visiting justices punish with discretion, 1869, 1870; how cases of violence are dealt with, 2203–18; approves suggestion to substitute a mild form of handcuff for dietary punishment in case of females, 1871–73, 1963–74; dietary punishment bad, because it may lower stamina of those who are badly fed outside, 1874, 1875; differences in behaviour of prisoners in different counties; at Preston indolent, at Liverpool Female Prison ignorant, at Norwich, an agricultural district, prisoners work well, 1877–82.

Mark system works admirably, 1883, 1884; no inequality between strong and weak prisoners save that a prisoner in hospital does not earn marks towards gratuity, 2191–202; against allowing local prisoners to earn remission, because sentences nowadays are too short, 1885–87; suggestion only reasonable in case of sentences of 12 months or more, 1975–93, 2090.

On the whole prefers civilian warders, 1888–93; hours of warders are very fair indeed, though there are "heavy" days, 1894–900, 2170–90; save in respect of provision for Sunday exercise staff is adequate, 2051–74.

Not much associated labour at Liverpool, but fully in favour of it, given proper supervision, 1901–10, 2157; women employed in whitewashing (their favourite occupation), laundry, knitting, making clothes, mail bags, picking oakum, 2158–69; opposed to unproductive labour altogether, e.g., crank, 1911–16; adequate industrial employment should be found for prisoners, 1917–22; for very short sentences practically no employment can be found save oakum picking, 2095–97; agricultural labour, e.g., digging, &c., would be excellent for a large proportion of labourers, and it would not excite opposition of trade unions, 2098–113; but a large staff would be required for supervision, in open ground say 1 warder to 12 prisoners, 2114–22; allows prisoners to read as much as they can without interfering with work, 1923–28.

Does not remember a case where prison life showed any tendency to develop insanity, 1929–31.

Juveniles under 16 kept entirely apart; in favour of so treating young offenders between say 17 and 21; little danger at present of contamination, but there is danger of recognition outside, 1932–52; birching better for boys than prison, 1998–2002; boys should only be sent to prison as a last resource and an absolutely separate prison for them would be a good thing, 2004–9, 2019–25, 2075; at all the prisons witness has had experience of, save perhaps Leicester, which is too small, a part might be enclosed off for some particular class, 2151–56; with regard to young offenders between 16 and 20 extension of reformatory system would do good, 2026–28.

A large proportion of prisoners return to prison again and again; for them can only suggest preventive remedy of longer sentences, 2010–18.

The present regulations affecting treatment of prisoners are not marked by severity, 2079–89.

No. 1 diet requires modification, at least it is quite low enough; it is frequently modified in case of repeated short sentences, 2123–32; stirabout largely wasted on female side at Liverpool; more so there than at Norwich, 2133–38.

WHEATLEY, Mr. WILLIAM:

Superintendent of the St. Giles' Christian Mission; for 27 years connected with the Mission, 7085–8.

Distribution of tickets to prisoners about to be discharged, 7096, 7097, 7102, 7104, 7156; access to prisoners refused by order of the Home Office, 7100, 7101, 7141,; in favour of all similar bonâ fide societies having equal advantages, 7106–12, 7153–55; lists obtained from police of prisoners about to be discharged, 7113; no comments on the institution of the Government grant, 7115; interviews boys in prison on remand, 7141–52; difficulty of providing ships for boys who desire to go to sea, 7182–84; difficulty of disposing of boys with physical defects, 7186.

As to the mission homes, accommodation in the four homes, 7119; advantages of the homes, 7121; percentage taking advantage of them, 7155–60; number of incorrigibles, 7162; medically unfit for hard work taken in, 7163–65; period kept, depending on circumstances, 7180, 7194, 7195; comparatively few cases of runaways, 7196, 7197.

Imprisonment of juveniles, objections generally to, 7122, 7140; bad effect of remanding to prison pending selection of reformatory, 7166, 7172–78; necessity of classification in prisons, 7167–71.

As to reformatories and industrial schools, advocates the raising of the age to 18; provision for more classification and separation of classes, 7126; preference for "ship" as a reformatory, 7185; necessity for relegating "runaways" to "ships," 7198, 7203–5; deficiency in the number of "ships," 7199–202.

As to prison labour, desirability of mechanics as warders to instruct boys, 7127–30; profitable employment as a support for prisoner's family, 7131–34; opposed to the present system of associated employment, 7135.

As to imprisonment generally, opposed to short-sentence system with habitual criminals, 7136–38; average physical inferiority of short-sentenced prisoners, 7189–93.

WILSON, Captain HENRY KENNETH:

Inspector of prisons for 16 years; previously governor at Gloucester and Maidstone, 9779–81.

Visits 16 prisons each once a month but without notice and at irregular intervals, 9781–85, 9965–67; visiting explained, 9789; reports once a year to the Commissioners and to his Commissioner personally or in writing each time he returns from a visit; not empowered to report to Secretary of State direct, 7848–50; favours inspector having charge of one district, 9933–36.

Act of 1877 a success in many ways, greater uniformity and regularity, but present system of doubtful benefit as regards reformation and deterrence; sending prisoners abroad beneficial, 9801; provisions in Act of 1865 directing inspectors to report by letter addressed to visiting justices does not apply to inspectors under 1877 Act; not in favour of that course being adopted, 9873–8.

Police supervision, baneful effect illustrated, such cases of frequent occurrence, 9801–2, 9871–73.

Prisoners' Aid Societies; good done only temporary, 9867–9868.

Intermediate establishment between prison and absolute freedom; favours suggestion, 9869–9870.

Assistant warders discontented with prospects, the class should be abolished and warders commence at 60*l.* rising to the maximum of that class, 9906, 9907; education of men passed by Civil Service Commissioners most defective, 9925.

Convict prisoners in local prisons; no necessity for convict warder if properly educated officer is chosen for local prison, 9919–25; local prison officials not discontented at having to do duty with convicts, 9906.

Marks system: prisoners sentenced for one year, 18 months, or two years should earn gratuity and remission in same way as does prisoner sentenced for eight months or under; such is the case at Prison de la Santé at Paris, 9810–13.

Classification of prisoners: approves suggestion that some means should be adopted to classify prisoners other than according to number of convictions; governor to use his discretion, 9830–37; so few half-witted prisoners, separate class not necessary, 9842; not in favour of separate treatment for debtors, 9844–47.

"Chief warders in charge" and "warder acting as matron": titles should be "governor" and "matron" respectively; matrons might be classified to 5th, 6th, 7th, or 8th degree; does not object to promotion of chief warder, 9852–61.

Warders take their tone very much from governor; no case of dismissal of warder on complaint of prisoner, but has reprimanded officer for harsh language, 9889–92; when warders report against prisoner has heard every witness brought before him, 9898.

Visiting justices. Attendance unsatisfactory at Swansea, 9838–41, 9937–46; against philanthropic visits to prisoners, good justices sufficient, 9953–60; the most useful and only independent outside body, should be granted increased responsibility to enhance interest in their work, 9947–52.

Education in local prisons; no special report made as to state of education of prisoners as a body; illiterates 20–21 per cent. 10 years back much higher proportion, 9962–64.

Habitual offenders; cumulative sentences a failure, short sentences not a deterrent, any sentence more or less useless for hardened offenders, 9798–9800, 9804, 9805.

Habitual drunkards, favours compulsory detention, 9807–9.

Cumulative sentences, not in favour of, 9803.

Prison labour should be developed; very much against tread-wheel and crank, 9814; favours associated labour, prisoners associated not to exceed 12, 9815; association rooms at Prison de la Santé at Paris, 9813; system of skilled instructors works well; whether prisoner can hold his own with outside world on discharge depends on length of sentence and good instruction; difficult to avoid competing with outside; produce, should if possible be sent abroad; few kinds of work in his district; governors should find work and submit samples to Commissioners for approval; satisfactory results of washing at Gloucester for infirmaries, &c., under his governorship, 9816–29; laundry work at Strangeways, result 1,100*l.* or 1,200*l.* per annum clear profit, 9936.

Separate confinement. Not in favour of but knows of no instance of insanity resulting therefrom, 9885, 9886.

Chapel services. Does not advocate change of preacher on Sundays, services two or three times a week sufficient; punishment would thereby be diminished as there is constant talking in chapel, 9862–66; has known governor to deprive prisoner of attendance at chapel, but has not approved of his action, 9932.

Decrease in number of prisoners under present system attributed to education, the great safeguard in the future, and to the working of the "Summary Jurisdiction Act" and "First Offenders Act," 9793–97, 9805, 9961; good effect of sending prisoners abroad, 9801.

WITHEFORD, Mr. EDWIN:

Chief warder in charge at Dorchester, formerly at Wormwood Scrubs; has had 18 years' service, 3957–63; average population in Dorchester Prison 70, including convicts, and military and naval prisoners, 3964–66, 3969; proportion of females very small, 3990–91; cell accommodation for 160, 3967.

Labour employed is tread-wheel for first-class labour, and oakum-picking and ordinary work about the prison for second class, 3971–78; non-cellular employment a privilege much appreciated, 4010–12; no profitable work at present, though hope soon to have an order for mail bags, 2981–88; no prisoners in association save in hospital, kitchen, and laundry, 3979–80, 4030–33; prisoners not employed on ground round prison, 3992–95.

Visiting committee visits about every third week; take personal interest in prisoners who are glad to see them, 3999–4007; Prisoners' Aid Society works well, 4017–20; no ladies on it, and no regular periodical visits from ladies, 4021–25.

As to juveniles, objects to imprisonment for mere children, though not prepared to speak very favourably of reformatories, 4034–42.

Prisoners at Dorchester mostly agriculturists; crime of a mild type, and prison offences few, 4013, 4026–29.

One hour a day allowed for exercise, 4016.

Staff consists of 11, and their hours are reasonable, 3989, 4014, 4015.

Memorandum giving a brief History of the Prison System in England and Wales.

Note.—Local prisons are designed for short-sentence prisoners, i.e., those whose maximum sentence is two years' hard labour. Convict prisons are for the confinement of convicts, i.e., prisoners sentenced to penal servitude, the minimum sentence for whom is three years. Some convicts are confined for nine months in local prisons while undergoing the first stage of their sentence, viz., separate confinement. Otherwise the systems are distinct.

I.—LOCAL PRISONS PRIOR TO 1877.

Common Gaols.

Under the Common Law all gaols belonged to the King, and by 5 Hen. 4. c. 10. it was enacted, that none should be imprisoned by any justice of the peace, but only in the "Common Gaol," saving the franchises of those who have gaols. Except in special cases the gaols were under the control of the sheriff, but the gaols which great noblemen or bishops were allowed to maintain must have been governed by these dignitaries, while the gaols which towns, liberties, or other bodies, having no sheriffs, were empowered by charter or otherwise to keep, must have been under the governing authorities of those bodies.

Houses of Correction.

By the 39th Eliz. another place of imprisonment was established for certain classes of offenders, under the name of "House of Correction," and 7 James I. c. 4. directs that, in every county, such a house should be established, and means provided for setting rogues and idle persons to work. These establishments were under the justices.

The custom gradually grew up of committing criminals of all classes to Houses of Correction, and was legalised by 6 Geo. I. c. 19. and 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 38. s. 3., by which latter Act even sentence of death might be carried out at these places; but debtors could still be committed only to the Gaol and vagrants only to the House of Correction; and though it became common to unite the two buildings under one roof, with one governing staff, the two superior jurisdictions of the sheriff and the justices over what was virtually one establishment were still maintained.

Union of Gaols and Houses of Correction.

The Prison Act of 1865, among other changes, abolished the distinction between Gaols and Houses of Correction, and, except for purposes of carrying into execution sentences of death, places the authority over the gaol entirely in the justices of the jurisdiction to which the prison belonged. The justices delegated their executive powers to a body selected from among themselves, called "Visiting Justices."

The "Prison Jurisdictions" were bound to provide prison accommodation for their prisoners. The cost of these prisons was defrayed from local rates, but a contribution of 4*s*. per head was made from taxes for food, clothing, bedding, and fuel of prisoners after conviction at Assizes or Quarter Sessions on a criminal charge, or after summary conviction under certain Acts of 11 & 12, 13 & 14 and 18 & 19 Vict. This contribution the Home Office could withhold, if the prison did not fulfil certain conditions.

Inspectors.

For the purpose of ensuring the fulfilment of the requirements of the law on various points relating to the treatment of prisoners and prison discipline, under 5 & 6 Will. IV., c. 38, Inspectors of Prisons were appointed, not to exceed five for Great Britain, who had power to visit all prisons, and enquire into all matters therein, and to report annually to the Secretary of State. The number of Inspectors originally appointed was five, but in later years there were only two, one of whom visited Scotland and the northern part of England, and the other the southern part. The present Inspectors are appointed under the Prisons Act, 1877.

Surveyor-General of Prisons.

In order to ensure due attention by the local authorities to the proper construction of prisons, certain powers were given to the Secretary of State by 2 & 3 Vict. c. 56. as to the designs of new prisons, or alterations of old ones; and under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 50. and 28 & 29 Vict. c. 126. he might appoint a Surveyor-General of Prisons, to whom all plans of proposed prisons or alterations of old ones were referred, and who was to advise prison authorities on the construction of prisons.

II.—LOCAL PRISONS SUBSEQUENT TO 1877.

The Prison Act, 1877.

Such were, briefly stated, the arrangements with regard to prisons in which persons were detained prior to trial, or under sentence of imprisonment before the Prison Act, 1877.

That Act made a great change in regard to the Local Prisons.

These had been governed by the "Justices" (of the jurisdiction they belonged to) "in sessions assembled," who, as already stated, were empowered to appoint from among themselves Visiting Justices to carry out the administration of the prisons.

The Prison Act, 1877, transfers to the Government, from 1st April 1878, all the charges for the prisons, and vest in the Secretary of State the power and authority till then exercised by the Justices in sessions assembled. It provides that he shall be assisted by a body of Prison Commissioners, one of whom shall be Chairman, to be appointed by Royal Warrant, abolishes Visiting Justices altogether, and confers on the Prison Commissioners "all powers and jurisdiction by any Act of Parliament, or "at common law, or by charter exercisable by Visiting Justices or a Visiting Justice "of a prison." It, in fact, provides that the Prison Commissioners shall completely replace and act in the stead of the Visiting Justices in administering the prisons. Inspectors are appointed to aid the Prison Commissioners in carrying out their duties of supervision.

Visiting Committees are to be appointed from among the local magistrates, to exercise the power of punishing prisoners for prison offences, to perform duties of inspection, and to report, but no administrative authority in the prison is given them. The Government and the local authorities, in short, have changed places, the latter, who had paid the charges and administered the prison, have become Inspectors; the former, who had inspected, have been saddled with the cost and the administration.

Since the Prison Act, 1877, the Local Prisons, which, in the beginning of that year, were 113 in number, have been reduced by the closing of Prisons to 58; 42 were closed during the year 1878–9, four during 1879–80, two during 1881–2, one during 1883–4, two during 1884–5, two during 1885–6, one during 1887–8, and two during 1890–1; but one of these, Millbank, was replaced by Wormwood Scrubs.

The expenditure for Staff has been largely reduced by the reduction in the number of Prisons, and it may be possible to carry the process still further, with the same result.

III.—CONVICT PRISONS.

Transportation and Penal Servitude.

The punishment of Penal Servitude is the successor to that of Transportation, which was first established in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and supplied means for the foundation, first of our American Colonies and then of those in Australia.

A history of the various steps which led to the present mode of carrying out sentences of Penal Servitude will be found in a volume on the Punishment and Prevention of Crime by Sir E. F. Du Cane, published in 1885 by Messrs. Macmillan & Co.

Transportation was, in its early stages, and continued for a long time to be banishment with enforced servitude to private employers. The abuses which accompanied this system led gradually to the Government retaining these prisoners under their own control during the greater part of their sentences, and employing them on public works. This description of employment was adopted both on account of the valuable results it produced, and because it fulfilled better than any other the conditions necessary for maintaining these large bodies of men in good moral, mental, and physical condition, and for so training them as to reduce the probability of their return to prison after discharge.

There were, no doubt, always a certain number of prisoners who, though sentenced to transportation, did not actually leave the country, and, until the hulks were established, these remained in the local prisons, for there were no others, as did also convicts in the interval between sentence and transportation. The cost of maintaining these was borne partly by a county allowance and partly by a King's allowance of half-a-crown a week, which the Sheriff charged for every transferred "Assize Convict" in his "bill of cravings."

Convict Prisons: Powers under which they were established.

The first prison establishments in England created specially to contain convicts sentenced to imprisonment instead of being sentenced to transportation were the hulks, which were established, as a temporary expedient, by Act of Parliament in 1776, when transportation to America became impossible. They were afterwards used for prisoners actually sentenced to transportation and while awaiting removal, but a great many were never actually transported. They were continued by Acts passed from time to time, the last being 5 Geo. IV. c. 84., an Act for the transportation of offenders from Great Britain. Under the powers created by this Act and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 121., an Act for providing places of confinement for female offenders under sentence of transportation, the Convict Prisons at Portland and Dartmoor, and elsewhere, have been established (see below). Millbank Prison, built at a cost of 458,310*l*., was established by 52 George III. c. 44., an Act for the erection of a Penitentiary House, and was opened in 1816 as a place of confinement for prisoners sentenced to imprisonment instead of being sentenced to transportation, and also for prisoners awaiting removal who had been sentenced to transportation. Parkhurst Prison was created under 1 & 2 Vict. cap. 82. for Juveniles sentenced to transportation or imprisonment. It was opened in 1838 and discontinued in 1863, as the establishment of Reformatories had rendered it unnecessary (see below). Pentonville Prison was established by 5 Vict sess. 2. c. 29., an Act for establishing a Prison at Pentonville, as a Model Prison in which the system of separate confinement might be applied to convicts under a sentence of transportation. It was made a Local Prison in 1885.

Creation of Prisons for Convicts to be employed on Public Works.

The difficulties in connexion with transportation led in 1847 to the necessity for providing additional accommodation in England. The hulks had by this time been thoroughly discredited; and it was determined to begin by constructing a prison at Portland, where the convicts might be employed in the construction of the breakwater and of fortifications for the defence of the roadstead and harbour. The prison was opened in 1848, and was the first of our public works prisons.

The Convict Prison at Dartmoor was opened in 1850 with a view to employing prison labour in reclaiming and cultivating the moor. It was formed by appropriating to this purpose the buildings, which in the war of the early part of the century had been used for French and American prisoners of war. They, as well as the land, belong to the Duchy of Cornwall, and are held on long lease. Considerable additions and alterations have been made to adapt them to modern requirements.

The Convict Prison at Portsmouth was opened in 1852. The prison hulks which used to be in the harbour were then closed, and the prisoners have since been employed in constructing the large addition to the dockyard, as well as in works for the War Department.

Appendix I.

The Convict Prison at Chatham was opened in 1856, and enabled the prison hulks which lay in the Medway and in the Thames at Woolwich to be closed. The prisoners have been employed in the large additions to the dockyard, and in works for the War Department. On 22nd February 1877, a small prison at Chattenden was established, where convicts were employed creating a Magazine Establishment for the War Department. It was treated as a branch of Chatham Prison till it was closed in February 1886.

On 3rd August 1874, a Convict Prison was established at Borstal, near Rochester, in which prisoners are employed constructing the chain of forts defending Chatham on the south.

In 1884, a Convict Prison was commenced at Dover, with a view to employing convicts on the construction of harbour works there. It was first occupied 28th August 1885.

A Convict Prison for invalids was opened at Woking in 1860, and replaced the "Stirling Castle" hulk at Portsmouth, which till then had been used for this purpose. This prison has been closed, as the diminution in the number of convicts enables the invalids to be accommodated in the other Convict Prisons. Such lunatic convicts who, from 1875 to 1888, used to be confined at Woking, have been accommodated at Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum since October 1888.

The prison at Parkhurst, originally a Reformatory, was in 1863 converted into a prison for female convicts, and since 1869 has been used for a certain class of male convicts.

The prison at Brixton was formerly the Surrey County Prison. In 1853 it became a prison for female convicts, and in 1870 for males. It has been completely reconstructed since 1880. It was in 1882 lent to the War Department for a Military Prison.

Female convicts are now kept at Woking, where a prison for 700 has been built for them entirely by prison labour. Their removal to Aylesbury has been decided on in order that all the buildings at Woking may be transferred to the War Department. Fulham Prison, which was established as a refuge for female convicts in 1856, was closed in March 1888, the great diminution in the number of female convicts making it unnecessary.

In 1869 a large part of Millbank Prison was appropriated to Military Prisoners under 32 & 33 Vict. cap. 95. These were removed to Brixton in 1882, and the greater part of this Prison was on 1st November 1883 appropriated as a Local Prison, instead of the prison for females at Tothill Fields, Westminster, which was discontinued. In the year 1886 it was entirely devoted to the custody of males and females under sentences of imprisonment. It was closed altogether on 23rd December 1890.

The prison at Wormwood Scrubs replaced Millbank as a Convict Establishment. It has been erected entirely by convict labour, at a cost of 109,687*l*. If built by contract it would probably have cost about double this amount. It was converted into a Local Prison to replace Millbank on 27th October 1890.

Chatham prison has now been closed in consequence of the reduction in the number of convicts, and it was handed over to the Admiralty on 17th March 1893.

Portsmouth Convict Prison will be closed this year and handed over to the Admiralty.

Supervision and Management of Convict Prisons.

The hulks, in their early days, were managed by Local Justices, and the cost of maintaining the Prisoners in them was placed on the Government in 1779. Such supervision as there was over them was exercised by the Court of King's Bench. Gradually the Home Office seems to have assumed power of inspection and control over them, which was legalised in 1815, and their connexion with the King's Bench was finally severed in 1825. Under 5 Geo. IV. c. 84. the supervision was exercised by a paid superintendent.

Millbank was first managed under a special Act of Parliament by an unpaid committee, then by paid Inspectors, then by Visitors. Pentonville was at first managed by a body of unpaid Commissioners. While the supervision of the convict establishments was passing through these various phases, the management and discipline of prisoners formed the subject of a great number of Committees of Enquiry. In 1850, by 13 & 14 Vict. c. 39., an Act for the better government of Convict Prisons, "The Directors of Convict Prisons" were appointed to manage all the Establishments in England and Wales in which Convicts under sentence of Transportation might be confined, and to exercise all the powers formerly vested in the various bodies who had hitherto managed them, by 5 Geo. IV. c. 84., an Act for the transportation of offenders from Great Britain; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 82., an Act for establishing a prison for young offenders; 5 Vict. c. 29., an Act for establishing a prison at Pentonville; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 26., an Act for regulating the prison at Millbank; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 104., an Act for amending the Act for regulating the prison at Millbank; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 26., an Act for abolishing the office of Superintendent of Convicts under Sentence of Transportation. The office of Chairman of this body was united with that of Surveyor-General of Prisons, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 50., and of Inspector-General of Military Prisons, in the person of Major Jebb, R.E., afterwards Sir Joshua Jebb, and they have always since been thus held by the same person. When in 1877 the charge and administration of the Local Prisons was transferred to the Government, and placed under Commissioners appointed by Royal Warrant, the office of Chairman of the Commissioners was united with the foregoing in the person of Sir E. F. Du Cane.

Transported Convicts.

No convicts have been transported to Australia since 1867, when the last shipload of 280 were sent to Western Australia. There had been Convict Establishments at Bermuda and Gibraltar, the former of which was discontinued in 1863, and the latter in 1875, but the convicts who were sent to these prisons were brought back to England for discharge, whereas those convicts who were transported to Australia were discharged there, and mostly became settlers.

There is still a small charge on the Imperial Revenue on account of the transportation system in the Australian Colonies of New South Wales, Tasmania, and Western Australia. The cost of certain invalids, lunatics, paupers, &c., for whose introduction to each Colony the British Government was held to be responsible, as arising from their connexion with transported convicts, is charged on the British Treasury. Under certain circumstances, also, persons sent out as convicts who have been re-convicted become a charge on this country. Besides these, there were on 31st December 1893 only about 41 persons in the Colony whose sentences had not expired, but who were maintaining themselves. The establishments in which any persons chargeable to the Imperial Government are maintained, are managed by the Colony, but a payment for each person for whom the Imperial Government is liable is made at a fixed rate per head.

Amalgamation of Votes for Convict and Local Prisons.

In the year 1887, the Votes for Local Prisons and Convict Prisons were amalgamated.

APPENDIX I.

REPORT ON THE PRISON SYSTEMS OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

NOTE.—This Report is a summary of memoranda obtained by the Foreign Office at the request of the Prisons Committee. A Schedule of questions was drawn up by the Chairman of the Committee and was circulated among Her Majesty's representatives in the countries named. The translations, which were designedly as literal as possible, were furnished either by the Government concerned, Her Majesty's representatives, or, in the case of France, Belgium, Switzerland, and part of the German Report, by the Secretary to the Committee.

The headings of the various sections are as follows :—

No.	Subject.	Page.	No.	Subject.	Page.
1	The constitution of the central authority for prisons.		14	Provisions for exercise

1. The constitution of the central authority for prisons.

AMERICA, STATE OF NEW YORK.

America, State of New York.

Over all State prisons the Superintendent of State Prisons is the chief authority.

The State reformatory at Elmira* has a local board of five managers appointed by the Governor of the State and confirmed by the State Senate.

The county penitentiaries have local boards consisting of three commissioners appointed by the Board of County Supervisors.

The prisons in the county of New York are under the Department of Public Charities and Correction, so are also those in the county of King's, the former consisting of a president and three commissioners, and the latter of a president and two commissioners.

FRANCE.

France.

The organisation and control of penitentiary establishments in France and Algeria are attached to the office of Penitentiary Administration at the Ministry of the Interior. That office comprises five departments, among which are divided the different services.

A superior council of prisons, composed of members of Parliament and the most capable officials of high standing, is entrusted by the law with the duties of following in two annual sessions the application of the law as to solitary confinement, and of giving advice on questions referred to it by the Minister of the Interior.

The penitentiary section of the general staff for the inspection of administrative services at the Ministry of the Interior comprises eight members who visit once a year, according to a division of districts, the establishments of all kinds connected with penitentiary administration. Buildings set apart for the correctional education of girls are visited by an inspectress-general.

These inspectors-general give account of their mission to the Minister of the Interior, and set out in special reports their observations and conclusions. Besides their tours of inspection they meet as a committee to consider questions and matters as to which their opinion is asked.

There are also at work at the Ministry of the Interior :—

(1.) A commission for the classification of recidivists whose duty it is to carry out the law as to banishment.† The president of the commission is a Councillor of State; the ministers of justice, of the colonies, and of the Interior are represented upon it; it considers whether the law has been duly carried out, and then issues a report on the manner and place of banishment* to which the Minister of the Interior as final authority gives effect.

* See account of Elmira on page 526.

† "Relégation."—Banishment to some colonial settlement, a special form of transportation introduced by the law of 27th May 1885 against recidivism. A recidivist held to be incorrigible may either be banished to some specified colony where however he lives as a free man, or, if he be a dangerous subject, he may be confined in a special establishment in French Guiana or New Caledonia.

(Boeuf's "Droit Pénal.")

(2.) A committee on conditional discharge, presided over by the Director of Penitentiary Administration assisted by officials from the Ministries of the Interior and of Justice. Its rôle is to inquire whether the case of a prisoner fulfils the legal conditions and affords the required guarantees for his conditional discharge before the expiry of his sentence, and to present a report for the guidance of the minister in coming to a decision. Appendix I

Germany—Prussia.

Prisons are partly under the jurisdiction of the Minister of the Interior, and partly under the Minister of Justice. Germany—Prussia.

Under the Minister of the Interior are classed:—

(1.) All prisons in which "Zuchthaus" sentences* are carried out.

(2.) Certain larger prisons (Gefängnisse†) where terms of imprisonment are performed, and persons under arrest (Haft‡) and under examination (Untersuchung) are detained.

(3.) Nearly all prisons in the Rhine Province.

Under the Minister of Justice come the greater number the remaining prisons (Gefängnisse) in which—

(1.) Prisoners under examination (Untersuchung) and persons temporarily detained are received.

(2.) "Gefängniss" and "Haft" sentences are performed.

(3.) Hard labour (Zwangshaft) and punishments for disorderly conduct (Ordnungsstrafen), in cases of civilians, are performed.

Houses of correction for the detention of beggars, vagabonds, prostitutes (par. 362 of the Criminal Code) are regulated and administered by the provincial authorities; the Minister of the Interior has the supreme supervision.

Austria.

The direct central authority is the Procurator-General (Oberstaatsanwalt) in each province, and the acts of this official are subject to the control and revision of the Ministry of Justice, where there is a special department for prisons under a departmental director. Formerly, only the prisons attached to police courts and other tribunals were controlled by the Ministry of Justice; but, since 1865, the Ministry of the Interior has also handed over all the larger prisons and penitentiaries to the former department. The upper officials have to obtain leave of absence from the Procurator-General, without reference to the Ministry, but the latter appoints all the chief officials in men's prisons and the inspector and doctor in women's. Austria.

Hungary.

Prisons in Hungary are under the immediate superintendence of the Ministry of Justice. The Department of Criminal Law and Prisons in this Ministry deals with all affairs relating to prisons. Hungary.

The Ministry receives daily reports on the state of the prisons and on the doings of the prison officers, and besides this the minister sends ministerial commissioners from time to time, as occasion requires, to inspect the prisons and to report on the result of their inspection.

Prisons attached to the tribunals are under the superintendence of the Public Prosecutor (Staatsanwalt), and those attached to the district courts are under the superintendence of the chief judges of those courts and of the Public Prosecutor.

Belgium.

The Minister of Justice, a director-general, an inspector-general, an inspector of buildings, a controller of accounts, and a fully organised clerical staff form the central authority for prisons. Belgium.

---

* "Zuchthaus."—The more severe of the two principal classes of prisons. Sentences to "Zuchthaus" are either for life or for a lesser term. Compulsory labour is enforced there. Prisoners may also be employed outside the prison, especially on public works.

(Brockhaus' Conversations Lexikon.)

† "Gefängniss."—The lesser of the two classes of prisons.

‡ In the German Criminal Code "Haft" mean loss of liberty. Offences against the police are punished by "Haft," consisting in loss of freedom, varying from one day to six weeks. This, in exceptional cases, can be prolonged to three months.

Vagrants, beggars, prostitutes, &c. can be set to labour adapted to their capacities and circumstances.

(Brockhaus' Conversations Lexikon.)

APPENDIX I.

SWEDEN.

Sweden.

All the prisons and other penal establishments of Sweden are placed under the control and administration of the Royal Prisons Board, consisting of one director-general who is chairman of the board, and two chief secretaries, one of whom is the head of the chancery department and the other of the financial department.

The board is quite an independent administrative body, acting in accordance with the rules of the Royal Ordinance of the 22nd of November 1877. It is only the King in Council who, on the report of the Minister of Justice, can give instructions to the Board. Such matters as are to be submitted to the approval of the King are reported to him by the same minister according to suggestions made by the Board.

The director-general, who is nominated by the King, is responsible in the first place to him for the administration of prisons in general. In the capacity of chairman of the Royal Prisons Board the director-general has alone the power of deciding in all matters belonging to the board, but the chief secretaries nominated by the King, at the proposal of the director-general, prepare all matters before reporting them to the director-general. If on any question they differ in opinion from the director-general, they have to place that on record.

According to the aforesaid rules the duties incumbent on the Royal Prisons Board are principally the following:—

To exercise supervision and control over all the prisons and penal establishments of the kingdom, and by means of inspections from time to time to see that they are properly managed in accordance with the regulations.

To give attention also to court house, gaols, and such small gaols as are maintained by the hundreds themselves.

To propose to the King such necessary and practicable ameliorations with regard to the prisons and the treatment of prisoners as require his sanction.

To nominate all officials, superior or subordinate, belonging to the prison staff, and to draw up rules for their service.

To administrate such public funds as are annually granted by the Diet for penal purposes.

To prepare an annual report relating to all the branches of the prison administration.

NORWAY.

Norway.

The supreme direction of the prisons of this kingdom is confided to a special administration under the Department of Justice, the head bearing the title of Secretary for Prison Administration, and being under the direct control of the Minister of Justice.

SWITZERLAND.

Switzerland.

The Swiss Confederation, composed of 22 cantons, forming 25 states, has not, up to the present, exercised any control over the administration of penal justice, prisons, and the penitentiary system. It is only in respect of military and political offences that penal justice, in so far as the necessity arises to punish crimes against the constitution and the federal laws, comes within the province of the Confederation.

Every canton is sovereign, and has its own penal system and places of detention. The prisons are thus placed under the control of the executive authority of the canton, or of the Council of State. The care of prisons falls more particularly on one of the branches of the executive. In some cantons the prisons are placed, in whole or in part, under the care of the police authority; in others, under that of the Department of Justice or of the Interior, according to the point of view from which the importance of these public services is regarded.

In the cantons where modern prisons exist, all or a part of the care of them has been entrusted to the Director of Justice, or to a special board charged with the direction, not only of prisons, but also of hospitals, lunatic asylums, &c. Attached to this board is a watch committee, composed of from three to seven numbers, taken from among experts in the questions of penitentiary reform, industry, and commerce.

In the cantons where this arrangement exists the powers and duties of the watch committee are defined by regulations.

Preventive prisons for districts and places of detention for civil offenders are looked after by the agents of the Council of State (prefects, &c.).

All the cantons of Switzerland, with the exception of Glarus and Appenzell, have penitentiaries. Their number amounts to 34, without counting a considerable number of lock-ups and district prisons for persons sentenced to a short period of correction, or for offenders against police regulations.

ITALY.

Italy.

The central authority for prisons is a Head Department forming part of the Ministry of the Interior, under a Director-General, and composed of three divisions, entrusted with the respective administration of (1) business concerning the persons employed in the administration and in the prisons, as also prison discipline; (2) the maintenance of the prisoners, prison labour, and the accounts relating to it; (3) repair and construction of prison buildings. There is besides—attached to the Head Department—a technical office consisting of several engineers, with three inspectors for visiting prisons. A Superior Council has been instituted by law, in the Head Department, to give decisions in matters of importance; but this Council has not yet entered upon its duties in consequence of the suspension of prison reform for the present.

2. What is the superior staff (e.g., governor, deputy governor, medical officer, chaplain, &c.) allowed to a prison with, say, more than 600 prisoners?

3. What is the superior staff allowed to a prison with 600 or fewer prisoners?

AMERICA, STATE OF NEW YORK.

America, State of New York.

As to prisons over 600.—Warden, deputy warden, physician, chaplain, and clerk.

As to prisons under 600.—The same as above, and where female prisoners are also confined, a matron.

FRANCE.

France.

Penitentiary establishments in France are divided into two classes:—

(1.) Establishments for carrying out long sentences, viz., central prisons, agricultural penitentiaries, colonies for juvenile offenders. By long sentences are meant those for a term exceeding twelve months.

(2.) Establishments for carrying out short sentences, or departmental prisons, which serve equally for the confinement of persons awaiting trial.

The long sentence prisons are administered by a superior staff where strength depends on number of the prison population, the disposition of the buildings, and, in the case of agricultural penitentiaries and the colonies for juvenile offenders, the extent of the grounds.

Each establishment has a director whose duty it is to see that the administration is properly carried out. He exercises his command under the control of the Prefect and the Minister. Following the official hierarchy, the establishment of the superior staff generally bears the following officers:—director, controller, steward, accounting officer, farm bailiff (in penitentiaries and penitentiary colonies), schoolmaster, clerk, librarian, medical officer, chaplain, architect.

In short sentence prisons there does not exist a superior staff properly so called. A chief warder, with the assistance, if necessary, of ordinary warders, secures a due watch being kept over the prisoners. These prisons are grouped within certain territorial boundaries comprising several departments, and are placed under the authority of a director who is generally the director at the same time of one of the long sentence prisons in the district.

GERMANY—PRUSSIA.

Germany—Prussia.

The answer to question No. 2 is:—

As to prisons under the Minister of the Interior.—At the head of the larger prisons and "Gefängnisse" is a director; under him as managing officials,—an inspector for the internal management, an inspector for the distribution of work, an inspector and accountant, and a secretary for clerical work. There are besides: clergymen for the prisoners of the various Christian denominations, a physician, and one or more instructors. If Jews are in the prison, a Rabbi is provided for them.

Appendix I.

As to prisons under the Minister of Justice.—At the head of these prisons are:—a director; under him several inspectors for the distribution of work, internal management, and police supervision. Also, a secretary for clerical work, and an accountant. Clergy are provided for the prisoners of the several Christian denominations, and one or more instructors. Arrangements are made with physicians for the medical treatment of the prisoners. Spiritual functions are also performed by Rabbis in any prison where Jews are detained.

The answer to question No. 3 is:—

As to prisons under the Minister of the Interior.—At the head of the middle-sized "Gefängnisse" there are:—A chief inspector, two to three managing officials (inspectors, secretaries, &c.), clergymen, physician, instructors.

Smaller "Gefängnisse" are under the superintendence of a chief warder or warders, under the direction of a State official, who is not in the service of the prison. Provision is made for spiritual and medical service.

As to prisons under the Minister of Justice.—(a.) From 600 to 100 men.—At the head of these prisons is a director or the chief attorney ("Staatsanwalt") of the land court ("Landesgericht") or a judge of the county court ("Amtsgericht"), in whose circuit the prison lies. Under him are: Inspectors, secretaries, accountants, similar to the prisons containing more than 600; clergy and instructors generally, and physicians always, are provided.

(b.) Under 100 prisoners.—These prisons are administered by the chief attorney of the land court, or by a judge of the county court, in whose circuit the prison lies. Under him, as inspector, an official of the State attorney's office or of the county court, who takes this duty. Clergy, physicians, and instructors are only provided by special arrangement.

Austria.

Austria.

The superior staff of an Austrian prison consists of a governor (either called ober-director or director, according to the importance of the prison), then a manager, controller, two assessors, a doctor, one to three chaplains, one to three teachers, and one inspector of warders.

The manager exists only in the largest class of prisons, and has charge of all the internal economy of the establishment—wages, kitchen, labour, and the general accounts.

The controller helps the manager in the large prisons, and occupies his place in the smaller ones.

The assessor, or two assessors, as the case may be, are secretaries to the governor, and as such have to take the occasional duty of other members of the staff and to keep the registers, &c.

The only difference occasioned by the size of the prison in Austria is in the appellation (as above) of the governor, the absence of a manager and one of the assessors, or both. The prison, for instance, at Stein, with 900 prisoners, has—

1 governor (called "ober-director"),
1 manager,
1 controller,
2 assessors,
1 doctor, unpaid assistants,
3 chaplains,
2 teachers, and
1 inspector of warders.

That at Goellersdorf, with only 300 prisoners, has—

1 governor (called "director"),
1 controller,
1 Catholic chaplain, and
1 inspector of warders.

The doctors are housed, &c., but unpaid.

Hungary.

Hungary.

There are few prisons which contain above 600 prisoners, but independently of the number of the latter, one director, one controller, one medical officer, are allowed to each prison. The number of chaplains varies from two to six in accordance with the different confessions of the prisoners. There are one or two teachers in each prison, but a greater number in houses of correction for juvenile offenders.

BELGIUM.

Belgium.

There is only one prison in Belgium which can contain more than 600 prisoners, viz., the central prison at Ghent, where the superior staff consists of a governor, director, two assistant directors, two medical officers, three Catholic chaplains, two chaplains belonging to dissenting bodies, and four schoolmasters.

Two prisons, the central prison at Louvain and the prison of St. Gilles, can contain 600 prisoners as a maximum; their superior staff is very much the same as that at Ghent, the only difference being in the number of Catholic chaplains and schoolmasters. At Louvain there are three chaplains and two schoolmasters. At St. Gilles, where the population is composed of prisoners sentenced to shorter terms, there are only two chaplains and two schoolmasters. All other establishments, called secondary prisons, have a population below 600; each of them has among its superior staff a director, a Catholic chaplain, and a medical officer. Moreover, to establishments of a certain size (a population of from 100 to 450) there are attached a schoolmaster and sometimes a second medical officer, a second Catholic chaplain, one or more chaplains belonging to dissenting bodies.

SWEDEN.

Sweden.

At the chief central prisons, in which the maximum number of inmates is about 450, and the average number 250, there are generally the following superior officers, viz.:—

1 governor,
1 deputy governor,
1 chaplain,
1 medical officer,
1 accountant and storekeeper,
2 schoolmasters,
1 trade instructor.

To the local cellular prisons, of which one has accommodation for 200 prisoners, 13 for about 90 to 102 prisoners each, and the remaining 31 for less than 90 prisoners each, are attached—

1 governor,
1 chaplain,
1 medical officer.

NORWAY.

Norway.

There is in this country no penal institution or prison accommodating 600 prisoners.

At penal institutions (those prisons where longer terms of deprivation of freedom—penal servitude—are undergone) there are a governor, chaplain, doctor, superintendent, warden, cashier, foreman or forewoman, and a teacher (at one institution three male teachers). At the district prisons (intended for detention and those prisoners that are sentenced to shorter terms of loss of liberty—simple imprisonment) there are the governor or administrator (a civil servant appointed by the King, generally a judge, high bailiff, or police magistrate) having at his side a committee chosen by the community, the chaplain (the clergyman of the district in which prison is situated, except in the case of the district prison at Christiania which has a chaplain of its own), the doctor (as a general rule the official physician of the district).

Each district prison is under the superintendence of the due sheriff.

SWITZERLAND.

Switzerland.

No prison contains more than 300 beds, and those which can take in more than 200 prisoners do not amount to more than 10 out of the 28 to 30 prisons set apart for condemned criminals.

The modern prisons, organised on the Crofton system of progressive classification, have at their head a director, a steward, a medical officer, a chaplain, and a schoolmaster, who constitute the superior staff. Then come a chief warder, a certain number of overseers who have to superintend the various kinds of industry carried on of warders, porters, and commissionaires.

For prisons holding from 200 to 300 prisoners the number of superior officers is five, and that of warders and overseers varies from 10 to 15 according to local conditions.

APPENDIX I.

ITALY.

Italy.

Every Italian penal establishment has its director, its accountant, bursar, secretary, clerks (of varying numbers), doctor, chaplain, and a schoolmaster for civil education. There is no distinction between establishments of greater or less size, except in the number of clerks.

---

4. What is the proportion of warders or subordinate officers to prisoners?

AMERICA, STATE OF NEW YORK.

America, State of New York.

In State prisons one keeper and one guard to 28 prisoners, and in other prisons, one keeper to every 20 prisoners.

FRANCE.

France.

The number of warders varies according to the needs or the difficulties of a particular service. As a general principle, it is estimated that one warder can satisfactorily look after 15 prisoners.

GERMANY.

Germany.

As to prisons under the Minister of the Interior.—One warder to about every 20 prisoners.

As to prisons under the Minister of Justice.—One warder for every 20 to 25 prisoners.

AUSTRIA.

Austria.

At Stein, with 900 prisoners, there are—

8 first-class upper warders,
8 second-class „
36 first-class sub-warders,
36 second-class „ , and
1 engineer with that rank.

At Goellersdorf, with 300 prisoners, there are—

1 first-class upper warder,
2 second-class „
13 first-class sub-warders, and 14 second-class „

so that the proportion of warders to prisoners is about one to 10.

HUNGARY.

Hungary.

The total number of prisoners provided for by the different prisons amounts to 4,705.

The actual number of prisoners is at present several hundreds below the above figure.

The number of subordinate officers (teachers and clerks is at present -	39
The number of the warders - - - - - -	775
Total - - - - -	814

Their proportion to the number of prisoners is therefore 1 to 6.

BELGIUM.

Belgium.

The proportion between the number of warders and that of prisoners is generally one warder to 17 prisoners, nevertheless this proportion cannot be observed in certain prisons on account of the disposition of the buildings or the great number of receptions or discharges. The ordinary staff must in such cases be somewhat increased; on the other hand, in the prisons of less importance, the staff comprises always at least two warders.

SWEDEN.

Central Prisons.

The daily average number of inmates in all the central penal establishments together during the last five years (1889–1893) has been 1,917. The regular staff of chief warders and warders (male or female) numbers respectively 51 and 292 persons. The average proportion of warders (including chief warders) to prisoners is thus about 1 to 6. Sweden.

Local Prisons (total number, 46).

The daily average number of prisoners in all the local prisons together during the aforesaid period was 1,374, and the number of chief warders and warders respectively, 39 and 210, making an average proportion of warders to prisoners of about 1 to 6.

NORWAY.

At the penal institutions, if all kinds of inferior functionaries are included, one to each six or seven prisoners. Norway.

At each of the district prisons there is a warder, and, at the larger prisons, also one or more gaolers.

No figures of proportion between the number of official and that of the prisoners can be given.

SWITZERLAND.

Nothing can be added to what is stated in reply to questions No. 2 and 3. Switzerland.

ITALY.

The proportion of warders to prisoners is on the average about 10 per cent. Italy.

---

5. Are there any special arrangements for the training of prison officers, whether superior officers or subordinates?

AMERICA, STATE OF NEW YORK.

No; but an officer or subordinate must be over 21 years of age, a citizen of the State of New York, and selected without political partisanship for his honesty, capacity, and adaptation, and must pass a Civil Service examination. America, State of New York.

FRANCE. France.

In the case of the superior staff nominations for first entry are given after examination. Promotion then goes by seniority, or by the selection of officers who have proved that they possess the aptitude and knowledge necessary for the discharge of their duties.

For the inferior staff there exist—(1) a higher school at Paris; (2) elementary schools in various establishments.

GERMANY—PRUSSIA.

As to prisons under the Minister of the Interior.—The superior officials receive practical training by means of a three months' probationary service in a prison, and subordinate officials by a six months' service. Germany—Prussia.

They can only obtain employment in a prison if their conduct during the probationary period is satisfactory.

As to prisons under the Minister of Justice.—The superior officials receive practical training by a three months' preparatory service, and are only appointed, after obtaining a certificate, testifying to their aptitude for the office of superior official.

Warders have to go through a probationary service, the duration of which is not to exceed six months.

Appendix I.

Austria.

Austria.

Candidates for the post of a higher official must apply with references (especially from their superiors in any other branch of the State Service they may be serving in) to the Ministry of Justice, which nominates candidates to the different prisons to undergo a period of three months' probation, or in some cases of four months, after which. having seen in turn the working of all the different departments, the candidate has to present himself before the Procurator-General for an oral examination, at the same time furnishing a certificate of his probationary service, and a full report of his work from the governor or manager of the prison, copy of which is also sent to the Ministry. The examiners consist of the Procurator-General or his deputy, the governor and manager of the nearest prison, and the fiscal official of the legal district.

Warders have to undergo at least a year's probation, and to pass an oral examination before the superior officials of the prison, showing also a sufficient knowledge of reading, writing, and arithmetic.

Hungary.

Hungary.

There are no special arrangements for the training of prison officers.

Belgium.

Belgium.

There exists no special arrangements for the professional instruction of members of superior staff. The chaplains are nominated by their ecclesiastical superiors acting in accord with the central prison authorities; schoolmasters and medical officers are appointed on production of a diploma; lastly, the candidates for directorships are selected as a general rule from among the members of the administrative staff (first-class accountants and first-class clerks) who have been in the prison service for at least 10 years. With a view to testing their qualifications they are made to undergo an examination in the theory of the prison system, embracing all subjects which ought to be in the cognizance of a director. Then they have to undergo at least a year's probation in the capacity either of assistant director in a central prison or as director in a prison of less importance before their nomination is definitely confirmed.

The different categories of clerks have also to undergo an examination and to pass through a probationary stage.

The members of the discipline staff have, before their nomination, to pass through a probationary stage of at least six months as assistant warders so as to initiate themselves into the details of their duties. They are dismissed from their posts even before the expiry of this period if it is clear that they do not possess all the qualities necessary for carrying out ultimately the duties of a third-class warder. If the result of their probation is favourable they are admitted into this last-mentioned class. Their appointment is not confirmed until after a further delay of at least six months. Up to the present date probation is passed in the prison where the assistant warder will ultimately be called upon to act as a third-class warder. For the future it will be passed in the cellular prison of St. Gilles, or in one of the central prisons of Ghent and Louvain. In these three establishments, where the staff is necessarily organised in a more complete manner than in the secondary prisons, there is to be created a special brigade composed of five assistant warders. While waiting for a nomination these warders will help to strengthen the staff in the three prisons above mentioned and in any other prison where the ordinary staff may be reduced for the moment in consequence of leave or sickness.

The material advantages enjoyed by the assistant warders are, as a general rule, a salary of three francs a day, and ultimately an allowance to pay for their removal if they are married men. They do not wear the uniform of actual warders, their sole distinctive dress being a cap similar to that worn by the warders.

Sweden.

The governors and deputy governors of the chief central prisons for men are exclusively military men, and a large number of the local prisons are also managed by officers who have retired from the army. Among the governors of local prisons there are, however, several civilians. About 10 of these latter have, before their promotion, been schoolmasters in central prisons for men. Central prisons for women are, as a rule, governed by civilians.

Young officers who wish to leave the army in order to enter the prison service receive, on application, the permission of the Director-General of Prisons to serve on probation for some months in one of the larger prisons for men. During this time the qualifications of the applicant are tested, and, at the expiration of his probation, the governor of the prison conveys to the Director-General his opinion of the young officer, who thereupon is admitted into the service as a candidate or refused admission. Afterwards the capacity of such candidates as have gained admission is further tried while serving as acting governors or deputy governors during casual vacancies.

As for the training of civilians for the higher grades of prison service, it has already been mentioned that schoolmasters at the central prisons for men sometimes are promoted to the governorships of local prisons. Another way to become governor of a prison after completing a course of studies at the university is to be attached to the Royal Prisons Board as extra clerk and to serve there for some years, acquiring during this time the necessary qualifications for the regular prison service by visiting various penal establishments and by performing the functions of governor or deputy governor during vacancies. The selection and appointment of superior officers are entirely left in the hands of the Royal Prisons Board.

The lower officers and the warders are, as a rule, civilians who have received their education for the prison service as extra warders, called in at times of emergency or during the illness or the holidays of some of the regular staff. The selection of warders is made by the governors, but all subordinate prison officers receive their warrants from the Royal Prisons Board. They must, however, serve on probation for a period of at least three months. In the choice of suitable warders the greatest possible discrimination is exercised, and an indispensable condition for their appointment is that they should be sober men and of good moral character. Preference is given to those who have learned a trade or acquired any professional skill which might be of use in directing the works of the prisoners. The maximum age for appointment is 30 years.

It has not been deemed necessary or even advisable to establish any special training school for warders. Experience has proved that efficiency in the management of prisoners is best acquired in prisons themselves. But in order to raise the moral and intellectual standard of the men who are already in the service, lectures and classes have been instituted in the central prisons. These are held by the chaplain and the schoolmasters, and the subjects taught or treated in lectures are such as may be of an educational or practical value to the warders in the discharge of their important duties. The central penal establishments have special libraries for the warders, and every year a great number of suitable and valuable books on religious subjects, temperance, history, biography, &c., are sent out to these libraries as well as to those intended to the use of prisoners.

During the last few years the pay of the subordinate prison officers has been considerably increased. Their economical position is now comparatively good. As a result thereof the number of applicants for employment as warders has greatly risen, and, consequently, the opportunities of obtaining well-qualified men for the lower grades of prison service are now greater than they were before.

Such clergymen as are attached to central prisons are always resident chaplains who have no other ministerial office, but the chaplains of local prisons have generally other pastoral duties in the towns in which the prisons are situated.

A medical officer has the right of carrying on private practice, so far as is compatible with his functions in the prison.

6. Is any preference given either to military men or to civilians in the selection of prison officers?

AMERICA, STATE OF NEW YORK.

America, State of New York.

No preference is given to either class among applicants, but veterans of the late Civil War, who are physically and otherwise capable, are preferred.

FRANCE.

France.

The laws of 18th April 1889 (Art. 14 et seq.) and of 15th July 1889 (Art. 84) require that the prison service shall only be recruited from candidates who have fulfilled their term of military service.

GERMANY—PRUSSIA.

Germany—Prussia.

As to prisons under the Minister of the Interior.—Directors, inspectors, secretaries, and subordinate officials are chosen, in preference, from military men, to whom (after leaving their military service) prospects of civil employment have been held out, and so long as their qualifications are adequate.

As to prisons under the Minister of Justice.— Inspectors, warders, &c., are, in preference, chosen from the number of military men, when they have, on quitting military service, a probable expectation of civil employment.

AUSTRIA.

Austria.

Preference must be given in Austria to either former officers or men of the army, who may apply for either superior or subordinate posts in prisons, and may besides apply for such positions up to their 45th year, whereas civilian (or those who have not performed more than the universal compulsory term of military service) cannot apply after their 35th year. In any case every candidate must have so performed his military compulsory service as to have obtained a certificate from the military authorities entitling him to make application for a post in the Civil Service; and only a few of the posts in the prison service are open to pure civilians. But this is part of the Austrian military system, for every officer and non-commissioned officer has, cæteris paribus, a first claim to every post of a similar nature to that of a prison official in all the Austrian political or civil service.

HUNGARY.

Hungary.

As a principle no preference is given to military men or civilians for the posts of prison officers. Prison officers are at present selected from civilians. According to Act No. II. of the year 1873, however, preference is given to subaltern military officers for the appointments of warders and guardians.

BELGIUM.

Belgium.

So far as regards the warders, only those candidates are admitted who know a trade carried on in the prisons, or which can usefully be taught to prisoners. The only exception to this rule is in favour of retired non-commissioned officers, so as to reward the special services which they have in that capacity rendered to the State during a period of several years.

So far as regards the clerical staff no difference is made between candidates who are civilians and candidates who are or who have been in the army.

SWEDEN.

Sweden.

The governors and deputy governors of the chief central prisons are military men. But the prison service generally contains both civilian and military officers. The treatment of the two classes respectively will be found in the answer to question No. 5.

NORWAY.

Norway.

As a general rule civilians are appointed, this being specially the case as regards the subordinate warders or keepers, since it is usually understood that they shall, as a rule, be skilled in some handicraft.

SWITZERLAND.

Switzerland.

In Switzerland all citizens fit for military service are soldiers. Merit being equal, those are preferred as prison officers who have a dispensation from military service, so as not to lose their services during the mean period of from four to six weeks for which men are summoned to a military school every other year.

ITALY.

Italy.

The employés of the prisons' administration form a special organic register, going through every grade, commencing from that of the pupil. Admission to one-tenth of the vacant posts, but only those of directors, is open to the employés of other Departments of State who may have attained a grade equivalent to that of Councillor in a Prefecture, and to military officers of at least the rank of captain, as well as to persons outside any Department of State who may have distinguished themselves by publications on penal or penitentiary subjects, and who have been directors of some provincial or communal reformatory for a period of five years.

Warders are chosen by preference from among those who have served their time in the army; and such as have attained the rank of non-commissioned officer in the army are admitted to the grade of sub-chief-warder.

7. What classification of prisoners exists? Are there, e.g., separate prisons, or separate sections in prisons, for juveniles, for first offenders, for habitual criminals, for debtors? Is there any special treatment of these or any other classes?

AMERICA, STATE OF NEW YORK.

America, State of New York.

In State prisons prisoners are divided into three classes:—

(1.) The corrigible or less vicious, and likely to observe the laws and maintain themselves by honest industry after their discharge.

(2.) Incorrigible or more vicious, but so competent to work, and so reasonably obedient to prison discipline as not seriously to interfere with their labour, or that of others in whose company they may be employed.

(3.) Incorrigible or so insubordinate, or so incompetent otherwise than from ill-health as to seriously interfere with the discipline or productiveness of the labour of the prison. In other prisons there is no classification except in the matter of work, and as the warden may deem advantageous.

There are no separate prisons or sections in prisons for habitual criminals.

There is a prison at Elmira for first offenders of the ages from 16 to 30.

There is a separate prison for debtors in New York City (Ludlow Street Gaol) where prisoners are not confined in cells, and work is optional, and food from outside the prison is allowed to be provided them.

FRANCE.

France.

Persons detained in penitentiary establishments form two classes; on the one hand there are those who are charged before courts of first instance or higher courts (prévenus et accusés), and are awaiting trial; on the other there are those who have been condemned and are undergoing their sentence. According to the law these two classes have to be kept separate; prisoners of the first class are confined in buildings called lock-ups (maison d'arrêt) and houses of justice, according as they are charged before a court of first instance (prévenus) or before an assize court (accusés); prisoners of the second class are entered on the books of a house of correction. Short sentence prisons generally receive in the same establishment, but in separate quarters or buildings, prisoners awaiting trial on one side and prisoners sentenced on the other. Long sentence prisons, or central prisons [houses of correction for those who are sentenced to simple imprisonment, of hard labour for those who are sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour (réclusion) or to détention *] take only persons who have been tried and are working out their sentence.

The law does not require a separate section of a prison to be kept for first offenders; but by an arrangement in most of the central prisons there are preventive or reformatory quarters reserved for prisoners who seem to afford some guarantee of amendment or who behave best. The same prisons contain special places for the confinement of insubordinate and dangerous prisoners, whose presence in the midst of the rest would compromise order and discipline.

In the departmental houses of correction the different classes of prisoners are separated as well as the character of the buildings allows.

Juveniles charged with grave offences (délits) or the gravest offences (crimes) are detained during the period of remand, just like adults, in lock-ups or houses of justice, there to await trial; but they are kept separate from the rest of the population. According to their age or the character of their acts, they may be sentenced to certain punishment, and then, if necessary, placed in an establishment for correctional education; or they may be simply acquitted; or again if, being under 16 years of age, they are declared to have acted without discretion, they may be sent after acquittal for a period of correctional education under the tutelage of the State.

Debtors undergo their sentence in the short-sentence houses of correction; they are separated from the other prisoners and their regimen and discipline are assimilated to that of prisoners awaiting trial.

Debtors to the State in respect of ordinary offences of the three degrees of severity (contraventions, délits, crimes), are subjected to the regimen of ordinary prisoners.

GERMANY—PRUSSIA.

Germany—Prussia.

As to prisons under the Minister of the Interior.—1. For juvenile prisoners, between the age of 12 and 18, special wards are set apart in larger prisons, in which they are separated from the older prisoners.

2. Prisoners under 25, and prisoners between 25 and 40, if they have not previously undergone frequent sentences, are kept in cell prisons or cell wards ("Zellgefängnisse" or "Zellabtheilungen").

If possible, also, previously convicted prisoners between 25 and 30 years of age.

Prisoners who have previously undergone frequent sentences receive smaller wages for work than the others, and may only purchase extra rations out of their wages after the expiration of six months of their term of imprisonment.

There are no prisoners for debt.

As to prisoners under the Minister of Justice.—Juvenile prisoners, between 12 and 18 years of age are kept as far as possible apart from adults, and detained in special quarters during the term of their sentence. In one or more prisons of each province, a special ward is provided for juvenile males, and a similar one for females.

All prisoners are taken into this from the province who, at the time of their conviction, have not completed their 18th year, and have not a too short term to perform (as a rule not less than one to two months). Even if they attain the age of 18 before the completion of their term they remain in the juveniles' ward, provided that their sentence has not more than three months to run. If longer they are transferred into the adults' ward.

The treatment of juvenile prisoners is, in general, the same as that of adults. Instructors are, nevertheless, authorised to order corporal punishment, within the limits of school discipline, to such prisoners as come within the age for compulsory school attendance. Appendix I.

* "Détention" is a term difficult to translate. It is apparently a severe form of imprisonment for offences having some political complexion. It is very rarely awarded: one case was that of Marshal Bazaine, whose death sentence was commuted into one of detention, the sentence he was actually serving at the time of his escape from S. Marguerite (Boeuf's "Droit Pénal").

There are no prisoners for debt, because arrest for debt is disallowed by law.

Austria.

All attempts at a classification of prisoners according to the nature of their offence, their moral condition, first offenders, habitual criminals, &c., has been given up in Austria, and, generally speaking, only the length of punishment determines whether they should be incarcerated in one of the tribunal prisons, where most prisoners only spend up to a period of one year, or in the general prisons, where most prisoners have been condemned to at least one year's punishment. But, both for prisoners condemned to solitary imprisonment and for all others, a system of disciplinary classification is carried out in all Austrian prisons as follows:— Austria.

In most large prisons there are three disciplinary classes; in some smaller ones only two. Every prisoner should spend a third of his whole time in each of the three classes, but however long his punishment, not more than three years should be spent in each of the two lower classes. Exception is made for habitual criminals, or for those who repeat a similar offence twice; these have to spend a half of their new incarceration in the lowest class, a quarter in the second, and a quarter in the third class, but should not be kept longer than five and three years in any class. In the prison of Göllersdorf, where the prisoners have not been condemned to more than one year's incarceration, there are only two classes, in the lower of which the prisoner spends a third of his time (usually not over four months) and two-thirds in the higher class. Special good conduct is rewarded in all prisons by periods of only one-fourth of the whole time in the two lower classes, and bad conduct by proportionate additional time, or replacing in a lower class. In all this classification, not the nature of the prisoner so much as his individual conduct is kept in view, and very little can be done to prevent bad moral influence being exerted to the detriment of fellow prisoners. The only separate prisons, or sections in prisons, are for juvenile offenders and for women.

The treatment of youthful offenders in the special sections of large prisons entails greater attention and increased attempts at improvement and education than in the adult sections, and juveniles also receive more cubic space and more exercise.

Hungary.

Prisoners are classified according to their being sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour (Zuchthaus), to confinement in prison (Kerker), in gaol (Gefängniss), and in State prisons (Staats-Gefängniss). Hungary.

Prisoners sentenced to confinement in a prison (Kerker) are subject to milder treatment than prisoners sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour (Zuchthaus).

Prisoners sentenced to imprisonment with or without hard labour receive milder treatment if sent to the intermediary prison. Prisoners who have been sentenced to at least three years' imprisonment with or without hard labour (Zuchthaus or Kerker), and have already completed two-thirds of their punishment, are sent to the intermediary prison provided that their conduct offers ample hope for improvement.

The State prison being a kind of "Custodia Honesta" prisoners sentenced to this sort of prison are quite differently treated from other prisoners. They cannot be forced to work and may provide themselves with their own clothing and food. They are subject as regards order and discipline to a milder treatment, may receive visitors, and pass two hours a day in the open air.

The moral classification of prisoners in the different prisons is the following:—

In the first class are ranged prisoners under 24 years of age;
In the second class prisoners above 24 years of age;
In the third class, habitual criminals.

The directors are also authorised to introduce further classifications according to the degree of education, to the difference of the crimes committed, to the conduct and the degree of moral improvement of the convicts during the time of their confinement.

Habitual criminals are subject to a more rigorous treatment. No favour is accorded to them in prisons with hard labour (Zuchthaus) during the first year, and in prisons (Kerker) during the first nine months.

Prisoners of youthful age are, if feasible, sent to the same prison, and habitual criminals are, if possible, confined in prisons specially destined for them.

APPENDIX I.

BELGIUM.

Belgium.

Prisons are divided into two categories, i.e.,—

A. The central prisons of Louvain and Ghent, exclusively for men sentenced in the various arrondissements, and designed, the first for persons sentenced to réclusion,* and to travaux forcés (forçats), and in exceptional cases for persons sentenced by the police correctionnelle to more than five years' imprisonment. The second (a) for persons sentenced to imprisonment for life who have elected for confinement in association after having undergone 10 years of cellular confinement; (b) for all condemned criminals who cannot be subjected to solitary confinement on account of certain physical or moral conditions.

B. The secondary cellular prisons to the number of 24, of which there is one for each court of first instance, except in the case of Brussels which has two. They are designed to receive persons committed for trial before the police correctionnelle, or before the assizes, and convicted criminals of one or two specified arrondissements. Each contains two distinct divisions, one for men and boys, the other for women and girls, and each of these divisions contains (1) a place of detention for unconvicted prisoners, (2), a lock-up for the brief detention of drunkards, and the like (maison de dépot), (3) a maison prévôtale,† (4) a prison as the term is ordinarily understood (maison pour peines), and, in nine arrondissements where there is a cour d'assises, (5) a court of justice. There are no separate prisons or separate sections in prisons for juvenile offenders, first offenders, habitual criminals, and other classes as prisoners.‡ The only exception made is in favour of the feeble in body and mind. These undergo their sentence in certain cellular prisons which have a specially devised section for association. The same is the case with juvenile offenders, boys of under 16 and sentenced (for having acted "with discretion") to more than a month's imprisonment, as also with those who are above 16 but under 18, and have incurred a sentence of more than six months; a special section where they are in association is reserved for them up to the age of 20 at the central prison of Ghent; after this age they are subjected to cellular confinement.

Besides prisoners who at the present time are subjected to a special treatment, habitual criminals and other old offenders, belonging to the category of persons above 16 and under 65 who have been discharged from prison and within three years have again been sentenced to a term of imprisonment not exceeding six months, have formed the subject of a Bill which would provide a special treatment in prison for offenders of this class.

According to this Bill, during the first three months of detention, counting from the entry in the gaol book or from the day when the sentence will come into force, the ordinary diet is replaced first by bread and water for the first eight days and on every alternate day during the next twenty-two days; secondly by the dietary of able-bodied inmates of poor-houses for the remaining two months. A plank bed and a pillow, with or without rugs, according to the time of year, replace the ordinary bed during all the first month of the sentence. A power is reserved enabling the Minister of Justice to suspend, for medical reasons, the execution of these rigorous measures. Finally, in case of an appeal by a prisoner, the period of detention undergone subsequent to his condemnation would not, despite Article 30 of the Penal Code, be deducted from the length of his sentence.

SWEDEN.

Sweden.

In the penal system now in operation in Sweden there is no classification of the prisoners in the common sense of the word, e.g., there is no classification of the kind which is in use where the progressive system has been more or less completely adopted. There is, however, a great difference in the treatment of different kinds of

* Réclusion is a sentence of imprisonment with labour pronounced by a cour d'assises. Part of the proceeds of the prisoner's labour go to his profit, in contradistinction to the rule which obtains where a person is sentenced to travaux forcés.

† Cour prévôtale is defined by the Larousse dictionary as a "tribunal exceptionnel établi à diverses époques "et jugeant sans appel." Though they had a great importance in former times these courts have now little more than a nominal existence.

‡ Notably debtors. The number of debtors in prison has become very small since the publication of the law of 27th July 1871, which provides that in only certain prescribed and exceptional cases may imprisonment be inflicted.

prisoners, for instance, those sentenced to penal servitude and those sentenced to simple imprisonment.

(1.) A prisoner of this latter kind is allowed to wear his own clothes, to provide himself with better food than that given in the prison, and generally to enjoy such greater comforts as can be permitted without any disturbing effect upon the security and general order of the prison. Such a prisoner has also the right of occupying himself with suitable work if able to procure such for himself. The manager of the prison has, however, to see that this right be not abused and turned to unlawful objects. Hence, imprisonment is mere privation of liberty without obligation to work, and without contact with other prisoners.

(2.) A prisoner sentenced to penal servitude (minimum time according to Swedish law, four months) shall be employed in such work as is prescribed by the prison authorities. He is not allowed to receive from outside, or to provide himself with better food or clothes, or anything else than that furnished in the penal establishment.

(3.) Those sentenced to imprisonment for want of means to pay fines are bound to perform such labour as is given to them in the prison. They are not allowed to receive or to provide themselves with any other food or accommodation than that furnished in the penal establishment. Debtors are never sent to prison in Sweden (according to the Debtors' Act of the 10th of August 1877).

With regard to the distribution of prisoners of different kinds into the various penal establishments the following statutes are at present in force :—

I. Prisoners, both male and female: (a) awaiting trial, or (b) sentenced to imprisonment, either immediately for certain offences (for instance, fights, certain cases of fraudulence and violation of domicile, &c.), or as a commutation of punishment for want of means to pay fines, or (c) sentenced to penal servitude for a time of two years or shorter periods, are to be kept in local gaols, called "provincial prisons," or "crown prisons." All these penitentiaries are cellular prisons, in which the inmates are confined to their cells or otherwise (for instance, in the airing yards) entirely separated from each other both day and night. Female prisoners are kept in special sections of these prisons.

On account of the complete system of separating adopted in pursuance of the Royal Ordinance of the 21st of December 1857 in all local goals, it has, of course, not been necessary to introduce there any classification of the prisoners with regard to their character of being young offenders or occasional trespassers or "récidivistes." These classes, however, require, and deserve, no doubt, different modes of treatment, and in order to effect a judicious and discriminative management of the different inmates of cellular prisons, the Royal Prisons Board endeavours as much as possible to obtain for the superior grades of prison service such able and intelligent men as possess the faculty of individualisation.

With relation to the principles of cumulating sentences for repeated breaches of law, a reform has recently been brought about which has had special influence upon the punishment of juvenile offenders, and of those who have rendered themselves guilty of repeated larceny, inasmuch as, in consequence of the law of the 20th June 1890, the duration of the penalties, inflicted for the repetition of certain transgressions, has been considerably modified. In connexion with this reform an extension of the periods of cellular confinement was introduced in pursuance of the law of the 29th of July 1892, as will be shown below (vide answer to Question 15).

II. Prisoners sentenced to penal servitude for longer periods than two years are sent to the central prisons according to the following regulations, which show that prisoners of this kind are, to a certain extent, divided with regard to the nature of their crimes.

(A.)—Males :—

(a.) Prisoners sent to penal servitude for crimes incurring a forfeiture of civil rights ("infamy") for a certain time or for ever (for instance, larceny, housebreaking, robbery with violence, perjury, arson, &c.) are sent to the central prisons at Langhalmen and Malmo.

(b.) Prisoners who have not forfeited their civil rights (for instance, those convicted of assaults, outrages, &c.) are sent to the central prison at Nya Warfoct.

Appendix I.

(B.) Females:—

(c.) Prisoners sentenced to penal servitude for life, or for longer terms than three years, are sent to the central prison in Norrkoping.

(d.) Prisoners sentenced to penal servitude for periods longer than two years, but not exceeding three years, are kept in the cellular prisons in Stockholm, Upsala, Mariestad, and Kalmar.

(e.) Infanticides under longer sentences than two years are, as a rule, removed to the central prison in Gothenburg.

Young, and such comparatively uncorrupted prisoners, sentenced to penal servitude for over four years, as ought to be especially protected against the evil influences of association prisons are to be reported to the Royal Prisons Board by the governors before the expiration of their terms of cellular confinement, in order that the board may be able to take into consideration, apart from the regulations above referred to, to which central prison such prisoners are to be sent for the remaining time of their terms of punishment.

Norway.

Norway.

There are three penal institutions for men, viz., one cellular prison (the so-called penitentiary), and two common prisons, i.e., where segregation is not the strict rule, as also one for females undergoing penal servitude.

In the penitentiary are confined all males sentenced to penal servitude who have not completed their twenty-first year; as also others sentenced to penal servitude for a term not exceeding five years, and who are of an age from over 21 to 50, but neither those who have previously been sentenced to penal servitude in the cellular prison, and who on the completion of latest incurred punishment were 25 years of age, nor criminals of Lapp extraction. Male convicts above 21 years of age who, in consequence of the above regulations, are not compelled to serve their time at the penitentiary may, if they give their consent, be incarcerated there on the question being submitted to the Department of Justice in each and every case.

The other male criminals sentenced to penal servitude are incarcerated in the other penal institutions.

There is but one prison in this country for females sentenced to penal servitude and here a certain part is adapted for solitary confinement.

As regards the penitentiary the following rules are enforced.

The prisoners are usually kept totally separate from each other not only in the cells but also in the school, chapel, and when in the open air under guard.

Modifications in respect to prisoners under 18 years of age are, however, permitted; since it held that so as to redeem these prisoners special stress must be laid on the educational aspect of the treatment. They are to be kept in solitary confinement, should the governor, after consulting with the chaplain and doctor, deem that in consequence of their age, development, health, disposition, term of imprisonment, &c., they may be more suitably treated in this manner. If not, they shall invariably be kept separate from their fellow prisoners at night as also at meal times and during the preparations for lessons, but, under proper supervision, shall labour in association, as also, unless otherwise decided by the governor, receive instruction and take exercise in the open air together. As a rule these prisoners shall always be strictly separated from the elder criminals.

Those convicts in the same institution of more than 18 years of age that have spent three years of the sentence in solitary confinement, as also prisoners that are not fit for total isolation, may, on decision of the department in this respect, also be allowed to labour in association with other prisoners and receive instruction in common. Those prisoners that work in association are, however, not allowed to speak to one another, excepting only when the nature of the work in hand renders some communication necessary.

In the common prisons, when telling off the prisoners to the different workshops or dormitories, care is taken that so far as it be possible the better class of criminals is kept aloof from the more depraved.

In the district prisons those convicts that endure sentence on bread and water, or on the ordinary gaol allowance (compare answer to question No. 16), are invariably, and prisoners under detention are, as a general rule, kept in solitary confinement, unless their age, state of health or mind, or other circumstances in certain respects make it unadvisable. A prisoner under "arrest," which simply consists in the complete deprivation of liberty, as a rule has a room to himself. Imprisonment for debt as such is unknown.

SWITZERLAND.

Switzerland.

There is in modern prisons the system of progressive classification, three classes to which the prisoner is promoted if his conduct is satisfactory, and then provisional liberation. There are establishments, organised like reformatory schools in England, for the correctional education of young offenders under 20 years of age; but there are no special prisons for first offenders, for recidivists, and for debtors.

The penitentiary treatment has regard to the individual, and is left to the discretion of the director and other superior officers, who discuss in conference the best method of applying to each case a penal discipline, whose aim is the moral reformation of the prisoner.

ITALY.

Italy.

In Italy there are "ordinary" penal establishments and "special" penal establishments. In the "ordinary" establishments the first half of the sentence is served. The "special" establishments are divided into intermediary agricultural and industrial prisons, and into penitentiaries proper (case di rigore). In the former of these "special" prisons the second half of the sentence is served, whilst the penitentiaries proper are reserved for prisoners who refuse to submit themselves to prison discipline.

In the "ordinary" prisons the inmates are divided into three classes:—

(a) those on probation;
(b) those called "ordinary" prisoners; and
(c) those called "deserving" prisoners.

Prisoners commencing their sentences are admitted to the first of these classes, and may be passed into the second, after having served a sixth part of their sentence; and out of this second class, after six months, into that of the "deserving" prisoners; thence they pass to the intermediary (special) prisons, where they remain until the expiration of their sentences, provided that their conduct is good. The prisoners in the penitentiaries proper (case di rigore) are divided into three classes: those undergoing punishment, those on probation, and those who are being reformed. After six months in the first of these classes they may pass on to the second, whence they pass for eight months into the third, before being transferred back again into the "ordinary" prisons. Promotion or retrogression is assigned according to a system of marks (reviewed every month) according to conduct.

As for juveniles and first offenders, those who have been arrested and those condemned already to short sentences, as well as minors, are kept—in the tribunal prisons—in separate sections.

Habitual offenders are not distinguished in the State prisons from ordinary prisoners nor in the penitentiaries, as far as regards the separation of individuals. But habitual offenders are treated more strictly and are usually located in establishments that are situated far from their place of origin; they are also excluded from taking part in the domestic duties of their prison, and from the prison school; and they remain longer in the probation class, and are subjected to more severe punishments for offences against prison discipline.

Italian law does not recognise imprisonment for debt.

8. In the case of juveniles, are there any institutions analogous to reformatory schools in England, to which boys or girls are committed instead of to prison, or to penal reformatories, which are a suggested extension of the reformatory school system, and are intended for lads of, say, from 18 to 21?

AMERICA, STATE OF NEW YORK.

America, State of New York.

There are no institutions analogous to reformatory schools, where boys or girls between the ages of 18 and 21 are admitted.

The House of Refuge on Randall's Island takes youths from 12 to 18.*

* See account of Elmira on page 526.

APPENDIX I.

FRANCE.

France.

Among the different establishments in France for juvenile offenders there are distinctions which correspond to a certain degree to those between reformatory schools and penal reformatories. But just as the penal practice, as well as penal legislation, differs in many respects from that of England, the best means of making possible a comparison between the systems of the two countries seems to be to give a summary of the provisions of the French law with regard to juvenile offenders and to indicate the kind of establishments in which those provisions are carried out.

The French Penal Code fixes the limit of age for a "juvenile" at 16. Young persons above that age are from the penal point of view treated as adults.

Juveniles appear before the courts, but the latter have to inquire whether they have or have not acted with discretion. In the former case sentence is passed, but the punishment inflicted on them is less than that which would fall on an adult for the same offence (Articles 67 and 69 of the Penal Code). In the latter case juveniles are acquitted, but the court may, instead of restoring them to their family, order them to be conveyed to a house of correction, there to be educated for a specified period or until they reach a specified age, which cannot exceed 20 (Art. 66 of the Penal Code).

The establishments to which juveniles are sent after their appearance before the courts are divided into two classes: (1) Agricultural or industrial colonies which correspond very nearly to reformatory schools; (2) correctional establishments (quartiers correctionnels), which correspond to penal reformatories. The colonies receive juveniles who are acquitted in virtue of Article 66 of the Penal Code; the correctional establishments receive juveniles who have been sentenced to more than two years' imprisonment* in virtue of Article 67 of the Penal Code, and, in addition, juveniles who have been acquitted, but who have during their term at a colony shown symptoms of depravity or insubordination.

Besides these two classes of establishments the administration of prisons has instituted three reformatory schools (écoles de réforme) for the reception of children under 12 who have been sent for correction by the courts. The intention has been to obviate by this means the difficulties which might arise from the mixing of children of ages too widely different. If the children in reformatory schools conduct themselves well they remain there until their discharge. Otherwise they are sent, according to the gravity of their misdeeds, to ordinary colonies or to correctional establishments.

These reformatory schools, as well as the penitentiary colonies, may be either public establishments entirely kept up by the State or private establishments self-administered but under State control, who receive a daily payment for each child sent to them.

GERMANY—PRUSSIA.

Germany—Prussia.

As to prisons under the Minister of the Interior.—(a.) Children under 12 may not be prosecuted under paragraph 55 of the Criminal Code.

Measures referring to reformation and control can only be put in force against such children by virtue of royal decrees.

Public prisons used for the detention of such children are administered by the provincial authorities, and the supervision belongs to the Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Public Worship, Instruction, and Medical Establishments.

(b.) Juveniles between 12 and 18 are free under paragraph 56 of the Criminal Code, except when by their bad conduct they show consciousness of their criminal liability.

Judges have the power to commit them to an educational establishment or a reformatory. Such State establishments are under the supervision of the Minister of the Interior.

Both classes of juveniles may also be sent to private establishments; the supervision of these falls on the State school officials. In place of an educational establishment the offender may be given in charge of a family. The education of the juveniles between 20 and 21 is supervised by the State officials.

As to prisoners under the Minister of Justice.—The answer to this question is the same as that given above.

* Juveniles sentenced to less than two years' imprisonment are not sent to a correctional establishment, but to an ordinary colony. They are, however, a very small number, a dozen for the whole of France.

AUSTRIA.

Austria.

Every Austrian province must now possess a reformatory, both for adults and youths, either in separate places or separate sections of the same, and this apart from sections for juveniles in the ordinary prisons. The adults who are placed in the reformatory are habitual tramps, beggars, idlers, &c., who have been certified to lead idle or dangerous lives, and to threaten to burden the community. Into the youths' reformatories are placed a similar class to those in English reformatory schools, only that on attaining their 17th or 18th year the inmates may be transferred to the adult reformatory (Zwangsarbeitshaus). Special attention is paid in Austria to this mode of getting rid of the idle tramps and so-called "gypsies," who really make their principal living by begging and small thefts, and as a rule bring up large families of squalid children who can receive no education owing to the nomadic existence of their parents; such tramps are still, it is understood, a difficulty in Perthshire and several other counties of Scotland, but are in Austria seized and incarcerated in time in a reformatory. Besides these public reformatories, adult and juvenile, there are numerous schools kept by Sisters of the different Catholic Orders, and subventioned by the Government. The reformatory at Kornenburg, for instance, is a Government institution containing 1,000 adult offenders, and in a separate section 200 juveniles from 14 to 18 years of age; but the private reformatories, such as those at Waiern and Jagdberg, only contain juveniles.

HUNGARY.

Hungary.

There are houses of correction, to which are sent:—

(a.) Persons under 20 years of age sentenced to simple imprisonment (Gefängniss or Arrest.)

(b.) Juveniles between 12 and 16 years of age who have committed a crime whether any punishment has been inflicted upon them or not.

(c.) Vagabonds and beggars under 16 years of age.

(d.) Persons under 18 years of age, of no means and of corrupt morals, if their parents are dead or have been sentenced to imprisonment for a long period, or if they are under the care of parents or relatives who lead an immoral life and neglect their moral education.

(e.) Persons under 18 years of age whose immoral disposition makes it desirable that they should be educated in a house of correction.

BELGIUM.

Belgium.

There are no institutions in Belgium analogous to the English reformatory schools or to penal reformatories.

SWEDEN.

Sweden.

There are in Sweden several private benevolent institutions for the training of neglected youth, but State-supported reformatories of the English type have not been founded in this country. In 1876 a farming colony was established by a private society at Hall in the vicinity of Stockholm. This colony has the character of a penal reformatory. According to the Royal Ordinance of the 24th of October 1879 boys in the age of 10 to 15 who have committed crimes, but, as not having reached the age of legal responsibility (15 years according to Swedish law), cannot be incarcerated, are to be sent to this colony by order of a court of justice, or by the communities. The institution receives annual support from the savings fund of the penal establishments which is administered by the Royal Prisons Board, but for the rest it is placed under the management and control of a committee of private trustees, the chairman of which is nominated by the King.

NORWAY.

Norway.

There are four correctional training institutions, all for boys. There is no similar establishment for girls.

The existing institutions do not belong to the State; but their method is approved of by the Government.

APPENDIX I.

To these institutions judges may send persons of between 10 and 15 years of age instead of sentencing them to imprisonment or the rod; and there they remain so long as the governing body of the institution deem it necessary for the improvement of their morals, but not after they have completed their 18th year. Should it be ascertained with certainty that the child wishes to enter a correctional institution, the authorities prosecuting may, with a view to the welfare of the child, retire from the prosecution.

The institutions mentioned also receive lads sent there by certain administrative authorities (guardians of the poor or school boards). No separation on account of difference of class is made among the boys.

The lads receive same instruction as is imparted in the national schools, being moreover employed not only in agricultural labour but also in different handicrafts.

The rules and regulations concerning the treatment of neglected and criminal children will probably undergo a thorough reform, since a Bill has been presented by the Government at the Storthing for this purpose.

SWITZERLAND.

Switzerland.

This question has been partly answered in connexion with the seventh. As there stated, there are establishments, organised like reformatory schools in England, for the correctional education of young offenders under 20 years of age.

ITALY.

Italy.

Offenders of not less than nine years of age, nor more than 18, who may be regarded as having been in possession of ordinary discretion, and those of more than 18 years of age, who are undergoing a punishment not exceeding three years penal servitude, are placed in a house of correction.

Italian reformatories are designated as follows :—

(a.) Institutes for education and correction.

(b.) Institutes for correctional education ; and

(c.) Institutes for paternal correction.

The first of these (a.) are intended for offenders under 10 years of age, and for those between 9 and 14 years who may be regarded as having acted without ordinary discretion.

The second class (b.) are intended for minors of 18 years who have been exposed to want, or have suffered from some incapacity to work, or from parental neglect, and for beggars and prostitutes; they remain there until they are reformed or have learnt a trade, but never beyond the age of 18.

The third class (c.) are for minors who are placed in them on the representation of their parents, because they are fractious and disobedient at home; they also may be detained until they are 18.

There are institutes both under Government and under private control. For inmates of these latter, the Government gives a subvention of 80 centimes ($7\frac{1}{2}d.$) a head per day. Families who have means pay to Government a daily sum of not more than one franc ($9\frac{1}{2}d.$) a day to the support of children confined in the institutes for paternal correction.

9. Does the treatment of female prisoners differ from that of male prisoners in any special way?

AMERICA, STATE OF NEW YORK.

America, State of New York.

There is no special way in which the treatment of female prisoners differs from that of male prisoners.

FRANCE.

France.

In long sentence as in short sentence prisons, women are subjected to the same regimen, to the same discipline, and are under the same obligations as men. In cases where the sentence is to travaux forcés, women, except at their own request, are excused transportation, and work out their sentence in a central prison, while men go to confinement in some one of the French possessions other than Algeria.

GERMANY—PRUSSIA.

As to prisons under the Minister of the Interior.—Female prisoners are, in general, treated like males, but the rations are somewhat less, and they are exempted from corporal correction, such as disciplinary punishment.

As to prisons under the Minister of Justice.—There is no difference between the treatment of female and male prisoners.

Females suckling infants in prison receive an increase of the ordinary rations corresponding to their requirements.

AUSTRIA.

The treatment of female prisoners is undertaken in entirely separate prisons and places, and differs chiefly from that of males in that the staff of officials is, with only two exceptions, entirely formed of sisters of the different Catholic Orders, who undertake the work under the control and with the financial aid of Government. The two exceptions are a Government inspector and the doctors. As is natural under such a system, the influence of religious teaching is much greater than in the prisons for males.

HUNGARY.

There is no special difference in the treatment of female and male prisoners except that the custody and superintendence in the prisons for females are effected by their own sex.

BELGIUM.

The regulations of 13th August 1876 and 28th December 1858 are applicable without distinction to prisoners of both sexes (Art. 160 to 162, and Art. 151 to 153), nevertheless the circular of 19th June 1871 determines the disciplinary measures applicable to women sentenced for a criminal offence.

SWEDEN.

Only with regard to disciplinary punishment for prison offences is there a difference in the treatment of the sexes. Corporal punishment can be inflicted on men but not on women.

NORWAY.

There is no essential difference in the treatment of male or female prisoners.

SWITZERLAND.

The penitentiary treatment in female prisons is the same as in male prisons. But, there is some difference in the kind of occupation designed to prepare them for earning a living on their discharge. They have to learn to sew, to knit, to spin, to wash, and to make up linen; in short, they have to be in a position to fill usefully a place as a domestic servant, or as a work-girl in a linen warehouse or a laundry.

ITALY.

Female prisoners are, generally speaking, subjected to the same treatment as men; except that they are usually placed in establishments near or in their places of origin or residence, and that they are only put in the strait jacket in cases of very serious violence. When pregnant, females are not punished without being first medically pronounced fit for punishment.

APPENDIX I.

10. The punishments for prison offences, their nature, by whom decreed, by whom carried out, and what record is kept of them?

AMERICA, STATE OF NEW YORK.

America, State of New York.

In State prisons, solitary confinement, only when it is deemed necessary by the warden, and on short allowance of provisions prescribed by the physician, until prisoner submits.

Attempts to escape from these prisons, or from other prisons, are punished by forfeiture of part of commutation of sentence.

In other prisons deprivation of visits and communications, and also confinement in dark cells, and isolation in light ones until submission.

The warden or deputy warden is the only officer who can order punishments to be inflicted. Record of each punishment is made, and reported monthly to the Governor of the State. Whipping is prohibited by law.

FRANCE.

France.

Offences (délits) committed in prison, if they are what would be held to be outside prison ordinary offences (délits de droit commun), are brought before a court of justice, and the offenders, if found guilty, are sentenced to the punishment prescribed by the penal code. The same conditions apply to such a punishment as would have done had it been incurred by a person outside prison, and the punishment is entered on the judicial records. Nevertheless, the law of 29th December 1880 lays down that a sentence to forced labour, for a "crime" committed in prison, should be served in France itself, and, unless this be impossible, in the very prison where the crime was committed.

In the case of breaches of the prison regulations the punishment is in the hands of the director of the prison. The director, having the chief officers of the prison as his assessors, holds a formal inquiry with every circumstance which can lend solemnity to the occasion, and then pronounces judgment. The recognised forms of punishment are the following:—

In long sentence prisons (maisons centrales).—Deprivation of open air exercise, of canteen privileges, of letters and visits, of school, of all or part of the money earned by work; bread and water diet; solitary confinement; confinement in a dark cell (cachot); and, in certain prescribed cases, irons. In addition, the offender may always be required to make good any damage he has done.

In short sentence prisons.—Reprimand; deprivation of the privileges of the canteen, and of wine, where allowed; of other food than bread for three consecutive days at most, the ration of bread being increased if necessary; punishment cell for 15 days at most, unless with the special authority of the préfet; irons, in specified cases. The director may also suspend, at his discretion, exercise (for three days at most); the receiving of books (for a week at most), but only for damaging or misusing books; letters (for a fortnight at most); visits (for a month at most).

The punishments inflicted for breaches of the prison regulations are entered in a register showing the prisoner's character (statistique morale); and this register guides the administration in determining what consideration may be shown to a prisoner, or what money rewards or relaxations of discipline may be accorded to him.

GERMANY—PRUSSIA.

Germany—Prussia.

As to prisons under the Minister of the Interior.—Disciplinary punishment is allowed as follows:—

(A.) In case of prisoners in the "Zuchthaus"—

(i.) By removal into the second class.

(ii.) By prohibiting the purchase of supplementary rations until after the expiration of three months.

(iii.) By prohibiting open air exercise for the first eight days.

(iv.) Reduction of rations, which can take place—

(a) by withholding the bread allowance for breakfast, lunch, or dinner; or (b) by withholding the meat allowance for the space of 14 days; or (c) by withholding the breakfast or dinner soup; or (d) by limiting food to bread and water for one day up to eight days.

Further, the meat allowance, as well as the breakfast and dinner soup, and the bread allowance, either in the morning or the evening, may be withheld for a period not exceeding 14 days.

(v.) Withholding meat and beer on a holiday.

(vi.) "Arrest" (solitary confinement in the cells) for a period of 14 days.

The same can be increased by withholding daylight, work, warm food, bedding, and by ordering a bed of laths.

If the "arrest" lasts more than three days, the prisoner has the enjoyment of daylight, of bedding, and of warm food every fourth day.

The prisoner is also taken for one hour into the fresh air every fourth day.

(vii.) Corporal correction up to 30 strokes. With every disciplinary punishment, wages up to the amount earned in the last three months may be withheld.

The supervising officials may double these punishments.

(B.) In case of those sentenced to "Gefängniss" and "Haft" disciplinary punishment is allowed—

(i.) By reprimand.

(ii.) Prohibiting purchase of supplementary rations for a period not exceeding two months.

(iii.) Withholding wages up to the amount of the last two months.

(iv.) Prohibiting open air exercise for a period not exceeding eight days, and books up to 14 days.

(v.) In cases of solitary confinement ("Einzelhaft"), withholding work, simultaneously with the prohibition of books for not more than eight days.

(vi.) Shortening of rations, which may take place—

(a) by withholding the bread allowance for breakfast, lunch, or dinner;
(b) withholding breakfast, lunch, or dinner soup;
(c) withholding meat allowance for a period of 14 days;
(d) by limiting food to bread and water from one day to eight days.

Withdrawal of the meat allowance, as well as that of the soup and bread, either in the morning, midday, or evening, may be ordered for a period not exceeding 14 days.

(vii.) "Arrest," consisting of solitary confinement for one month in a special cell. This punishment may be increased—

(a) by punishment bedding;
(b) by darkening the cell;
(c) by limiting the food to bread and water for 14 days, with the proviso that daylight, as well as the regulation bedding and rations, shall be allowed to the prisoner every fourth day.

The prisoners on that day are also taken into the fresh air for one hour. The disciplinary punishments in (i.) to (vi.) may be added together.

Disciplinary punishments are ordered by the governor of the prison, after the "Dossier" of the prisoner has been registered.

The consent of the board of superior officials (governor, clergymen, physician, inspectors, secretary, and instructors), and the written opinion of the physician that the prisoner can undergo the punishment without detriment to his health, are required before flogging and "lath" punishment is ordered.

The officials see that the punishments are enforced.

A monthly communication is addressed to the supervising authorities, stating what disciplinary punishments have been ordered during each month, the behaviour of the prisoners, and the names of those sentenced to flogging and "lath."

As to prisons under the Minister of Justice.—The punishments allowed are those specified above, under B., for prisoners sentenced to "Gefängniss" and "Haft."

APPENDIX I.

AUSTRIA.

Austria.

Prison offences are either offences against the prison regulations or such as would come under the General Austrian Penal Code, if the offender were at liberty.

(1.) All offences against the regulations are summarily punished by the order of the governor.

(2.) Prisoners undergoing less than a year's incarceration are brought before a tribunal for additional punishment, in case they are accused of an offence covered by the Public Penal Code.

(3.) Prisoners undergoing more than a year's incarceration may be punished for all misdemeanours and crimes—of which the usual penalty would not be more than six months' imprisonment—on the order of the governor.

(4.) All misdemeanours or crimes for which the General Code fixes a punishment of more than six months' imprisonment must be brought before the competent tribunal for trial.

The punishments inflicted by way of discipline in the prison itself and by its authorities are:—

(1.) A reprimand, privately or publicly;
(2.) Order to undertake either a less easy or disagreeable kind of work, or one that brings in less reward;
(3.) Temporary deprivation of extra comforts or privileges;
(4.) No breakfast in early morning (but this punishment is obsolete in most prisons);
(5.) Bread and water diet;
(6.) Shackling, or the strait-jacket;
(7.) Plank bed;
(8.) Solitary confinement in a cell;
(9.) Confinement in a dark cell but not for longer than three days, or 30 days in whole year;
(10.) Removal to a lower disciplinary class.

In some prisons the last two months' profit from the prisoner's work, or a part thereof, may be confiscated.

The upper warders are entrusted by the governor with the execution of the punishments, and a record is kept by the assessors in the governor's office, and sent to the Procurator-General in copy.

HUNGARY.

Hungary.

All breaches of the prison rules are subject to disciplinary punishments.

These punishments are:—

1. Warning.
2. Reprimand.
3. Withdrawal of special favours.
4. Reduction or withdrawal of rewards for work performed.
5. Simple or aggravated solitary confinement.
6. Fetters and handcuffs and strait waistcoat.

Disciplinary punishments are decreed by the director of the prison, and in his absence by the deputy director, and in gaols (Gefängniss) by the superintendent.

The necessary investigation is effected by the superior officer.

Disciplinary punishments are carried out by the commander of the prison guard in virtue of the authorisation of the director or superintendent of the prison.

A special record is kept of the disciplinary punishments according to the ministerial regulations issued for this purpose.

A special record is kept of the nature of the prison offences, whether caused by disturbance during divine service or at school, by immoral conduct, evasion or attempt at evasion, resistance, breaches of the prison rules in general, during work; and a record is kept of the kinds of punishment decreed, as to how many times the prisoner has been punished in prison, and of the cases in which punishment has been remitted.

BELGIUM.

Belgium.

The punishments are the following:—

1. Deprivation of work, of reading, of gratuities, of canteen privileges, of visits, of letters, and of other privileges granted in accordance with the regulations.

2. Bread and water diet.
3. Seclusion in a special cell or in a dark cell (cachot) with or without bread and water diet.
4. Withholding of rewards which could have been granted.

They are imposed by the director acting in accordance with the regulations. He prescribes the execution of the punishment and writes down in a special register the reasons for his action. So far as regards crimes or délits committed by prisoners, the director makes a report and gives notice at once to the Procureur du Roi and sends him later the original of his procés verbal. A copy of this document is sent to the office of the central prison authority, to the administrative commission governing the particular prison, and finally the commissary of the month is notified. It rests entirely with the Public Prosecutor to judge of the advisability of a prosecution.

SWEDEN.

Sweden.

Governors of central prisons have the right of imposing disciplinary punishments on the prisoners.

The punishments inflicted are:—

(a.) Low diet during a maximum time of eight days.
(b.) Cellular confinement, with or without occupation, during a maximum time of 30 days. The prisoner thus punished may also be deprived of bedding for at most eight nights.

And for grave offences:—

(c.) Dark cell during a maximum time of eight days.
(d.) Dark cell during eight days followed by light cell during 22 days.
(e.) Flogging, maximum number of stripes, 40 (flogging is not allowed in female prisons).

Before the imposing of any disciplinary punishment an inquiry into the case has to be held in due order by the governor, and a record thereof is always to be kept.

If sometimes severer punishments than those mentioned above are considered necessary, they are imposed by the Royal Prisons Board. In such case the record of the inquiry is sent in to the board by the governor, who has to propose the punishment.

All disciplinary punishments have to be entered in the prison register.

A prisoner kept in cellular confinement without occupation must be carefully observed by the governor and the medical officer. If the absence of occupation has any pernicious influence upon his health or state of mind, he is at once to be supplied with work.

Punishment with dark cell is not to be inflicted without consulting the medical officer of the prison as to the health and state of mind of the prisoner in question. If the medical officer considers such punishment in any way dangerous to the prisoner, it is not to be applied.

The maximum time of cellular confinement without occupation is one month. If such punishment is imposed for two months or a longer period, there must be an intermission of one month between every two of the term of punishment.

For the time during which a prisoner, sentenced to penal servitude, is, on account of disciplinary offences, kept in a cell without occupation, a deduction is made from his earnings of the cost of his food during the said time. The money thus forfeited goes to the savings fund of the penal establishments. (The object of this fund is the aid of discharged prisoners.)

The rules concerning disciplinary punishments in local prisons are as follows:—

"If any prisoner has rendered himself guilty of offences against the regulations of the prison, the governor must at once, or at the latest on the weekday following, report the matter to the provincial government, which has to decide as to the punishment to be inflicted; the governor of the prison being entitled, however, to put the offender into a dark cell when required for the maintenance of order, or to put him in irons should the safety of the prison make it necessary."

The usual punishments are:—

1. Withdrawal of occupation.
2. Low diet.
3. Deprivation of bedding.

And for grave offences:—

4. Dark cell.

APPENDIX I.

The maximum duration of all these punishments is eight days.

All punishments have to be entered in the prison register, and a special punishment roll is also to be kept.

NORWAY.

Norway.

The following disciplinary punishments are used at the penal institutions:—

(a.) For the convicts at the Penitentiary.—Limiting visits to the necessary inspection of superintendents; the deprivation of opportunities for work or reading; degradation to a lower class; and the deprivation of money earned by labour in prison. Moreover, convicts above 18 years of age may be put to bread and water for a period not exceeding five days, and be confined in a dark cell for a similar time; while prisoners who have not completed their 18th year may be deprived of single meals, or be put on half rations for two days and receive corporal punishment by being birched.

(b.) For prisoners in the common prisons.—The deprivation of tobacco, of one meal during the day for a term not exceeding 14 days; solitary confinement with ordinary fare for a term of from six to eight weeks, or on half rations for not more than 14 days; confinement in a dark cell on half rations for a time not exceeding 10 days; degradation to a lower class; deprivation of money earned by labour in prison; and chastisement with the rope's-end or the cane. Corporal punishment is, however, not used for women.

The punishments are decreed by the governor of the institution. Solitary confinement, on bread and water, or half-rations, or corporal punishment may not, however, be inflicted until the doctor has been consulted as to whether the state of the prisoner's health forms any obstacle thereto.

Corporal punishment is inflicted by one of the warders of the institution in the presence of the governor or sub-inspector, and the doctor, with two functionaries of the institution, must be present as witnesses.

Each case of corporal punishment, as also information as to the misdemeanour, which occasioned it, &c., must be duly entered in a record, a copy of which is forwarded annually to the Department of Justice.

In the district prisons the punishments in use are: the deprivation of the means of employment for a term not exceeding eight days, confinement in a dark cell for not more than four days, and for the male convicts, corporal punishment. The right of adjudging castigation lies with the governor; in doubtful cases, however, corporal punishment may not be inflicted without previous consultation with the doctor.

The chastisement must be executed by a keeper, or by one of the gaolers, under the superintendence of the keeper in the presence of a witness called in, and, if possible, the governor shall be present.

The castigation is entered in a special record which has to be examined when the prison is inspected.

SWITZERLAND.

Switzerland.

In modern establishments there figure, besides the punishment cell (cachot) and bread and water diet, the following punishments: admonition, deprivation of all kind of work, of books, of visits, of letters, and, to speak generally, of all or a part of the distractions, alleviations of discipline, and other favours mentioned above. Then there is the reduction to a lower class, which reduces the gratuity to be earned.

Those who out of malice or by negligence destroy or spoil the articles, tools, or raw material placed at their disposal are called upon to pay the value of the damage done.

It may be said that corporal punishment does not exist anywhere. During recent years recourse has only been had to it in two establishments where the Auburn system still obtains, and that in but one or two cases. This kind of punishment is replaced by the strait jacket and the cold douche.

All these punishments are inflicted by the director. In all prisons there is a register in which the punishments are recorded. These registers, especially in modern prisons, give full particulars of the cause, nature, and duration of the punishment inflicted.

ITALY.

Italy.

The punishments inflicted for offences against prison discipline are:—

(a.) Admonition orally administered by the director himself, in the presence of an official, or of the chief warder, a head warder or head watchman;

(b.) Ordinary confinement in a cell for from 1 to 20 days, with deprivation of extra food, and a bad mark for each day of detention;
(c.) Ordinary cell with bread and water diet for from 1 to 30 days, and two bad marks per day.
(d.) Punishment cell for from 5 to 15 days on bread and water, with three bad marks a day;
(e.) Punishment cell up to 30 days, with four bad marks a day;
(f.) Dark cell, on bread and water, from 5 to 20 days, with the strait jacket and irons, and five bad marks a day;
(g.) Solitary confinement in a cell for from two to six months, and two bad marks a day.

For offenders of less than 18 years the punishment is reduced in severity and duration.

Punishments for periods not exceeding ten days are inflicted by the director; other punishments are inflicted by the disciplinary council, composed of the director, the official who comes immediately after him in rank, and the chaplain and doctor.

Orders in relation to punishments are carried out by the warders, under the supervision of the director, and an account of each case is entered in registers kept for the purpose, and in the "record book" of each prisoner for the proper assignment of good and bad marks.

---

11. What are the regulations governing visits to or communications with prisoners?

America, State of New York.

America, State of New York.

A prisoner in a State prison cannot be communicated with or visited without the written permission of the Superintendent of State Prisons, or consent of the warden, and any letter or writing to be delivered to a prisoner, or to be sent by him out of prison, must first be examined and read by the warden or a person authorised by him. Whoever breaks these laws is guilty of a misdemeanour. Relatives are allowed to visit prisoners and communicate with them every two months.

In other prisons prisoners are allowed visitors once in four weeks and to communicate once in four weeks.

In the debtors' prison visitors are allowed to see prisoners and communicate with them at any time.

France.

France.

The same regulations as to visits and letters apply to both long-sentence and short-sentence prisons.

Permits to visit prisoners are given by the central administrative authority, though it is necessary in the case of prisoners awaiting trial that the permit bear the visa of the magistrate or judge. Persons awaiting trial and debtors are allowed a visit every day, and the former have all reasonable facilities for selecting and communicating with counsel. Prisoners undergoing sentence are only allowed two visits a week The hour of the day at which visits may be paid, and their duration, are fixed by a decision of the préfet. Save with the special authority of the Minister of the Interior, the préfet, the sous-préfet, or the judicial authorities, in the case of prisoners awaiting trial, visits must always be paid in a place set apart for that purpose (parloir) and in the presence of warders.

Except in very exceptional cases, which the chief warder must report to the director, prisoners are only allowed to write letters once a week, and preferably on Sundays. Prisoners awaiting trial can write every day. All letters are placed in envelopes bearing no external mark other than the address. As letters come in and go out they are read and endorsed by the director or chief warder, except letters addressed to the central prison authority, a judge, or magistrate, or counsel. Letters to or from prisoners awaiting trial are moreover communicated to the Procurator of the Republic, the magistrate or judge, as the case may be. Letters written to the administrative or judicial authorities must be handed to the director or chief warder sealed but not placed within envelopes, and they are entered in the special register prescribed by the regulations of the Minister of the Interior. Under no pretext must letters be unduly delayed.

GERMANY—PRUSSIA.

Germany—Prussia.

As to prisons under the Minister of the Interior.—"Zuchthaus" prisoners may, as a general rule, receive one visit every three months, those sentenced to "Gefängniss" and "Haft" one visit every month in the presence of an official.

The visits are, as a rule, limited to the nearest relations. Permission is granted by the governor of the prison.

As to prisons under the Minister of Justice.—Every prisoner may, as a rule, receive one visit a month. In cases of good behaviour visits are also permitted at shorter intervals. Permission in the case of prisoners under examination ("Untersuchung") is granted by the judge, and in the case of other prisoners by the governor of the prison.

AUSTRIA.

Austria.

Every prisoner in the lowest disciplinary class may receive and send one letter every two months, in the second class every six weeks, and in the third class every month. The letters are read before they leave or reach the prisoners, in case their contents may be objectionable.

Visits may also be received by prisoners at the same periods of time, but girls who are not relatives are not permitted to visit juvenile offenders at all.

Habitual criminals are frequently punished by being cut off from all such communication with the outside world.

HUNGARY.

Hungary.

Prisoners sentenced to hard labour (Zuchthaus) may receive their relatives once every quarter for half an hour; when sentenced to simple imprisonment (Kerker) once every month for an hour.

Prisoners confined in gaol (Gefängniss) may by special permission of the Public Prosecutor or his substitutes receive visits for an hour during the time of the day fixed for this purpose.

Conversation between the prisoner and the visitor may only take place in a loud voice in the presence of a prison officer and in a language understood by the latter. The conversation may only be held in the room specially set apart for this purpose, in which the prisoner is separated from the visitor.

The prisoner and the visitor are not allowed to hand anything to each other. Improper conversation or conduct is prohibited.

Prisoners sentenced to hard labour (Zuchthaus) may only write to their husbands or wives or their nearest relatives, and only once in every quarter.

Prisoners sentenced to simple imprisonment (Kerker) may also write to other persons provided they receive the permission of the director to do so, once every month.

Letters written to or by prisoners are subject to the control of the superintendent of the prison, and, if the latter finds their contents objectionable, he keeps them among the other papers belonging to the prisoner until his liberation.

BELGIUM.

Belgium.

Prisoners can receive visits from their fathers, mothers, husbands, wives, children, and guardians on Sundays, on the production by the visitor of a certificate of his identity. No other visits are allowed except by the permission in writing of the central administration, the president, the vice-president, or a member of the administrative commission. Persons committed for trial (not forbidden to communicate) can be visited every day by their fathers, mothers, husbands, wives, children, brothers, sisters, uncles, aunts, and guardians. Every visitor must prove his identity. After the first hearing of their case counsel are allowed to communicate freely at all hours of the day with their clients; all other persons must be furnished with a written order of the central administration, of the administrative commission, or of its president. The visits take place in a special room (parloir) in the presence of a male or female warder, but in the case of communications between a defendant and his counsel the law prescribes that they shall take place without the presence of any person not directly concerned, and without any witness. Letters and parcels addressed from outside are deposited in the director's office. The director has them delivered to the prisoners after assuring himself that they do not contain anything objectionable or dangerous, or transmits them to the administrative commission, and, in case of urgency, to the commissary of the month. The commission or the commissary on duty decides whether the articles should be handed to the persons concerned, suppressed, or sent back to the senders. Letters addressed to prisoners who are as a preventive measure forbidden to correspond or not, are in the first case sent at once to the juge d'instruction, in the second case only when he has ordered their seizure in virtue of an order.

Sweden.

Sweden.

In the law of the 29th of July 1892 the following instructions are inserted about visits to prisoners and their correspondence :—

(a.) Without permission of the proper authorities a prisoner sentenced to penal servitude may not receive or send any communications or letters from or to any other person in or outside the prison, or receive visits of anyone else than warders, the medical officer, or the chaplain of the prison, and such persons as have control and supervision of the prison, or, on account of their official duties, have access to the same.

(b.) A prisoner sentenced to simple imprisonment has the right of receiving visits of husband or wife, children, brothers, or sisters. The governor of the prison is, however, to be informed of these visits, and he has the right of fixing a suitable time for the same and, should he find it needful, to order one of the warders to be present during the visits.

No other than the aforesaid persons and those mentioned above (chaplain, &c.) may visit the prisoner without permission, and the prisoner has no right to receive or send letters, unless he is allowed by the manager of the prison to do so. Such permission is, however, not to be denied when the letters are of a private nature and are found not to contain anything by which the order and security of the prison might be endangered.

On the basis of these general rules different customs have been adopted in different penal establishments. In the large central prisons the inmates are usually allowed to receive visits from their relatives on the first Sunday of every month, and to send out one letter every third month. The letters received or sent out are always read and examined by the deputy-governor, assisted by the sergeant-major (the principal chief warder). Special forms, with the regulations concerning prisoners' correspondence printed on the top, are given to the prisoners for their letters, and in some prisons special rooms have been adapted for the receiving of visits to prisoners.

In local gaols where prisoners awaiting trial or sentenced to short terms of imprisonment or penal servitude are kept, the governors usually permit visits by proper persons (vide above) whenever applied for.

Norway.

Norway.

The consent of the governor is necessary in each special case before a convict serving his time in any penal institution can receive or send a letter, or see a visitor, and the frequency of the permission to receive visits, or to send or receive letters, depends on the grade or class the convict is in, varying between every third month (in first class) and each month (in fifth class).

Interviews between convicts and their relations or friends may only take place in the presence of one of the functionaries of the prison, who must carefully observe that nothing is passed by the visitor to the convict. A certain hour of the day is fixed when the visit is allowed, and the governor on each special case decrees how long the interview may last.

No letter may be despatched by or delivered to a convict unless it has been read by the governor and chaplain. Should the governor deem the contents of the letter such that it should be confiscated, the prisoner is, as a rule, informed of the fact.

In the common prisons letter-writing is only allowed on Sundays and Holy-days.

In the district prisons those inmates detained on penal arrest are allowed to receive visitors at a time of day decided by the governor, and there is no prohibition as to their despatching or receiving letters. Should abuse of this privilege occur, the governor may curtail or refuse the permission to see visitors, and also demand to see the letters before they are sent off by or delivered to the prisoners.

Prisoners undergoing imprisonment on ordinary gaol allowance, or bread and water, may be permitted by the governor to receive visitors once a fortnight, or under special conditions oftener, but the interview must always take place in the presence of a warder or gaoler. Whether the prisoner may receive or despatch letters depends on the decision arrived at by the governor after reading the letter. Prisoners under detention have all the opportunities of interviews which is compatible with due order and security, and perfect freedom as regards correspondence. This may, however, be limited when the special cause for detention renders such proceeding necessary.

SWITZERLAND.

Switzerland.

The visits of relatives and intimate friends are allowed under careful control in prisons where penitentiary education is carefully looked after.

The regulations of particular prisons differ in the freedom with which this favour is accorded, but as a general rule one visit a month is allowed. As in the case of letters, the privilege of visits is frequently extended in all cases where visits may have a salutary influence.

Visitors are received by the director or, in his absence, by the chief warder. One of these officers hears the conversation which takes place, and keeps a watch upon it. The director or his substitute places visitors and prisoners as much as possible at their ease, so that the latter may consider them as friends before whom they can speak freely.

Generally speaking, the extension of the privilege of writing and receiving letters is more readily granted than that of visits, since the latter have not always the good effect that might be expected of them. Cases, however, do arise where visits have an excellent effect, above all with prisoners who have imagined that they are forgotten, disowned, or abandoned by their family, and who see their relatives come back to them in a spirit of forgiveness.

Moreover, visits allow the director to form some judgment as to the character and circumstances of a prisoner's family; and this enables him to act with greater assurance and effect in the prisoner's interest.

In most prisons the days of the week are so occupied by labour, school instruction, exercise, school tasks (devoirs de classe), and on Sunday mornings by worship, that it is thought proper to leave prisoners Sunday afternoons to utilise as they please. It is in these few hours that they may write letters to their relations and friends, the freedom with which they can then correspond following the rule of their particular canton.

In establishments where the system of stages has been introduced prisoners in the intermediate class can write letters every two months, those in the superior class every month. But an extension of this favour is frequently accorded, particularly in cases where a more frequent correspondence cannot but draw family ties closer, exercise a good influence, and contribute to the moral cure of the prisoner.

This powerful engine of moral reform is more or less neglected in establishments whose organisation is defective.

Correspondence between prisoners and their relatives, when it is carried on with the utmost freedom of expression, despite the censorship of the authorities, produces the happiest results. This opinion is held by all directors of prisons. Since letters pass under their eyes, expressions sometimes slip into them not without a tinge of hypocrisy; but notwithstanding this, intercourse by means of letters develops strong affection, and awakens sacred memories of the family life.

ITALY.

Italy.

With the exception of Members of Parliament, of the superior administrative authorities, judicial or ecclesiastical functionaries, and certain officials in the exercise of their duties of office, a written permit from the Ministry is always necessary (or from the prefect of the province), to visit a prison.

Permits are only given for reasons of study; only two persons are admitted at one time to visit the same prison or reformatory. It is moreover forbidden to speak to the prisoners; and to visit those under disciplinary punishments or those who are forbidden to hold conversation.

For conversations with prisoners permits are also necessary, in writing, from the judicial or administrative authorities, according as the prisoners are on arrest without trial, or during trial or already sentenced but appealing to the Court of Appeal, or prisoners who have no recourse to appeal. Only relations or persons who have a legitimate interest in the prisoners are admitted to conversation with them in this way.

Those under arrest, and those sentenced to less than three months' imprisonment, can have conversations twice a week, and write a letter to their relations once a week.

Those condemned to hard labour in a penitentiary are allowed one conversation a year, during the period of continuous solitary confinement; and once every six months for the rest of the period, with permission to write a letter to relatives every four months.

Those condemned to simple imprisonment are allowed a conversation every six months during the first period, and every three months during the second, with a letter every three months.

Those condemned to common detention in a prison are allowed a conversation once every month, and to write a letter as often too.

The conversations may not last more than half an hour, and take place in special rooms (parlatoriums) reserved for the purpose, in the presence of warders. Exceptions are made for prisoners who are found to be seriously ill, or for those whose relations have come on purpose to see them from a long distance.

In writing letters to relations, prisoners must use fitting language and confine themselves to affairs and interests connected with their families, not entering upon discussions about other things; they are allowed a half sheet of paper, and the letters are read and examined by the director or an official appointed by him for the purpose.

In exceptional circumstances of serious importance, the director may allow the prisoners to telegraph, or to write sooner than their proper time.

12. The kinds of penal labour in use, for what classes of prisoners, for how many hours per day, with what reliefs, and how adapted to differences of strength?

13. The industrial or productive kinds of labour in use. Is there any competition with free labour? Are there any arrangements for employing prisoners in agricultural labour?

America, State of New York.

America, State of New York.

The labour of the "corrigible" or less vicious class is directed with reference to fitting the prisoners to maintain themselves by honest labour after their discharge, and they may be employed at hard labour for industrial training and instruction solely, and even though no useful or saleable products result from their labour.

The labour of the "incorrigible," or more vicious class, is directed primarily to the production of the greatest amount of useful and saleable products, and secondarily to fitting them to maintain themselves by honest industry after their discharge, even though thereby their labour be rendered less productive.

The labour of the "incorrigible" or insubordinate class is directed solely to such exercise as shall tend to the preservation of health, or the manufacture, without the aid of machinery, of such articles as are needed in the public institutions of the State, or such other manual labour as the Superintendent of State Prisons may direct, provided it does not compete with free labour. In State prisons, prisoners who are declared by the prison physician to be physically capable are employed for not more than eight hours a day, excepting Sundays and public holidays, with an hour for dinner, breakfast being served before beginning, and supper after finishing work.

The system of labour is either by the public account system, when the State furnishes machinery and material for the labour of prisoners, and markets the products of it, or by the "piece-price system" when the State receives payment for the products of labour upon materials and machinery furnished wholly by a person, or furnished partly by such person and partly by the State.

In penitentiaries the prisoners work from eight to ten hours a day with the same relief as in State prisons, and they are provided with work suitable to their strength. If a prisoner has knowledge of a trade he is put to work at it, provided his conduct is good.

In State prisons the industries carried on comprise shoemaking, rag picking, tailoring, preparing fibre for brushes and brooms, stone cutting, polishing, &c., broom making, harness and saddlery, furniture and woodworking, marble cutting, and boys' and ladies' waistmaking, iron hollow ware, but no agricultural labour. The Superintendent of Prisons selects the kinds of industry least likely to interfere with free labour with which there is competition.

In penitentiaries prisoners make all the clothing and shoes required in the prison, keep the buildings, roads, &c., in repair, and do agricultural labour within the prison walls. There is no competition with free labour. No prisoners are employed in agricultural labour outside the prison precincts.

To the foregoing report as to the State of New York may be added the following abstract* of information, covering the States generally, contained in the valuable report issued in 1886 by the United States Commissioner of Labour:—

The general systems of employment of convicts were divided into the following heads:—

I. The contract system under which a contractor employs convicts at a certain agreed price per day for their labour, the prisoners working under the immediate direction of the contractor or his agents. Under this system the institution usually furnishes to the contractor the power necessary, and even the machinery, for carrying on the work.

II. The piece-price system, which is simply a modification of the contract system. Under this system the contractor furnishes to the prison the materials in a proper shape for working, and receives from the prison the manufactured articles at an agreed piece price, the supervision of the work being wholly in the hands of the prison officials.

III. The public account system, under which the institution carries on the business of manufacturing like a private individual or firm, buying raw materials and converting them into manufactured articles, which are sold in the best available market.

IV. The lease system under which the institution leases the convicts to a contractor for a specified sum and for a fixed period, the lessee usually undertaking to clothe, feed, care for, and maintain proper discipline among the prisoners while they perform such labour as may have been determined by the terms of the lease.

It resulted from inquiries conducted by trained employees of the Labour Commission that in 1886 the number of convicts employed in the United States in the various systems of prison labour was as follows:—

	Total.	Males.	Females.
I. On the public account system	22,175	19,543	2,632
II. On the contract system	23,591	22,280	1,311
III. On the piece-price system	8,884	7,338	1,546
IV. On the lease system	9,699	9,293	406

It is shown that in prisons or penitentiaries where prisoners are confined under sentence for crimes of the higher grade there was in 1886 a total of 44,512 convicts, 33,661 being employed in productive labour, 8,146 in prison duties, 2,705 idle and sick. In houses of correction, workhouses, gaols, and institutions of like grade, the total number of convicts was 9,839, 5,859 being engaged in productive labour, 3,205 in prison duties, and 775 idle and sick. In industrial and reform schools and other institutions in which prisoners while undergoing short sentences were temporarily employed, the whole number of inmates was 9,998, of which number 5,757 were engaged in productive labour, 3,749 in prison duties, and 492 idle and sick.

Of 45,277 convicts employed in productive labour the largest number (7,609) were employed in the manufacture of boots and shoes, next coming clothing employing 5,561, farming, gardening, &c., 3,500, furniture 3,400, mining 3,273, public ways 3,089, stone (including quarrying, marble dressing, ditch digging, &c.) 4,876.

* Communicated by Mr. C. Spring Rice.

The total product for the year was valued at about 5,900,000*l.*, and it is estimated that while it took 45,277 convicts to produce this result, it would have taken 35,534 free labourers to have produced the same quantity of goods in the same time, or, in other words, a free labourer is equal to 1·27 convict.

In order to show the amount of competition in each of the leading industries carried on in the prisons, tables are drawn up comparing the results of convict labour to those of free labour as exhibited in the tables of the Census of 1880. It is not, however, stated what was the rise or fall of prices after the interval of six years which elapsed since the census was taken. But the results of the tables, ceteris paribus, show a great superiority of free labour over convict labour. For instance, the per capita product of free labour was $1,492 in all States in which boots and shoes were manufactured in prisons, while the per capita product for convict labour was $1,327 per annum. For this industry the number of convicts engaged was 6·17 per cent. of the number of free labourers.

The following table shows the amount of competition between free and convict labour :—

Industry.	Convicts.	Free.	Proportion of Convict to Free Labour.
Agricultural implements	651	4,064	1 to 6·2
Barrels, &c.	667	25,973	1 „ 38·9
Boots	7,609	138,639	1 „ 18·2
Bricks	861	66,355	1 „ 77·1
Brooms, &c.	2,123	8,773	1 „ 4·1
Carriages and waggons	1,376	54,206	1 „ 39·4
Cigars	669	53,297	1 „ 79·7
Clothing	5,561	252,716	1 „ 45·4
Furniture	3,446	59,304	1 „ 17·2
Saddlery	1,455	24,261	1 „ 16·7

The average daily hours of convict labour range from 8 to 11 hours. The usual number of hours appears to be 10.

In farming, gardening, &c. the total number of convicts employed was 3,548, of whom 3,279 were men and 269 women. They were almost all employed in the States of Alabama and Mississippi, and under the lease system.

France.

A sentence to forced labour (iravaux forcés) for a criminal offence was formerly served within the territorial limits of France itself in the galleys which are now abolished. The law of 30th May 1854 requires these prisoners to be transported to some French possession other than Algeria.

In the metropolitan prisons every inmate, whatever the nature of his sentence, is obliged to work. Only prisoners awaiting trial and debtors may remain idle, though they are employed on work if they ask for it. The hours of work are fixed by the special regulations of each prison. The fact that work is compulsory does not legally involve any relaxation of prison discipline, but a prisoner can have deducted, in a fixed proportion, from his daily earnings a sum which will enable him to procure supplementary rations, linen, and clothing. The administration does its best to assign prisoners to workshops in accordance with their degree of skill and strength.

For the rest it may be said that the organisation of labour is hardly complete in any but long-sentence prisons. In those where the prisoner remains but a few weeks or months work is more difficult to procure and to teach; save in prisons where the number of effectives is high, it is an occupation rather than a veritable industry which must be found. Most of the time the occupation consists merely of easy and simple tasks which afford the prisoner little remuneration, but which, since they require but a short apprenticeship, do enable him to earn some wages speedily.

Complaints have been made by certain trades at various times against the competition of prison labour. The Government has given the subject serious attention, and, in order to obviate the inconveniences pointed out, has revised the regulations previously in force, the interpretation of which may possibly have given rise to abuses, with a view to giving a legitimate satisfaction to the interests concerned (Order of 15th April 1882). Notably, the Government has admitted the principle that chambers of commerce, chambers of arts and manufactures, and the like, belonging to the district in which a prison is situated should be consulted. These consultative bodies formulate their opinion on matters concerning the wages that should be paid for penal labour, the maximum number of prisoners who should be employed on a particular industry, &c., &c. The opinions thus collected are communicated to the Minister of the Interior, who fixes the various tariffs in such a way that free labour shall not suffer on account of prison labour.

The law of 5th August 1850 provided for the creation of agricultural colonies for the detention of juvenile offenders and their employment in agriculture and the principal industries connected with it. As for adults, there is no enactment requiring them to be so employed. Nevertheless, the prison administration possesses three agricultural penitentiaries, two of which, situated in Corsica, receive certain native prisoners from Algeria, viz., dangerous malefactors who have been sentenced to réclusion, and whose presence in large numbers in the prisons of the Colony would present certain dangers. The third is situated in Algeria itself, and is designed for native prisoners sentenced by the Police Correctionnelle, and for European prisoners of all classes. In every respect the regimen of these penitentiaries is the same as that of the central prisons.

Germany—Prussia.

Germany—Prussia.

As to prisons under the Minister of the Interior.—Respecting the labour of prisoners, the Criminal Code prescribes as follows :—

(i.) Par. 15. Those sentenced to "Zuchthaus" are employed on labour within the prison. They may also be employed in work outside the prison, particularly on public works or works superintended by the State officials. This class of employment is only admissible when the prisoners, during the performance of their labour, are kept apart from other free labourers.

(ii.) Par. 16 (2). Those sentenced to "Gefängniss" are employed in a prison in such a way as is adapted to their capacities and circumstances. They are so employed at their own request. Employment outside the prison (par. 15) is only admissible with their consent.

(iii.) Those sentenced to "Haft" are not obliged to work, those only sentenced to "Haft" on account of begging, vagabondage, or trade in obscene articles, are employed in labour of such a kind as is adapted to their capacities and circumstances, within the prison, and so long as they are kept apart from free labourers, also beyond the precincts of the prison (par. 362 of the Criminal Code).

In the distribution of work the individuality of the prisoner is taken into consideration.

Working hours extend over 10 to 11 hours; as relief quarter of an hour to half is allowed daily in the morning, an hour at midday, quarter of an hour in the afternoon, quarter to half an hour in the evening, half to one hour for a walk in the fresh air. School instruction on week days is included in the working hours.

As to prisons under the Minister of Justice.—Those sentenced to "Gefängniss" are employed in labour in such a manner as is adapted to their capacities and conditions; at their own request they are so employed. Employment outside the prison can only take place with their consent, and this only when they can be kept apart from free labourers.

Those sentenced to "Haft" are not obliged to work. Only those convicted on a charge of begging, vagabondage, or trade in obscene articles, can be employed outside the prison in labour, adapted to their capacities and conditions, in a similar manner to the "Gefängniss" prisoners inside the prison, and provided they are kept apart from the other free labourers. Their employment on work outside the prison precincts is allowed even without their consent.

Work adapted to their capacities and conditions does not signify a trade which the prisoner has already learned or exercised. The director of the prison decides any case of doubt whether the work is adapted to the prisoner's capacities and conditions.

If such work presents itself the prisoner is set to it. The governor can exempt him only in exceptional cases. He can also allow single prisoners to do other than the work allotted to them. Prisoners to whom work is not allotted are free to choose their own labour.

The apportionment of a particular branch of work in a prison is ordered by the prison governor, whose duty it is to take the prisoner's wishes as far as possible into consideration.

Prisoners may also be employed in labour outside the prison, particularly on public works, or works superintended by State officials. Care is taken that prison labour offers as little competition as possible to free labour.

Prisoners' working hours are, as a rule, on week days, in summer 10 hours, in winter nine. On Sundays and Saints' days no prison labour is enforced. Prisoners of the Jewish persuasion are not obliged to work on the more important Jewish feast days against their will. Prisoners who are excused work by the governor's order may, on the other hand, be employed on Sundays and Saints' days upon noiseless work.

AUSTRIA.

Austrian penal labour is chiefly employed for purposes which serve the State directly, and so cannot be said to enter into such close competition with free labour. But certain articles of general utility, such as baskets, are made in great quantities, but mostly for export to foreign countries to avoid home competition.

Again, prisoners may be employed—in each case with the direct approval of the Ministry of Justice—to execute work for private contractors, &c., but always inside the prison in this case. At present the aim is to ensure that every prisoner shall contribute as much as possible to his own support and that of the prison, and also to teach him some handicraft by which he will be able to earn a living on leaving prison. At the same time great attention is paid to the social class, education, or manual skill of prisoners, and many different kinds of work are carried on in a single prison, in order to suit the capacities of the different inmates. But the Draft Criminal Code, now under consideration by Parliament, would provide for a stricter arrangement of labour, according, especially, to the length of punishment or kind of crime; and whereas now every healthy prisoner must work at something, it is proposed that there should be three new classes, the first to work full time, the second to work only part of the day, and the third hardly at all. The present working day is of 10 hours, and of eight for juveniles, who have to attend lessons as well, with usual intervals for meals and exercise. Sundays and church holidays are free, but prisoners may do work if they obtain permission, and do not disturb others by noise or otherwise. Adaptation of labour to the varying strength of prisoners is decided by the governor of the prison, and very special attention is paid to this.

By far the greater part of Austrian prison labour goes to furnish uniforms, boots, &c., for the army, post office, &c.: cardboard boxes and canvas for use by the State Tobacco Monopoly; binding school books for board schools; so that the general public cannot well complain of the State turning one branch of its service to help another. Owing to repeated complaints, almost everything that could partake of the nature of competition with free labour has been given up. Large bodies of convicts have been employed, but only since 1886, in carrying out works in the open air in gangs, on such State operations as building State railway embankments, damming or embanking rivers, &c. But there is no regular agricultural settlement, excepting in some out-of-the-way parts of the country, where attempts have been made at times to reclaim tracts of land and render them productive by this means.

To encourage industry and to provide a small sum to be at the disposal of the prisoner on discharge, a few pence per day are reckoned to the credit of every well-conducted prisoner for a full day's work, amounting to about a 1*d.* in the first or lowest disciplinary class, 1½*d.* in the second, and 1½*d.* to 2*d.* in the third, and the prisoners are allowed to do extra work for purposes of private gain to themselves. Habitual criminals are either allowed none or very little of this pay. For prisoners condemned to more than 10 years' servitude only five years of pay are allowed.

The prisoner is, however, allowed to use half of his pay in buying small comforts, such as tea, &c., and useful articles, such as letter paper, books, &c. The other half, or the whole if he chooses, is invested in State savings banks for the prisoner's benefit on discharge. Fines are sometimes paid, and breakages, &c. caused by negligence are repaired out of the prisoner's pay.

The following are some statistics of penal labour in Austria proper:—

APPENDIX I.

HUNGARY.

Hungary.

Prisoners sentenced to hard labour (Zuchthaus) are bound to do the work designated by the director.

Prisoners confined in gaol or sentenced to simple imprisonment (Kerker and Gefängniss) are allowed to choose among the different kinds of work adopted in the prison.

Outside the prison prisoners can only be employed on public works. But prisoners sentenced to simple imprisonment can only be employed on public works if they consent to do so, and are always separated from the prisoners sentenced to hard labour (Zuchthaus).

Prisoners (Zuchthaus, Kerker, Gefängniss) are employed in different industries and only exceptionally on works which require to be performed in the open air. Prisoners confined in intermediary prisons may be employed on agricultural works during the warm season.

Prisoners sentenced to hard labour (Zuchthaus) work 12 hours a day during the winter, and 13 hours a day during the summer months. Other prisoners 12 hours a day in the winter, and 11 hours a day during the remaining months.

Prisoners do not work on Sundays or on the holidays prescribed by their respective confessions.

Work is not done which is dangerous to health. Work which involves bodily exercise is preferred to sedentary work, especially in the case of young male prisoners.

The different industries adopted in the prisons are those of:—

Tailor, bootmaker, carpenter, turner, wheeler, painter, sieve maker, locksmith, smith, ropemaker, brazier, gilder, bookbinder, buttonmaker.

The products of prison industry are in the first instance used for the purposes of the prisons themselves and to supply the wants of other State institutions. Besides this, special care is taken that the products of prison industries shall only be brought into the market in small quantities, and that no such articles shall be brought into circulation which are supplied in sufficient quantities by local manufacturers.

Prisoners confined in intermediary houses are employed on agricultural and garden works.

BELGIUM.

Belgium.

No penal labour, as the term is understood in England, is in use in Belgian prisons.

The employment of a prisoner follows his aptitude for any particular industry. The object of the administration is chiefly to favour the development of a knowledge already acquired, and to enable the prisoners to obtain some benefit from their knowledge, and secure a bonus against the time of their discharge. In the case of prisoners who know no trade, easy occupations, which must be regarded as simple methods of employment, are provided.

The regulation of the 5th April 1887 enables an idea to be formed of the organisation of the portion of the prison service. The fourth and fifth articles determine a case in which recourse can be had to free or contract labour to find an occupation for the prisoner. The moment that the directors of prisons have to appeal to private contractors to find occupation for the prisoners there always results a certain competition with free labour. And this is the reason why the administration is always on the look-out for means of developing the execution of works for the State, i.e., to supply the wants of the prisons themselves, of the army, and other public services.

No prison is provided with the means for agricultural labour properly so called. In the precincts of certain establishments the open ground, if sufficiently spacious, is given over to the cultivation of vegetables, which are used to feed the prisoners.

SWEDEN.

Sweden.

Penal labour in the special sense of the word, e.g., unproductive work on such implements as, e.g., treadwheels and cranks, is not in use in Sweden. Sharp and efficient disciplinary punishments are, as has already been stated, inflicted upon refractory, violent, or lazy prisoners, but when they are set to work they always receive a useful and productive occupation. The cellular confinement is in itself sufficiently deterrent and repulsive, and the prison labour which is supplied in Swedish penitentiaries is therefore always intended to be an educational and reformatory element of the penal system.

The majority of Swedish prisoners are, as has been shown above, during the whole duration of their punishment kept to cellular confinement. Is is therefore an important duty incumbent upon the prison authorities to provide the inmates of cellular prisons with such labour as can be performed in solitary confinement. In local gaols the governors are, according to the regulations of these prisons (given in the Royal Ordinance of the 28th of May 1867) bound to do all in their power to supply the prisoners left to their care with suitable work. Most of the inmates of these prisons belong to the rural population the chief occupation of which, when at liberty, is farming, and many of them are unskilled labourers from the towns. Simple trades, such as basket-work and brush-making, are often taught by warders who have been especially trained for this purpose by teachers of "sloyd" sent out by the Prisons Board. Since most of the prisons in question are situated in small towns where it is rather difficult to procure for the prisoners such labour as is of an instructive character, the governors are often obliged to furnish the prisoners with the occupations which they have been able to find for them, e.g., making matchboxes, paper bags, and envelopes, stripping feathers and down, oakum picking, sorting beans and different kinds of grain, knitting and needlework, making nets, and other fishing apparatus, mat-making and rag-cutting, &c.

Skilled labourers, e.g., tailors, shoemakers, joiners, painters, &c., are, as a rule, supplied with such work as belongs to their respective trades.

In order to obtain suitable and sufficient work for associated prisoners in the central prisons the contract system has been adopted in some of these prisons, but all labour is performed under the supervision of the warders and trade instructors of the respective penal establishments. Foremen who receive their payment from the contractors are always attached to the prisons as extra warders or supernumerary officers. They are thus subordinate to the governors and other superior officials.

The principal industries carried on by means of the contract system are the manufacture of woollen and linen cloth, hosiery, cravats, brushes, wicker-work, &c.

In the large central prison for men at Nya Warfoct the contract system has not been adopted. All work for the prisoners is there arranged for by the prison authorities themselves. At this prison, where a large proportion of the inmates belong to the rural population, agricultural labour is one of the chief occupations.

At the chief central prisons there are also workshops for bookbinding, joinery and cabinetmaking, tailoring, shoemaking, painting, &c., carried on under the guidance of the trade instructors and overseers of the prisons. Many prisoners who are unskilled labourers before their arrival at the prison, are there taught a trade.

The female central prison in Gothenburg, in which laundry work is done, is nearly self-supporting.

In the central establishments the prisoners under cellular confinement are usually occupied in a more instructive way than in local prisons. Such prisoners as are unskilled labourers, and have long terms, often receive instruction in a trade in order to help them to earn an honest livelihood after their release.

The competition of prison with free labour has, in consequence of the large extension of the separate system (with hand labour in cells), been reduced to an insignificant minimum. Complaints on account of alleged illegitimate competition on the part of the prisons are not often heard, and the causes of discontent, when such has arisen among free tradesmen, have almost always been more imaginary than well grounded.

Norway.

In convict prisons penal labour is not customary, but the men are chiefly occupied in various kinds of handicrafts, and the women in weaving, washing, needlework, and knitting.

The real working hours are ten, or ten and a half, daily, on Saturdays or the eve of a holy day a couple of hours less. As to the hours of work for the convicts in the penitentiary, there is no strict rule for prisoners under 18 years of age, as it is left to the discretion of the governor, after daily considering the age, development, and strength of the prisoner, and consulting with the chaplain and doctor, to determine how long the hours of work shall be.

Complaints have often been made on the part of free artisans outside that the convict prisons compete with them in the same branch of trade, and the administration has therefore tried to limit this competition as far as possible, not only by introducing new developments of handicraft that are not taken up by the artisans of this country, but also by telling the convicts off to a great number of various branches of trade, and by keeping the prices of the things made at the penal institutions as high as the usual charge made for similar articles. There is, moreover, a prohibition against the execution of orders from private persons for articles of handicraft.

There has been no opportunity for employing the prisoners in farming or agricultural labour.

The prisoners in the district prisons are not obliged to labour except in the case of children that have not completed their fifteenth year. It is, however, decreed that both prisoners under detention, as also convicts in the aforesaid prisons, shall receive suitable employment if they so wish and circumstances permit. The work done at the district prisons, however, is of so little importance, comparatively speaking, that there can be no real cause of complaint concerning competition with artisans who enjoy their liberty.

Switzerland.

Switzerland.

A legal distinction between penal and industrial labour is only made in cantons where an antiquated system of houses of correction (maisons de force) obtains, and in which a certain class of prisoners is engaged on public works and utilised either for the making of roads, or the embanking of rivers, or work in the fields, &c.

This distinction is not made in establishments where the reform of the prisoner is the goal aimed at. Without doubt many kinds of labour are disagreeable and offer few attractions, and individuals who are engaged in them would not undertake them of their own free will; these kinds of labour thus acquire the character of forced or penal labour. In certain establishments prisoners are put to such work on their entry, and during the first part of their cellular stage, also prisoners who are degraded from the intermediate stage and placed in cellular confinement, and lastly the idle and intractable, &c.

This penal labour is of the nature of disciplinary punishment. The kinds of labour reckoned under this head are: the sawing and chopping of firewood, straw-plaiting, the sorting of coffee beans, the making of envelopes and paper cones, and the like.

Nowhere is any penal labour corresponding to the tread-mill to be found.

Forced labour in public, with the ignominy necessarily attached to it, is not unfavourable to physical health, but has a deplorable moral effect.

Penal labour introduced into modern Swiss penitentiaries as a light disciplinary punishment is only applied as a temporary measure; it is not harmful to the health of prisoners, and as prisoners often get disgusted with it they seek to regain the confidence of the authorities so as to be admitted to a class of work more interesting and more lucrative.

In most penitentiaries several branches of industry are carried on, among which the more important and the more common are the following:—Weaving, boot-making, and the manufacture of wearing apparel, carpentry and varnishing, upholstery, cooperage and the making of wooden measures, brush-making, locksmiths', blacksmiths', and tinsmiths' work, the binding or boarding of books, paper-ruling and lithography, clock-making, turnery, basket-making, needlework, embroidery, and knitting.

For short-sentence prisoners there are the plaiting of straw chair-bottoms, the making of slippers, mats, envelopes, and paper bags, and trellis-work in wire.

Then come the domestic services in connexion with the heating of the prison, the laundry, the kitchen, &c., and clerical work.

Industrial work in the Swiss prisons is directed by the administration itself. Trials which have been made in some prisons of the system of handing over the work to contractors for a fixed daily payment have been very soon abandoned. Orders are taken in at the prison; the raw material is supplied either by the administration or its customers, the tools belonging to the establishment. The work itself is superintended by warder-overseers, who calculate the value of the workmanship and the material used. This calculation is based on market prices. Care is taken everywhere to give the public sound and finished work, and thus the industrial products of Swiss prisons enjoy generally a good reputation.

In the interests of penitentiary education this system is preferred in modern prisons to the contract system. The administration being sovereign can introduce a greater variety into the kinds of work, and can thus take account of the different aptitudes shown by prisoners. The splitting up of prisoners among a larger number of industries results in but relatively few prisoners being employed in any particular branch of industry, and thus free labour has no serious competition to fear. Efforts are made to push prison goods not by their cheapness but by their fine and durable workmanship.

Were it otherwise penitentiaries, which should also be schools of industry, would be diverted from their true end. It is held in Switzerland that penitentiary education is incompatible with the service of prison labour to contractors. The administration alone can take care that each prisoner learns a trade during the period of his sentence, so that at the moment of his discharge he can earn an honest living. APPENDIX I.

In agricultural cantons prisoners of a harmless class, and those who have reached a superior class in the grade system, are employed at agricultural work. This is particularly the case where the prison has been built in the centre of a domain of the State.

Italy.

"Penal labour"—properly so-called—may be said not to exist in Italian penitentiaries. Workshops have been established in Italian penal establishments, which are carried on with every regard for economy and business, either for contract work or single orders. Clothes for the use of the prisons themselves, and articles required by the different Departments of State and the hospitals form, by preference, the chief part of the work. The following are the trades carried on in the prisons:—Weaving; boot-making; tailoring; carpentry; blacksmith work; cardboard box-making; work in straw, &c., and, in the colonies, agriculture. Italy.

Work is obligatory for all prisoners, without distinction, excepting for those who are physically incapacitated; and it is carried on for from eight to nine hours a day, with exception of the public holidays, when it is voluntary.

A wage of from 8 to 10 centimes up to 1·50 and 1·70 francs a day (1*d.* to 1*s.* 3*d.* a day) is assigned to the workers, according to the kind of work done; and of this wage, the following proportion is assigned to the worker himself:

$\frac{3}{10}$ for long-term convicts;
$\frac{4}{10}$ „ those condemned to solitary imprisonment;
$\frac{5}{10}$ „ „ „ simple „
$\frac{6}{10}$ „ „ under arrest before trial;

and the remaining fraction of the wage falls to the State.

The assignment of the work is made by the director, who takes into account the former occupation and the physical capacity of the prisoner.

The Prisons' Department takes every precaution to avoid coming into competition with free labour; and has succeeded in obtaining orders for work from the other Departments of State, besides providing everything that is required in the prisons themselves; what is produced in the prisons is prevented from falling upon the local market in any great quantity; by imparting to what is produced in prisons, as much as possible, the character of "manufactures," properly so-called, the production thus extended over a larger field makes itself less felt by the public; lastly, advantage is taken of the permission given by the penal legislation of Italy to employ labourers in the open air, especially in reclaiming and draining either private or domain lands which have been left out of cultivation.

This outside work meets with general approval, but the carrying on in prisons of the various industries, properly so-called, has, on the contrary, given rise on several occasions to complaints from the Chambers of Commerce, which—not content with attempts to modify prison labour—aim at suppressing it entirely; but as these complaints have no firm foundation, they disappear again as often as they are raised.

Only those prisoners are employed on outdoor labour of this kind who have already spent half of their term in the ordinary penitentiaries, and who are spending the second period in an "intermediary" prison, and whose conduct is good.

14. What are the provisions for exercise? Is there exercise on Sunday?

America, State of New York.

America, State of New York.

In all prisons there is no regular exercise on week days, and unless on the sick list every prisoner must work. After chapel on Sunday mornings prisoners are marched about the prison grounds for about half an hour.

Appendix I.

France.

France. It appears on collecting the official regulations affecting open-air exercise that every prisoner not engaged on open-air work must have an hour's exercise daily, from which he can only be excused for medical or punitive reasons. This exercise is either in an association yard or in separate little exercise courts, according to the disposition of the prison. As for Sunday exercise, this is generally allowed, but a good deal of discretion in the matter seems to be reserved for the director.

Germany—Prussia.

Germany—Prussia As to prisons under the Minister of the Interior.—Prisoners are taken into the prison courtyards for walking exercise every day for half an hour to one hour.

As to prisons under the Minister of Justice.—All prisoners in good health, if not busied with work in yard or garden, or other outdoor work, and are not under detention, must, where it is practicable and when weather permits, exercise themselves daily for an hour in the open air in the prison courtyard, under continuous inspection.

As regards prisoners detained for inquiry, these rules only apply to them in so far as to ensure that they do not come into contact with the other prisoners. Open-air exercise must not take place before daylight nor after twilight, nor on hot summer days between the hours of 11 and 2 o'clock.

Austria.

Austria. Prisoners have an hour a day of walking exercise; those in solitary confinement singly at six paces from one another; the others in pairs at three paces distance, and at a rate of 100 paces to the minute. In great excesses of temperature exercise is taken in the corridors or courts. For well-behaved prisoners of the highest disciplinary class, an hour both in the forenoon and the afternoon is allowed for exercise. Gymnastics have been introduced, especially of the Swedish kind, at the prisons of Stein and Graz. Sunday exercise is the same.

Hungary.

Hungary. Prisoners sentenced to hard labour (Zuchthaus) are allowed to take exercise in the open air for one hour daily, and other prisoners during two hours daily.

All prisoners under 30 years of age are drilled by the prison guard on Sundays and holidays.

Belgium.

Belgium. There are exercise yards (préaux) within the prison walls in the proportion of one for every five cells. The prisoners, in number equal to that of the exercise yards of each wing, are so grouped that each can remain for one hour at exercise. This takes place every day of the week, Sunday included, under the supervision of a warder placed in a central observatory. To get to the exercise yard the prisoners issue from their cells with their heads covered by a hood, carrying their sabots in their hands, walking rapidly in single file and without looking round at intervals of five or six paces, in the presence of warders who are stationed along the line. They return to their cells in the same manner; and the same with each other group of prisoners who are at work in their cells while waiting their turn for exercise. After the return of the last group of prisoners the warders visit the exercise yards of their respective quarters, walk round them, and close the outer passages. In prisons where association is in vogue prisoners have an hour's exercise a day. They enter the yard in single file and in silence under the supervision of warders.

Sweden.

Sweden. Every prisoner who is kept in cellular confinement must, according to the regulations, spend at least half an hour a day (including Sundays), or more should the medical officer so prescribe, in an airing yard. In the airing yards the prisoners are entirely separated the one from another by means of radiating partition walls, and carefully supervised in order to prevent attempts at communication.

Gymnastic exercises have not been introduced, inasmuch as experience has proved that where a gymnastic apparatus is erected in the airing yard, as is the case in German prisons, very little use is made of it by the prisoners. In Sweden they have, however, once a week to beat their bedding clothes in the airing yards. Appendix I.

Associated prisoners labouring in common workshops are allowed daily open air exercise in the prison yards under the supervision of a sufficient number of warders.

Norway.

Convicts in the penal institutions where there is no outdoor occupation take exercise in the open air on week days for from 30 to 60 minutes, and on holy days for a longer time, if circumstances permit. The young prisoners must learn gymnastic exercises, if possible, during part of the time spent out of doors. Norway.

For those prisoners who are ill the doctor gives the necessary directions as regards exercise being taken or no.

In the district prisons each prisoner must daily have at least half an hour's exercise out of doors.

Switzerland.

All prisoners, whether they work in cells or in workshops, are conducted every day to the exercise yard, and have an hour's bodily exercise. In most prisons they have exercise on Sundays before going to worship. Switzerland.

Italy.

Prisoners are taken for exercise in turn, in small courtyards for individuals, or in larger yards in common. Exercise is so regulated that every prisoner can take part in it for one hour a day, but it lasts longer on public holidays, and for minors, sickly prisoners, and those on arrest awaiting for trial. The prisoners who take exercise in common must walk in single file, and may not leave the file, stop or sit down, without permission from the warders in charge, and they must keep perfect silence. Those sentenced only to simple imprisonment are allowed to talk without making undue noise, and to walk in freedom, but in proper order. Italy.

15. Is a separation, complete or partial, in use? How is it carried out in the matters of labour, exercise, and attendance at chapel? Is silence enforced?

16. Is solitary confinement in use and for what lengths of time, and by whose authority in each case? What reports are made of it?

America, State of New York.

No separation is in use, either in labour, exercise, or chapel; silence at all times is rigidly enforced. America, State of New York

A prisoner may be kept in solitary confinement in a dark cell, under the authority of the warden or deputy warden, until the prisoner is reduced to submission, usually from 24 hours to a week, and in lighted cells until submission.

Monthly reports are made to the governor of the State.

France.

In the central or long sentence prisons the administration has been engaged for some years past, and within the limits of the financial provision made by Government, on the work of fitting up sufficient cells to enable prisoners to be completely isolated at night (the Auburn system). There is ground for hope that in a not distant future the number of cells thus constructed will correspond with the requirements of the France.

APPENDIX I.

system. During the day occupations of all kinds, work, exercise, &c., are carried on in association, under the safeguards indicated in connexion with the seventh question, viz., the keeping apart of certain classes of prisoners.

The law of 5th June 1875 provides :—

(1.) That prisoners awaiting trial shall for the future be kept in solitary confinement day and night.

(2.) That prisoners sentenced to a year's imprisonment or less shall be kept in solitary confinement, and shall serve their term in the departmental houses of correction.

(3.) That prisoners sentenced to more than a year's imprisonment may, at their own request, be placed in separate confinement.

Solitary confinement (emprisonnement individuel) is thus compulsory under the law for the first two categories of prisoners cited above, while it is optional for the third category, and left to the discretion of the authority administering a particular prison, who only authorises it in so far as it is held to be advisable, either in the prisoner's own interest, to save him from the danger of contamination, or on public grounds.

Article 8 of the same law provides that the new regimen is to be brought into operation pari passu with the transformation of associated into cellular prisons. This transformation has been a slow process up to the present, and there are, as a matter of fact, only 26 cellular prisons in France. The reason is that the departmental authorities, owners of the land, buildings, &c., devoted to houses of correction, and charged with the financial burden incurred in their support, recoiled before an expenditure which works of reconstruction or adaptation would have involved, an expenditure which had not, under the law of 1875, the compulsory character now imparted to it by a new law of 4th February 1893.

Every year the directors of cellular prisons submit to the Minister of the Interior, who refers the documents to the Superior Council for examination, reports on the moral, disciplinary, and sanitary effects of the solitary or separate system. These reports go to show that good results have been obtained.

GERMANY—PRUSSIA.

Germany—Prussia.

As to prisons under the Minister of the Interior.—In imprisonment other than solitary ("Gemeinsame Haft"), prisoners are not kept separate during their labour and church service. Silence is enforced.

"Zuchthaus" and "Gefängniss" imprisonment may be performed in solitary confinement, either for the whole period or for a portion of the term of their sentence, provided that the prisoner is always kept apart from the other prisoners.

Solitary confinement may not exceed three years without the consent of the prisoner (par. 22 of the criminal code).

Closed "solitary seats" ("Geschlossene Einzelsitze") in church and school are not provided in the modern cell prisons.

The younger prisoners and those who have not previously undergone frequent sentences are, in preference, kept in solitary confinement.

The governor of the prison decides which prisoners are to be kept in solitary confinement and for what length of time.

As to prisons under the Minister of Justice.—In confinement other than solitary, prisoners are not separated during work, exercise in the open air, or church service. Silence is not enforced.

Punishment by imprisonment may be carried out by solitary confinement (Einzelhaft) for the whole term, as well as for a part of the term of sentence. Where the conditions of the place allow, the imprisonment usually begins with solitary confinement.

Punishment by solitary confinement is accomplished by putting the prisoner into a special cell and keeping him there without any intercourse either by day or night with other prisoners. The separation of prisoners can also be carried out by the prevention of any communication between them during the time of open air exercise, during attendance at the chapel service and at school, and during any other occupation taking place outside the cell.

Decision as to whether solitary confinement is to be employed rests with the director of the prison.

In the case of prisoners who have the right of expressing a wish to work out their sentence in solitary confinement, and who do express it, this wish, if feasible, is to be carried out. Solitary confinement may in no case endure longer than three years, without the consent of the prisoner. The consent is to be registered in a minute book, which is kept as a record. APPENDIX I.

Solitary confinement is forbidden if it is feared that it may be dangerous to the prisoner either bodily or mentally.

The superintendent of the prison must let the doctor know when the solitary confinement is to last longer than three months, and hear from him whether he has any scruples regarding the advisability of enforcing it.

Every prisoner in solitary confinement must be visited several times daily.

Among the visits are counted in those of the officers of the institution, of the members of the committee of inspection, of the overseer and foreman, of the relations and acquaintances of the prisoner, as well as those of other persons who receive admission to the prisoner.

AUSTRIA.

Ordinarily there is no separation, excepting for prisoners condemned to solitary imprisonment and for the juvenile prisoners, who are kept most carefully apart from the adults at all times. There are distinct places at chapel, only the "solitary" prisoners being kept at a distance from one another and others. Silence is not enforced excepting when talking interferes with work, and for the "solitary" prisoners, and after certain hours at night. Juvenile prisoners are encouraged to talk and amuse themselves under the observation of warders. Austria.

There are special arrangements for carrying out solitary imprisonment which is a common punishment under the Criminal Code, and a still more common disciplinary penalty in the prisons themselves. No prisoner may be kept more than three years in solitary confinement, and only prisoners who appear healthy enough in mind and body may undergo this kind of punishment. When the period of punishment is short, and the prisoner has already spent three months in solitary confinement, every two further days counts for three to end his term. Reports are made to the Procurator-General in the usual way.

HUNGARY.

Prisoners sentenced to confinement, with or without hard labour, for a longer period than one year, and prisoners sentenced to confinement in a gaol (Gefängniss) for three years or more, are kept day and night in solitary confinement during the first year of their imprisonment. Hungary.

If sentenced for a shorter period of time, the solitary confinement lasts during the first third part of the period for which the prisoner has been sentenced.

There is no separation of the prisoners during the hours of instruction, during divine service, and the time of relaxation in the open air.

The gaol (Gefängniss) prisoners who have not been tried are separated from the convicts already sentenced, the males from the females, accomplices from each other, and, if there is sufficient room, the prisoners who have not been tried are all kept in solitary seclusion. This separation is, as far as feasible, also observed during the night as well as during the hours of work and exercise.

Silence is enforced during the hours of instruction and at night. During hours of work conversation is allowed so far as is necessitated by the requirements of the work on which the prisoners are engaged.

BELGIUM.

The system is one of complete separation day and night, so that the prisoners as a general rule do not see each other and in no case can they establish communications with each other, but the members of the administrative and discipline staff as well as of the comités de patronage visit them frequently. Belgium.

(a.) Work must always be executed by a man alone without the continual or frequent companionship of another person; foremen and special warders direct the work and are charged with the selection of it for prisoners. As to the domestic service of the prison it is provided for by the warders, the cook, the baker, the stoker, and the laundryman, with whom are associated one or more prisoners who are not allowed under any pretext to hold any communication with one another, so that the discharge of this duty, as of that of cleaning, &c., entrusted to prisoners, takes place without infringing the principle of individual separation.

(b.) The prisoners exercise in separate exercise-yards. Vide the reply to Question 14.

(c.) The chapel is arranged so that the prisoners of both sexes have ready access to it from their respective quarters, and so that each prisoner can attend the services, seeing and hearing the officiating priest and being seen by him without violating the essential principle of the system. The chapel is divided into stalls so arranged that each prisoner can walk straight into or out of his seat without disturbing his fellow prisoners, and without being able to withdraw himself from the warder's eye.

Silence is obligatory.

Solitary confinement as a punishment may be inflicted by the director after hearing what the prisoner has to say, with the following restrictions: when the offence is of a nature to entail a severe punishment and seclusion in a special cell or a dark cell for more than three or four days* a report is made to the administrative commission, and in case of urgency to the president, who prescribes the method and duration of the punishment, provided, however, that the cellular confinement does not in ordinary cases exceed one month, and two months in the case of a recidivist.

This punishment, with a statement of the reasons for it, is entered in the punishment book and in the record which is kept of each prisoner's conduct.

SWEDEN.

Sweden.

It has already been stated that a prisoner sentenced to penal servitude for two years or a shorter term has to be confined to a cell during the whole duration of the punishment. With regard to prisoners under longer sentences the maximum period of cellular confinement at the beginning of the punishment was, before the 1st of January 1893, one year, and the minimum time six months, inasmuch as it was prescribed by the Royal Ordinance of the 30th of May 1873 that whosoever is sentenced to penal servitude for a certain time exceeding two years shall, at the beginning of the punishment, be kept in cellular confinement during a sixth of the duration of the punishment, but not less than six nor more than twelve months. During the rest of their time of punishment prisoners of this latter kind were allowed to work together in common workshops separated only at night and during unemployed hours in sleeping cells. The aforesaid Ordinance has, however, lately been annulled by the law of the 29th of July 1892, which has been in force since the beginning of 1893. By this law the maximum time of complete cellular separation has been fixed at three years.

The wording of the first clauses of this law is as follows:—

1. "Whosoever is sentenced to penal servitude for four years or shorter time shall, if possible, be kept in cellular confinement during the time of punishment. A prisoner, thus kept in cellular confinement, shall have a deduction of one-fourth made from the time of punishment. . . . . .

2. "Whosoever is sentenced to penal servitude for a certain time exceeding four years shall, if possible, be kept in cellular confinement during three years from the beginning of the time of punishment.

"For the time during which such a prisoner is confined to a cell there shall be a deduction from the remaining time of punishment of one-third of the time of cellular confinement. . . . . .

3. "Whosoever is sentenced to penal servitude for life shall, if possible, be kept in cellular confinement during three years."

* * * * * *

As a result of this law the number of prisoners placed in association has been limited to a rather small minority as it is only those under longer sentences than four years who hereafter are to be removed to the association establishments. These prisoners, moreover, are comparatively few, because the long terms have been considerably modified in consequence of the law of the 20th of June 1890, above referred to.

The leading idea of the reforms thus brought about has been to shorten the long terms of punishment as far as practical, but at the same time to increase the efficiency of the penalties inflicted by making them more deterrent and also more reformatory.

* According as a secondary or a central prison is in question.

The separation is as completely applied as it possibly can be. Prisoners sentenced to penal servitude who are sound in mind and body are not, under any pretext whatever, allowed to perform any labour outside their cells during their time of solitary confinement. They are entirely separated during open air exercise. The schoolrooms are fitted up with a sufficient number of cell-boxes and even during divine service the isolation of the prisoners is maintained. The chaplain delivers his sermon from the central hall while the prisoners remain in their cells the doors of which are opened ajar and fastened from outside by means of hasps and staples. The prisoners are not allowed to sing during the service, but they can follow the precentor in their hymn books. Every prison has an organ. The chapel of the Lânghalmen central prison has this year been furnished with cell-boxes. It has now sitting accommodation for 186 prisoners under cellular confinement.

The "silent system" has not been adopted in the associate establishments, as being practically unrealisable. Where the association system is unavoidable, the evil influences of indiscriminate talking are, however, counteracted to a certain extent through isolation at night by means of sleeping cells. There are at present only two establishments upon the association plan with common dormitories, but these are to be rebuilt and furnished with sleeping cells as soon as possible.

Concerning cellular confinement, with or without occupation, as a disciplinary punishment imposed upon association prisoners, vide answer to Question 10. Such punishment has proved both efficient and necessary.

Norway.

In the common prisons the inmates under sentence labour in association, but are forbidden to speak to each other except when the work necessitates it.

In the hours of rest in the workshops and during the time they are taking exercise prisoners are not allowed to speak to one another unless the governor has given a special permission.

In the common dormitories (in institutions for males) they are, however, allowed to converse. In these dormitories they are at nights each locked up in a separate compartment or "box." In the prisons for females the women pass the night in cells.

During divine service and in the schools the inmates of the common prisons are in association.

For further particulars compare preceding reply to query No. 7.

In connexion with the foregoing it must be observed that convicts imprisoned in the penitentiary cannot, without their own consent, be kept in solitary confinement for a longer period than three years.

In the common prisons, at the commencement and close of their term of sentence, the prisoners pass a short time (how long it rests with the governor to decide) in solitary confinement. Prisoners by their own wish, or from motives of security, may also be placed in the cells, according to the decision of the governor. A report on prisoners that have occupied the cells shall be forwarded annually to the Department of Justice.

For those prisoners sentenced to simple imprisonment the maximum terms, according to the penal code, are:—

In cases of arrest	240 days.
In cases of imprisonment on gaol allowance	120 days.
In cases of imprisonment on bread and water	30 days.

With respect to the prisoners being placed in the cells for breach of discipline vide reply to the tenth question, and reference may also be made generally to the reply to the seventh question.

Switzerland.

In modern prisons all prisoners undergo cellular confinement day and night during the initial stage of their sentence, and even longer if they are dangerous. During the day they work in their cells. Once admitted to the class above they can enter workshops where the law of silence is observed. All return to their cells for meals, and separation is also observed in exercise and in chapel.

The duration of cellular confinement is fixed by the regulations, but it varies with different individuals. The decision as to the promotion of a prisoner from the penal stage to the stage above rests with the director and his superior officers. This promotion generally takes place after some months of cellular confinement, when there is some assurance that the prisoner can, without danger, be put to associated labour. The register in which an account of a prisoner's behaviour is kept gives the reason for his promotion, and this register is at the disposition of the watch committee.

ITALY.

Italy.

Italian penal establishments are distinguished from one another by the kind of punishment to be expiated in them, and one prison seldom serves for several kinds of punishment.

During the first period of their term, those condemned to convict labour for a long term and to solitary confinement are kept continuously apart in separate cells; this separation is absolute and complete as well for work as for exercise and in attendance at chapel. During the second period they work together, but silence is enforced.

Those undergoing simple imprisonment and those under arrest work together, and may talk, but are separated during the night.

According to the Italian Penal Code solitary confinement is considered as an increased punishment, may last seven years for convicts on long terms, and is limited to one-sixth of their total term for those condemned to simple imprisonment, but may not surpass six years or be less than six months.

In consequence penalties of a less duration than three years are relatively severer than those for longer terms.

As a disciplinary punishment (see also Answer No. 10) solitary confinement may be inflicted up to six months.

Statistics and reports as to solitary confinement are not yet of much value, as the new regulations only came into force in 1890.

It might, however, be observed that solitary confinement is more likely to have a prejudicial effect on those prisoners who come from the south, as their characters are usually more lively and impressionable than is the case with those from northern countries. Cases of madness and of death from consumption have been more frequently noted among prisoners in solitary confinement, when enforced idleness is often caused by the difficulty of obtaining sufficient work for single individuals in places that are often far removed from industrial centres.

17. The scale of dietary, by whom framed, and who has power to alter it?

AMERICA, STATE OF NEW YORK.

America, State of New York.

The warden of the prison frames and has the power to alter the scale.

FRANCE.

France.

The dietary is fixed by the Minister of the Interior, who alone has power to alter it. It is set out in certain charge books (combining both general regulations and specifications in detail of what these regulations actually require) which have been drawn up in view of the possible handing over to a contractor of the domestic services (including labour) of any particular prison.

The dietary is of course the same whether in the hands of the State itself or of a contractor.

GERMANY—PRUSSIA.

Germany—Prussia.

As to prisons under the Minister of the Interior.—The regulations respecting dietary are issued by the Minister, and can only be altered by him.

As to prisons under the Minister of Justice.—The Minister issues instructions as to dietary of the prisoners. These instructions can only be altered by him.

AUSTRIA.

Austria.

The governor and the doctor decide on the scale of dietary, and the doctor must go through the kitchen once a week to inspect, and attend some meal every day. Every prisoner receives fresh water three times a day. The dietary of the Graz prison may be taken as an average specimen :—

$1\frac{1}{4}$ lbs. to 2 lbs of bread (rye) daily.
A basin of a special Austrian soup at 6 a.m.
At 1 p.m. a vegetable soup and a second dish consisting of a kind of macaroni with garlic sauce ($1\frac{1}{8}$ lb. weight), or potatoes and other similar edibles.
On Sundays and Church holidays, meat soup, boiled beef (140 grammes), and vegetables are served.
And on Thursdays, meat soup with macaroni, boiled beef, and vegetables.

HUNGARY.

Hungary.

Prisoners confined in prison with or without hard labour are allowed soup, vegetables, bread; three times a week meat, and twice a week plain farinaceous puddings; four days a week they are given four meals a day, three days a week three meals.

In gaols (Gefängniss) prisoners are allowed bread in the morning, at noon soup and vegetables, and twice a week meat.

The scale of dietary is framed by the Minister of Justice in accordance with the report of the medical council, and it is the Minister of Justice who has the power of altering it.

The chief Public Prosecutor (Ober-Staatsanwalt) has, however, the power to increase the rations of food in exceptional cases if required by the medical officer.

BELGIUM.

Belgium.

The scale of dietary is framed and may be altered by the King and by the Minister of Justice.

SWEDEN.

Sweden.

The dietaries adopted in Swedish penal establishments are framed by the Royal Prisons Board in co-operation with the medical adviser attached to the Board, but they have to be submitted to the sanction of the King. The dietaries are based upon scientific principles. The present medical adviser of the Royal Prisons Board is Professor of Physiology at the Royal Medical School at Stockholm. Before the proposed dietaries are approved they are also examined by the directors of the Royal Medical Department.

NORWAY.

Norway.

At the penal institutions the convicts receive the food necessary for their nourishment according to a regulation concerning their diet issued by the Department of Justice Any changes in this dietary are also to be determined by the Department of Justice.

On the representation of the prison doctor, in cases of illness, such changes may be made in the regulation diet as he may deem necessary for the patient.

In the district prisons prisoners undergoing imprisonment on bread and water have a daily allowance of 7·50 grains soft bread, or half the quantity hard bread, a sufficiency of fresh water, and the necessary salt.

A prisoner under sentence of imprisonment or ordinary gaol allowance is given wholesome and sufficient food according to a dietary fixed by the sheriff with special regard to ordinary fare in that part of the country. In case of illness the doctor may prescribe such alterations in the prison dietary as he finds strictly necessary. The prisoners under arrest, if not content with ordinary gaol allowance may find themselves in food, but it must not exceed the limits of moderation.

SWITZERLAND.

Switzerland.

The dietary of prisoners varies much with different cantons and the importance that is attached to penitentiary education. Where moral reformation is not held to be the chief end of imprisonment, the diet affords little change and is insufficient to make up for the loss sustained by the bodily organs in performing penal labour. Meat figures rarely in the bill of fare (in some prisons the prisoners only get it twice a year), so that one finds prisoners who have been long subjected to such a diet attacked with anæmia in a more or less degree. But on rising to class of better organised penitentiaries, the dietary improves and azotic substances enter in a large proportion. The number of meals is three.

Breakfast in most prisons consists of a soup of wheatmeal or oatmeal, and the ordinary allowance is from $\frac{3}{4}$ to 1 litre. In French Switzerland prisoners receive from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ of a litre of café au lait. At Lenzbourg (Argau) breakfast is composed on alternate days of soup and café au lait.

Dinner consists, once or oftener a week, of soup (from $\frac{3}{4}$ to 1 litre) prepared with bread, vegetables, roots or leaves (foliacés) according to the season, and meat. In preparing this thick soup there is allowed from 250 to 500 grammes of butcher's meat per man per week. In some prisons (Lenzbourg and Zurich) the allowance of meat is divided among several of the week's dinners. It is cut into small pieces and is served with and in the soup; in some cases it is given as a separate ration. At Lausanne the $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of meat is supplemented by $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. of raw lard. At Geneva 250 grammes of boiled beef are given on Sundays, and on Thursdays the same quantity of chopped up pork, with potatoes. This thick soup is served out in certain prisons on Thursdays and Sundays, in others on Tuesdays and Fridays, so that these two more substantial and nutritive meals fall in the middle of the working days.

The thin soup is prepared with bread, the seeds of leguminous plants and vegetables in season, among which potatoes play too often a preponderating rôle.

Supper consists of soup prepared with rice, oatmeal, or barley meal, wheatmeal, maize, with or without the addition of potatoes or macaroni.

The quantity of bread allowed to each prisoner varies from 750 to 800 grammes a day. Cold water is the usual drink.

As a general rule prisoners in good health receive no wine. In some establishments prisoners who have reached the superior penitentiary stage are authorised to have served to them, at their own charges, milk or a supplementary and exceptional ration of solid food.

Prisoners engaged on laborious tasks receive a supplementary ration of milk (at (Zurich and Neuchâtel), and in very exceptional cases of wine (at Lenzbourg).

The choice and combination of the articles of food which make up the bill of fare for the three daily meals are rarely so regulated that the prisoner's diet is as varied as possible, and that the food taken in the 24 hours contain azotic and non-azotic nutritive elements in their proper proportion. A badly nourished man is little disposed to undergo the reformatory influence of the best penitentiary education.

Italy.

Italy.

Prisoners in "tribunal" prisons receive daily a ration of 2nd quality white bread, weighing 600 grammes, a $\frac{1}{4}$ litre of wine, and a soup to be selected by the director from among the various kinds enumerated in a table which forms part of the general prison regulations, and may not be altered arbitrarily.

Prisoners in penitentiaries receive a ration of bread of ordinary quality (the flour having been mixed with 15 per cent. of bran), a $\frac{1}{4}$ litre of wine, and a similar soup to the above-mentioned.

Two relaxations are allowed—(1) on public holidays the prisoners receive a portion of baked macaroni or of stewed meat in place of the flesh broth, or bread or vegetable soup, served out on ordinary days; (2) the prisoners can purchase extra rations or dainties, e.g., coffee, out of their earnings. Tobacco may be thus purchased in "tribunal" but not in convict prisons.

Unconvicted prisoners are allowed to receive food from outside at their own or their friends' expense. A similar privilege is in certain circumstances accorded to those undergoing a sentence of less than six months.

18. The provisions for instruction and for religious service?

America, State of New York.

America, State of New York.

In State prisons the chaplain must visit the convicts in their cells, and give them moral and religious instruction at least one hour in each week-day, and devote the afternoon of each Sunday to such instruction; furnish a bible to a convict if requested by him; visit daily the sick in the hospital, and each cell in the prison weekly; make a quarterly report to the warden of the number of convicts that have been instructed, the progress they have made, and the branches in which they have received instruction. Chapel service every Sunday forenoon.

In penitentiaries, evening schools are held for all who wish to attend, provided their conduct is good.

Religious services are held only on Sunday, and the chaplain visits the prisoners in hospital, and those who are ill in their cells.

France.

As to juveniles.—(1.) Juveniles have to attend on Sundays and saints' days the services of the religion to which they belong, and they receive from the chaplain religious instruction at least once a week in addition to their Sunday lesson.

A priest at the head of an establishment of correctional education, and thus the officer who decrees punishment, has to delegate to another the rite of confession.

So far as possible, a special chaplain is attached to every institution containing over 100 children; where the number is less, religious education is entrusted to the curé of the parish or his locum tenens.

(2.) For primary education, every juvenile has to attend school for an hour daily. At harvest time, however, those who are engaged on pressing work in the fields need only attend school on Sundays.

The instruction comprises reading, writing, the first four rules of arithmetic, and weights and measures; to which may be added mental arithmetic, mensuration, free-hand drawing, and the elements of French history and geography.

The schoolmasters have to keep careful note of their pupils' progress, and show their registers to the inspectors-general. The duties of schoolmaster are held to be compatible with that of every office in an institution, save that of simple warder.

The heads of establishments have to keep the Minister of the Interior informed of the method of instruction they propose to introduce.

(3.) For technical education, juveniles (boys; and girls from agricultural districts) are trained chiefly in agriculture and kindred industries, e.g., that of wheelwright.

The maximum time for manual labour is 10 hours a day, and work is forbidden on Sundays and fête days. Elementary courses of agriculture and horticulture are given where there are practical facilities for such work; and, speaking generally, the aim is to take a child through the whole range of agricultural work, so as to discharge him completely equipped for the profession.

The directors of colonies may be authorised by the Minister to provide sedentary occupation for children less fitted for agricultural than industrial work. Only occupations which constitute an apprenticeship to an actual trade are admitted, and such require first the approval of the préfet and the Minister.

Directors of colonies, with the sanction of the Minister of the Interior, may let well conducted children out on hire to do agricultural work for private individuals, but only in restricted numbers. They can only do so in the case of industrial work when there are good public or really urgent grounds, and the préfet's approval has been obtained.

Juveniles out on hire are under a special guardian and on discharge are presented with half their earnings.

Establishments where industrial labour is authorised may only make articles for the use of the institution itself.

(General Regulations of 10th April, 1869.)

As to short sentence prisons.—An organised system of primary instruction is obligatory in the chief short sentence prisons (maisons de concentration) and is permissive in the rest. The duty is intrusted either to a special schoolmaster, or to the chief warder or other person selected. All illiterate prisoners under 40 years of age, able only to read or but imperfectly to write, are compelled to receive instruction for an hour a day at least.

Addresses may be delivered to the prisoners, for their instruction or edification, by specially selected officials or by laymen. The names of the latter require the approval of the Minister of the Interior on the proposition of the préfet, the subject of their address having been previously communicated to the director of the penitentiary district in which a particular prison is situated, and submitted to the préfet.

Prisoners are to be read to in a loud voice on Sundays and saints' days and during the evenings if no work is carried on.

APPENDIX I.

There must be in every prison a library composed of books borne on the official catalogue. In establishments where work is regularly carried on prisoners are allowed books once a week at least. Prisoners not engaged on work, notably those awaiting trial, may have a book whenever they ask for it.

Religious services in the various classes of short sentence prisons are undertaken by ministers of the various faiths recognised by the State and which the prisoners may profess. These chaplains are nominated by the competent authority of the religious body in question, but the appointment requires the confirmation of the Minister of the Interior on the proposition of the préfet. The chaplains receive pay.

The services are the usual ones of the particular sect and are held at the hours fixed by order of the préfet.

The priest or minister has besides to visit all prisoners, whether sick or not, who may ask for him. In no case can he be a member of the watch committee of the prison.

No prisoner is obliged to attend religious worship if he declares that he objects.

Ministrants to assist in the service may be selected by the director or chief warder from among the prisoners, with the consent of the latter, and on the proposition of the officiating chaplain.

(Decree of 11th November 1885, articles 87 to 93.)

As to long sentence prisons.—The arrangements for religious services are to all intents and purposes the same as those described above in connexion with short sentence prisons.

Instruction is not given to prisoners indiscriminately; it is obligatory for the younger prisoners, but in the case of the older criminals it is allowed as a reward for good conduct and industry. The primary instruction given comprises reading, writing, elementary grammar and arithmetic, and weights and measures. This may be extended to meet the requirements of adults on the authority of the Minister of the Interior. In order, however, that education may be moral as well as secular in its character, the chaplain is expected to co-operate with the schoolmaster. The period of instruction should be as a general rule two hours, but may be fixed by the director acting on the advice of the chaplain and schoolmaster, and subject to the approval of the préfet and the Minister of the Interior. The reading of good books, either to prisoners in association or by prisoners in separation, is encouraged.

The schoolmaster, who must have a satisfactory diploma, forms part of the regular staff of a prison. He ranks next to the accountant, with whom he competes for promotion. His spare time should be devoted to clerical or other duties connected with the prison.

The instruction of female prisoners is entrusted exclusively to schoolmistresses.

Quarterly and annual reports showing the progress should be sent to the Minister of the Interior.

(Order of 25th December 1819, M. de Gasparin's Report of 1st February 1837, Circular of 24th April 1840.)

GERMANY—PRUSSIA.

Germany—Prussia.

As to prisons under the Minister of the Interior.—In the larger and middle-sized prisons a service is held every Sunday and Saints' day, and once during the week, for Christian prisoners according to the rites of their faith. Opportunity is given during every quarter to receive the Holy Communion.

For Jews a service is held on the Sabbath and on the more important Jewish feast days.

The prisoners are obliged to attend the church services.

Prisoners under 30 years of age take part as a rule in school instruction, if their sentence is of more than three months' duration.

As to prisons under the Minister of Justice.—No prisoner may be denied religious consolation. Care must be taken for the appointment of a pastor and the conduct of regular services in all prisons which contain on an average at least 10 prisoners holding the same Christian creed.

As a rule public service is held every four weeks in prisons whose inmates number under 50 of the same creed, in prisons containing more than 50, every fortnight, and in those prisons having chaplains attached to them, every week.

Prisoners detained for trial may only go to public service by the express sanction of the judge. Prisoners undergoing punishment must attend the regular service, unless they are ill, or are excused on special grounds by the overseer.

Political prisoners are free not to attend public worship.

Opportunity is granted to prisoners to attend Holy Communion; no prisoner must be forced to do so.

Special devotional exercises can be held in certain appointed places for Jewish prisoners and on Jewish holy days.

In establishments for young prisoners, they all without exception receive religious teaching and instruction in those subjects which are taught in the national schools.

The Minister of Justice must arrange for each prison whether, besides giving religious instruction, a school should be organised in certain prisons for the reception of grown-up prisoners.

All prisoners in custody in these prisons are bound to receive their share of instruction, who still need religious or secular teaching, and who have not passed their 30th year. Older prisoners may, if they wish, also participate in attending the school.

AUSTRIA.

Austria. In order to improve the general moral standard of the prisoners, and to help them to gain a livelihood on discharge, school-teaching is compulsory for all Austrian prisoners up to their 35th year (in the case of females up to 30 years of age). Every prisoner must be examined orally as to his state of education 24 hours after reaching the prison, and a report is made by the teacher and by the chaplain to the governor. Some prisoners are taught literary subjects, even up to their 50th year. Education includes the ordinary subjects of a primary school, and drawing, music in certain cases, and agriculture; and teachers are obliged to attach more importance to the strictly practical views of education than on its more general tendencies. The general course of teaching is carried out as much as possible in ascending grades, according to the three disciplinary classes, which usually correspond with the amount of time the pupil has passed in the prison. There are usually two school hours a day for each different class, and in some hopeful cases pupils are excused hard labour in order to attend more hours at school. Lectures are held on subjects of practical interest and utility every Sunday and Church holiday. Examinations are held by strangers every six months, and money prizes awarded to the most industrious pupils. Warders are present to keep order during school hours, as well as the teacher.

A religious service is held twice on Sundays, forenoon and afternoon, and morning prayers are read in chapel every week day as well, at all of which every prisoner must attend, unless specially excused for sickness, &c. Religious teaching forms as much a part of the ordinary schooling as in a primary school. Different chaplains attend for the numerous different sects in Austria, but, as Catholics are in a vast majority, prisoners of other beliefs are usually placed in one or two prisons specially adapted for this purpose.

HUNGARY.

Hungary. Instruction is obligatory for all prisoners sentenced to confinement, with or without hard labour, under 30 years of age, except in the case of educated prisoners, and of those who are mentally incapable.

Prisoners above the age of 30 years may on their own wish or on the order of the director also take part in the instruction.

Instruction is given during five to eight hours weekly in two classes.

Moral and religious instruction is given to the prisoners by the chaplains of their respective confessions during one hour weekly, and besides this sermons are delivered on Sundays and holidays.

BELGIUM.

Belgium. Schools are attached to the central prisons and to the more important secondary prisons. By the regulations all prisoners, unless excused by the director on cause shown, must as a general rule attend these schools, where the masters give them primary instruction; moreover the prisoners are read to in a loud voice, the readings being accompanied by familiar explanations and practical observations.

There are chaplains in all prisons for all recognised forms of belief, and every facility is given to prisoners to enable them to discharge their religious duties.

Sweden.

Appendix I. Sweden.

It is the duty of a prison chaplain (according to the rules of the 3rd of June 1846), "to fill with fervour and zeal, in a truly Christian spirit, his holy vocation, to lead to "repentance those who have fallen, to awaken in them an earnest desire to live a "better life and to inspire them with the hope of salvation and with faith in the "covenants of grace." In addition to such pastoral functions as belong to the office of every minister of the Gospel, viz., the preaching of the word of God and the administering of the holy sacraments, it is an important duty incumbent upon the chaplain to exercise his influence by visits to the prisoners in their cells. The chaplain has therefore (according to the rules) "to visit every prisoner immediately after his "arrival at the prison, or as soon as he possibly can do so, in order to inquire into the "state of mind of the prisoner, his knowledge of Christianity, and former conditions of "life." The chaplain has also to keep a special church register and a journal showing the daily number of visits to prisoners under cellular confinement and his discharge of other pastoral duties. Divine service has to be held in every prison on Sundays and feast days at such hours as are usual in churches.

School instruction is given in all the central prisons by resident schoolmasters; by female teachers in penal establishments for women. Prisoners under 35 years of age are as a rule obliged to attend school. At the chief central prisons the schoolmasters have also to insert biographical notices concerning every prisoner in a special book for this purpose.

Norway.

Norway.

At the penal institutions divine service is held for the prisoners every Sunday and holy day, and there is reading from the Bible, or a religious lecture, once a week on some other day.

Divine service must be attended by all the prisoners, but it is left to the discretion of the governor, after consulting with the chaplain, to allow a prisoner exemption from this rule for a shorter or longer period.

The prisoners receive religious instruction, are taught their mother tongue, writing, arithmetic, and some branches of natural science, as also history, geography, and singing. In the ordinary instruction every prisoner must, as a rule, take part. At the common prisons, however, only those that have not completed their 35th year are compelled to attend school. But the latter may be permitted to attend by the governor should they so wish.

In the district prisons, with the exception of the large district prison at Christiana, divine service is as a rule not held, though the prisoners are visited by the chaplain. Instruction is generally imparted to the prisoners under 15 years of age as also to other convicts who are sentenced to long tems of imprisonment if, in consequence of a neglected education, or from other causes, instruction be desired; and it is imparted by a teacher specially appointed for this purpose, and, as a rule, to each prisoner separately.

Switzerland.

Switzerland.

Organised schools are to be found in the penitentiaries of S. Jaques (S. Gall), Lenzbourg (Argau), and Neuchâtel. In several other establishments lessons are given by the chaplain. There are even cases where the duty is entrusted to a prisoner if he is a schoolmaster by profession, or if he shows aptitude and possesses the necessary knowledge for the work. In Zurich prison, the school which has for some time been closed, will be re-opened shortly. Instruction is almost or entirely neglected in the prisons of some cantons, whose system is antiquated, and in several houses of correction where association by day and night still obtains.

In establishments where there are schools all the prisoners, save those excused on account of age (about 45 to 50 years), and those undergoing cellular confinement, attend class, where they receive from four to six hours' instruction a week. Prisoners in the cellular stage are visited by the schoolmaster in their cells, and there commence their course of instruction.

In well organised penitentiaries, the amount of a prisoner's education is ascertained on his entry. The result of this examination shows the necessity of maintaining three classes, corresponding with the three standards of primary education. In the first class the instruction is elementary, and the prisoner is led on by easy stages in the second class to the branches of technical education, which are dealt with in the third.

In the programme of the best organised penitentiaries there even figure mathematics, physics, and the technical arts, so far as these sciences find their application in crafts and manufactures; then come modern languages, French in German prisons, and German in Roumansch-speaking Switzerland (Neuchâtel). Sometimes prisoners are allowed to learn English, and often drawing.

Progress differs much with different individuals. Some distinguish themselves by their zeal and power of assimilation, while others advance but slowly. The organ of thought has lost its force by disuse. The sense of memory is often defective, and the result is a want of energy which renders a man indifferent. Nevertheless, progress is very satisfactory, as a general rule, and particularly so in the case of the young, for whom this supplementary and tardy education has a new importance on their discharge.

Ministers of the Reformed and Roman Catholic faiths act as chaplains in all prisons. In well organised establishments, where the number of prisoners of both faiths is sufficiently large, two ministers are charged with the religious duties belonging to their respective faiths. The rabbi residing nearest to a prison is invited to visit the few of his co-religionists who may be confined there. In establishments whose organisation is defective the chaplains confine themselves, as a rule, to the celebration of the religious service. In proportion as the category of prisons is reached, whose aim is moral reformation, these officers will be found to visit the prisoners regularly, to console and advise them, to direct the religious instruction of young offenders, and generally to fulfil in regard to them all the duties of their calling.

In some prisons the distribution of books from the library falls on the chaplain.

Italy.

Italy.

Education in non-religious subjects is compulsory for prisoners under the age of 25 years, and for every inmate of houses of correction and reformatories. The instructor is either a schoolmaster or the chaplain.

Prisoners who behave well may be admitted to the prison school, even after attaining the age of 25.

Persons awaiting trial, under the age of 21, are admitted to the school, with the consent of the proper judicial authority.

As a rule, in the prison schools, the ordinary elementary course of the public schools of Italy is followed, and lectures are given by the chaplain and schoolmaster.

Minors, in the houses of correction and reformatories, are taught also drawing, music, and gymnastics.

Religious service is performed in every penitentiary by a chaplain, who celebrates mass every saints' day; gives instruction in the catechism and morality; and lectures on moral and educational subjects, as well as visiting the sick and those undergoing disciplinary punishment, and those who are about to quit the prison. The chaplain also controls the assignment of good and bad marks as far as regards the moral character of the prisoners.

19. Is the reformation of prisoners attempted by marks, by remission or gradations of punishment within the prison, by gratuities, or how otherwise?

America, State of New York.

America, State of New York.

There is an elaborate system of marks and gradations in use in the State Reformatory at Elmira.*

France.

France.

With a view to reform prisoners and to encourage them to work and behave well the prison administration has at its command the following means:—

(1.) Pardon, or the remission of a portion of a prisoner's sentence. This is granted by the President of the Republic, on the proposition of the Minister of Justice, the prisoners having been singled out by the Minister of the Interior as deserving some degree of mercy.

* See account of Elmira on page 526.

APPENDIX I.

(2.) Conditional discharge (law of 14th August 1885).

(3.) The employment of a prisoner as overseer or clerk in the manufacturing or other department of a prison, whether carried on by contract or not. As in the case of offences, any distinction gained by a prisoner is entered in the register showing his character, which serves to guide the Minister of the Interior in any action he may take under the first head.

(4.) An increase, by way of reward, in the portion of his earnings which a prisoner may claim, an increase which enables him to purchase supplementary rations.

(5.) The granting of extra privileges or money to prisoners who have already reached the maximum sum they may claim of the value of their earnings.

GERMANY—PRUSSIA.

Germany—Prussia.

As to prisons under the Minister of the Interior.—No such system as the mark system exists.

As to prisons under the Minister of Justice.—The system of marks for indicating the gradations of reformation does not exist.

AUSTRIA.

Austria.

Marks have not been adopted in Austria to help in classifying prisoners and their conduct, but the system of three disciplinary classes, as previously described, with rapid or slow promotion from one to the other, is in use. Besides, the system of money reward or pay, described in the replies to questions 12 and 13, with liberty to use half of this money for daily comforts in food or otherwise, and the other half to be a small capital sum on discharge, is thought a sufficient inducement to industry. The decision on these points is taken by the governor as a result of examination of the prisoner's work.

HUNGARY.

Hungary.

Prisoners who have furnished decided proofs of good conduct and moral improvement may be distinguished by marks to be attached to their clothes.

Prisoners of good conduct may also spend a certain part of the remuneration due to them for the work they have performed during the time they are in prison.

BELGIUM.

Belgium.

The marks system does not obtain in Belgium. The administrative commissions are authorised to submit to the Minister of Justice the proposals for conditional liberation, for pardon, or for reduction of punishment, in favour of prisoners who distinguish themselves by their good conduct, or who, in consequence of peculiar circumstances, seem such as should be recommended to the royal mercy or liberated conditionally. Prisoners receive a portion of the money earned by their work, but this portion cannot be increased by good conduct on their part, or with a view to improve their morale. The other means employed to stimulate zeal and effect a reformation are the following:—Admission to certain confidential duties, the domestic service of the prison, and various exceptional kinds of work, extensions of the privileges of visits and correspondence, permission to use tobacco, either as snuff or to smoke, provided that in the latter case smoking is limited to the period of outdoor exercise, the granting of certain means of relaxation and recreation, e.g., gifts of books, tools, and various objects.

SWEDEN.

Sweden.

From what has been stated above with reference to separation (vide reply to question 15), it will be easily understood that in the penal system now adopted in Sweden there is no room for "marks" or other forms of the progressive system. During a previous period, or before the extension of the separate system, a certain progressive classification of the prisoners in association with regard to their behaviour was introduced, but this classification has now been given up as not equal to its purpose. Neither has the Swedish prisoner the opportunity of earning the remission of any portion of the original sentence on account of good behaviour and industry.

The Director-General of Prisons and Parliament have, however, directed the attention of the Government to the question of conditional liberation, and the Government has recently asked for the opinion of the Royal Prisons Board upon this subject.

In this connexion attention may be drawn to a penal reform of great importance which was effected by the new regulations concerning the earnings of prisoners in the central penal establishments (given the 24th of October 1890). The first clauses of these regulations are as follows:—

§1. "A prisoner who in any of the central penal establishments is passing his term of penal servitude has no right to any share of the profits arising from the labour he is performing, but as an encouragement and as a reward for industry and well-done work a gratuity may be given to him.

§2. "The gratuities are paid in proportion to industry and skill, according to a scale fixed by the Prisons Board, with the proviso that no prisoner shall receive more than 30 öre (=about 4*d.*) per working day, unless he be a foreman or have exhibited special zeal and skill, in which case he may receive at most 40 öre (=about $5\frac{1}{2}d.$) per working day."

The prisoners are allowed to spend at most one-half of their gratuities to buy certain quantities of bread, milk, margarine, cheese, &c. (but no tobacco in any form), as an augmentation of the prison diet, and for other expenses allowed by the rules of the prison, e.g., postage, the support of near relatives outside the prison, &c. The other half, on the contrary, the prisoners may not dispose of, but it is paid in on their account into the Post Savings Bank, together with such part of the disposable half as has not been spent for the purposes mentioned above. The savings of the prisoner are, however, not wholly at his command, even after his release. Even then he is not allowed to take out from the bank more than a certain sum per month, depending upon the amount of his earnings, viz., 10 crowns (= 11*s.* 2*d.*), if the savings do not amount to 100 crowns, 15 crowns, if they amount to 100 crowns but not to 150 crowns, and so on. Savings not amounting to 20 crowns the prisoners may dispose of without restriction.

The savings of a prisoner are forfeited to the State if he has made himself guilty of crime or certain grave offences within a penal establishment, and also after his liberation if he is reconvicted on account of crime, or sentenced to forced labour for vagrancy. Hence the right of the prisoner to dispose of his earnings is only conditional.

These regulations have proved very useful, chiefly because they counteract the dissipation of the savings of discharged prisoners. They are also efficient preventives against other evil habits prevailing among habitual criminals after their release from the prisons, apart from their disciplinary effect in general.

Prisoners in local gaols receive one-third of the profits of their work.

Amongst other methods adopted in Sweden for the reformation of the prison population, special importance is attached to the regular visitation of the prisoners when kept in cellular confinement, since it belongs to a right administration of the separate system to prevent separation from becoming isolation. The Royal Prisons Board, therefore, does all in its power to impress upon the prison officials the necessity of visiting the prisoners in their cells. Governors, deputy governors, chaplains, medical officers (vide also reply to question 20), are all bound by their instructions to see the prisoners as often as possible. Governors and deputy governors have by recent circulars from the Royal Prisons Board been ordered to keep special journals showing the number of visits made by them to prisoners in solitary confinement.

Private societies for the regular visitation of prisoners have also been formed. These societies are composed of such judicious ladies or gentlemen as possess the necessary qualifications to work for the reformation of prisoners in a Christian spirit. Rules have been fixed by the Royal Prisons Board for the work of these societies with due regard to the demands of prison discipline. Societies of this kind which are active in penal establishments for males are exclusively composed of gentlemen.

The general principles of the penal system now in operation in Sweden are accordingly: complete separation, strict observance of all the prison regulations, steady work (encouraged by moderate, partly conditional gratuities), good reading, sound religious influence, and a judicious aid of discharged prisoners.

Norway.

In all penal institutions there is a progressive classification, or system of progressive stages, intended to give the convicts the possibility—if they diligently and seriously try to fulfil their duties and take their punishment in a proper manner—of improving their condition by degrees.

Appendix I.

In each grade or class there is prescribed a minimum period, which, without exception, must be passed in that grade. These minima are longer for recidivists than for convicts that have never previously been in a penal institution. In all the grades, with the sole exception of the first, the convicts are allowed money for their labour, which can rise to 12 öre (1½*d.*) per working day. The money saved is generally placed in a savings bank and accumulates until the convict regains his liberty. The money may not be used by the convict during imprisonment for his own wants, but, on application from the convict, the Governor may permit a sum not exceeding half the savings to be paid to relations of the convict who may be in want.

On being promoted to a higher grade the convict obtains certain privileges as an increase in his payment for work accrues, and he is allowed instruction in various branches, more extensive opportunities for correspondence, receiving visits from friends, being allowed copy and drawing books, the permission to have the portraits of his family in his cell, as also various useful and serviceable objects besides those appointed in the regulations, &c. Convicts in the very highest class may also be allowed other and more extensive privileges, so long as they are compatible with the due order of the institution.

"Marks" are not used.

In the district prisons those prisoners that are employed on public works are allowed wages, and the money thus earned by them may be used either to buy things that they are permitted to have in the prison or in some other way or other.

Switzerland.

Switzerland.

The system of progressive classification necessitates the entry in a register of good or bad marks, indicating the conduct of a prisoner, his application to work, his due observance of the rules, &c. Promotion, and subsequently provisional discharge, rest upon the number of marks gained. Generally speaking, where the system of provisional discharge obtains the number of free pardons (grâces) has diminished.

Italy.

Italy.

The whole Italian prison system has for its chief aim the progressive reform of the prisoners. As the Code lays down that the punishment, more severe at first, should diminish in severity by the passage from solitary confinement to life in common, and from the penitentiary to the "intermediate" prison, leading up finally to conditional freedom, so the Italian prison regulations lay down a classification of prisoners in categories according to the different stages of their punishment, and the passage from one category to another, always diminishing gradually the severity of treatment according to the prisoners' conduct and their perseverance in self-improvement, in order to give the prisoners themselves an interest in their own improvement and to make them co-operate in the reform attempted.

To secure the end aimed at, the regulations provide for retrogression in the different categories, and for advancement as a reward.

Passage from one category to another is determined by the assignment of good or bad marks for good or bad conduct during the course of every month.

The rewards held out to those belonging to the class of "probationers" are the following:—

(1.) Praise given by the director in the presence of an official, of the commandant, or of the chief warder;
(2.) Permission to procure books;
(3.) Permission to send assistance in money, &c., to their own families, or also to the families of the persons against whom the offence may have been committed;
(4.) Free gift of letter paper and stamps, but not oftener than once in three months.

For prisoners in the "ordinary" class:—

(1.) Permission to have a light burning longer than usual in their cells or cubicles;
(2.) Admission to the prison school;
(3.) Permission to write more frequently and at greater length than usual to their families.

For prisoners in the "deserving" class:
(1.) Prolongation of the hours of exercise and rest;
(2.) Permission to receive more frequent visits from their families, and in a separate room;
(3.) Increase of wage by one-tenth;
(4.) Special recommendation to charitable societies;
(5.) Recommendation to the King's mercy.

Prisoners in solitary confinement, who belong to the "deserving" class, may be admitted to the "intermediary" industrial or agricultural penitentiaries when they have undergone one-half of their sentence; and they may attain conditional liberty after undergoing three-quarters. Under similar circumstances, those condemned to simple imprisonment may be given conditional liberty after having undergone one-half of their sentence.

20. The arrangements for medical inspection and treatment.

America, State of New York.

America, State of New York.

The physician of a State prison must reside within one mile of the prison, and attend daily, and at all times hold himself in readiness to discharge his duties; examine weekly the cells, and ascertain if they are kept in a proper state of cleanliness and ventilation, and report the same in writing to the warden; take charge of the hospital, and attend the convicts there or in their cells, and examine daily the quality and state of the provisions supplied to the prisoners. He is not allowed to engage in private practice.

Physicians at other prisons can engage in private practice, but are required to visit the prisons daily, and must be always within call.

France.

France.

In short sentence prisons the medical service of the prisons comprises—
(1) visits to sick prisoners;
(2) their treatment, and that of the prison staff;
(3) surgical operations, except the most serious ones;
(4) superintendence over the preparation of food and drugs;
(5) periodical inspection (at least once a fortnight) of the different buildings connected with the prison;
(6) visits to prisoners of either sex about to be transferred, with the duty of pointing out to the chief warder those whose transfer should be delayed;
(7) the keeping of medical records, &c.

The medical officer is nominated by the Minister of the Interior, his substitute by the préfet or sous préfet. He cannot hold the office of mayor in the district, nor be a member of the watch committee of the prison.

He has to visit the prison every day, and to see once a week at least, in presence of the chief warder, such prisoners awaiting trial as may be kept in separation, and prisoners who are undergoing solitary confinement or punishment. His prescriptions have to be in writing and signed by him, and those relating to infirmary cases have to be entered in a special register. They are handed by the chief warder to the chief contractor or to the official compounder.

Save in the case of infectious diseases sick prisoners are treated in the prison infirmary. But should it be impossible to establish an infirmary in any prison, invalids may be transferred to a hospital, with the consent of a magistrate or judge, if the prisoner be awaiting trial, or of the préfet or sous préfet if he be a condemned prisoner or debtor. These cases have to be carefully entered in the medical officer's register, and are treated in the hospital in a special ward.

The medical officer is, of course, consulted with reference to prisoners whom it is proposed to employ as nurses.

Sick prisoners have special bedding, food, and clothing; with a view to avoid infection every prisoner, whether ill or not, has his own drinking vessel and towel.

The medical officer has to make an annual report on the sanitary condition of the prison population, and the causes and characters of the diseases which have attacked prisoners. This report is addressed to the préfet, who sends it on to the central administration with the observations of the director.

Appendix I.

In long sentence prisons the system is the same in essential details as that described above, but is naturally more elaborate. There are in each prison one or two medical officers and one or two compounders, according to the size of the prison. A prison is held to require the service of a second medical officer when its mean general population exceeds 1,000, or its mean infirmary population exceeds 80. Where the prison is situated in a town the medical officers and the compounder need not actually reside within the prison, but in a prison situated in the country one medical officer at least and the compounder must reside in the prison.

There are one or two head nurses selected from among the warders or sisters of some religious order, whose assistants are chosen, as in short sentence prisons, from among the prisoners.

The following are points where the system in long sentence prisons seems more highly organised than in short sentence prisons :—

(1.) Serious surgical operations are only undertaken after consultation between the prison surgeon and a surgeon practising in the nearest town;

(2.) Two visits a day have to be paid to the infirmary ;

(3.) Every prisoner has to be examined medically on reception, either on the day he comes in or the day after;

(4.) Prisoners who have a claim to see the medical officer, but who are not in the infirmary at specified hours, are collected into two groups :—(a) those who wish to consult him as new patients ; (b) those who have already consulted him and are undergoing some light treatment;

(5.) The registers to be kept by the medical officer are more elaborate, and include one showing his recommendations in each case where a prisoner has made some complaint with regard to his health, or asked for a change of work supplementary rations, &c. ;

(6.) Similarly the compounder has to keep records showing the state of his store of medicines, &c., and the precise amount of each particular drug, &c. which he has dispensed.

Elaborate rules have been drawn up as to the duties of the prison doctors and their assistants, who must examine every prisoner at least once a week in passing through the workshops. Prisoners in solitary confinement must be visited at least once in three weeks, and special attention has to be paid to their mental condition. The doctor must keep a register of every lasting case that he treats.

Hungary.

Prisoners in case of illness receive careful medical attendance. If the medical officer requires it they are sent to the prison infirmary. Patients who suffer from contagious diseases are treated separately, and are isolated from each other.

Prisoners may at their own cost consult other medical men than those of the prison.

Patients are nursed by other prisoners designated by the medical officer and the director of the prison.

Belgium.

Belgium.

The medical service of the prisons is under the superintendence of the Inspector-General of the Army Medical Staff. There is in each prison at least one medical officer, charged with the care of all that concerns its hygienic condition as well as with the duty of attending to the sick. He has to make reports daily and every three months to the Inspector-General of the Army Medical Staff.

The medical officer attends at the prison daily, and even several times daily when his presence is required. He looks after the reception of medical stores, and is present at the monthly conferences. In case there is danger lest a sick prisoner may die of a serious illness, contagious or otherwise, or a serious illness breaks out, or a prisoner actually does die, the medical officer takes the prescribed measures, acting under conditions laid down by the regulations, but he may at his own discretion treat a particular case as urgent or not. Every three years he sends to the Minister of Justice a report on the work of his department during the triennial period.

So far as concerns the treatment of mental cases this is entrusted to three special medical officers, alienists by training, each having the care of a certain number of prisons, the total number of which is for this purpose divided into three divisions.

Sweden.

Sweden.

Every prison, central or local, has its special medical officer who has to attend on sick prisoners, and to see that the sanitary arrangements of the prison are in due order. It is the duty of the medical officer to visit all the prisoners at least once a week, and those who are sick daily, or as often as he considers necessary. There is in every prison a bath-room, where every prisoner is bathed on his arrival, and afterwards as often as is required to satisfy the claims of cleanliness and health.

On account of the extension of the separate system (in pursuance of the law of the 29th of July 1892), the Royal Prisons Board has, in a memorandum of the 20th of January 1893, directed the attention of the governors and medical officers of certain central prisons, to which prisoners under long sentences are sent, to the necessity of careful observation of the prisoners undergoing cellular confinement with regard to the influence of the same upon their health and state of mind. If the cellular confinement is found to exercise such pernicious influence upon the health of any prisoner as may make it necessary to suspend this kind of punishment, this is to be reported by the governor to the Royal Prisons Board, and the medical officer has to draw up a detailed description of the case in order that the Board may be able to take into consideration what measures are to be taken with regard to the prisoner in question.

The medical officers of the local gaols are, by the 24th clause of the regulations of these prisons, reminded of their duty to give attention to the influence of the cellular prison system upon the state of mind of the prisoners, and, if a prisoner is found by him to suffer from melancholia or any other mental disorder, to give such prescriptions as to the treatment of this prisoner as he may think fit.

There is no special criminal lunatic asylum. Insane prisoners are removed to the public lunatic asylums of the State.

Norway.

Norway.

The doctor attached to the penal institution has to see to everything that can be conducive to or improve the health of the convicts, as also the prevention of illness or its spread among them, and, with this object in view, must repeatedly inspect the sanitary conditions of the prison. Each convict on entering must be examined as regards the state of his health by the doctor. In case of illness the prisoner is treated according to the doctor's orders, and, if it be necessary, is placed in the hospital ward of the institution. Should it be found necessary to remove a prisoner to a hospital or madhouse, as a rule the consent of the Department of Justice must first be obtained.

The doctor must keep an account of the cases of sickness that occur, and yearly forward a report thereon to the Department of Justice. At the penitentiary a superior medical officer is appointed to control the sanitary conditions of the prison.

In the district prisons, in case of illness, the patient is treated by the prison doctor or by a physician called in, and if he cannot receive proper treatment in the prison he is placed in hospital.

Switzerland.

The sick are excused work on the order of the medical officer of the prison. Slight ailments are treated in the prisoner's cell or in associated dormitories; those who are more seriously ill are placed under medical care in the infirmary, which is to be found in some prisons. This infirmary, looked after by the medical officer of the prison with a warder-nurse under him, leaves little to be desired, especially in establishments of a

One or more physician-surgeons are attached to every Italian prison for reasons of health and sanitation. Visits are made daily to every sick prisoner, either in the infirmary or out of it; and the doctor must always be ready to be called in for sudden cases of sickness.

He visits frequently all the prisoners' quarters and the inmates, besides the food stores and the drug store, and has to see that sick prisoners are given their special diet.

There is no special provision in the regulations for methodical inspections. If necessary recourse is had to the provincial chief doctor attached to the prefecture.

21. Is any special arrangement made for the study of insanity in prisons?

America, State of New York.

America, State of New York.

Yes, at the Matteawan State hospital.

Prisoners awaiting trial, and short-sentence prisoners (i.e., sentences up to 12 months) detained in departmental prisons are, when duly certified to be insane, placed in departmental lunatic asylums, where their maintenance is chargeable to the Minister of the Interior. They receive in these asylums the special treatment demanded by their condition, which could not be afforded them in prison infirmaries where there are neither the means nor the staff suited for dealing with mental cases.

For long-sentence prisoners who become insane, the administration has set apart a special section of the central prison at Gaillon (Eure), which is fully equipped to deal with them. With the exception of the medical officer at the head of this section, who may be called upon to make observation of any particular case, there exist no special arrangements for the study of insanity in prisons.

As to prisons under the Minister of Justice.—No special arrangements for the study of insanity exist under the administration of the Ministry of Justice. In the rare cases of necessity, use is made of the lunatic ward in the Berlin (Moabit) prison under the administration of the Ministry of the Interior.

22. What are the arrangements for the inspection of prisons? Is there any inspection save by officers appointed by the Government?

AMERICA, STATE OF NEW YORK.

The superintendent of State prisons visits the prisons under his care once a month, and so do the Commissioners of Charities and Correction those under their charge. The members of the Prison Association of New York are delegated to visit prisons. America, State of New York.

FRANCE.

As to the system of inspection, there are first the inspectors general, who, as pointed out in the answer to the first question, not only carry out the ordinary duties of inspection, but also on occasion sit as a consultative committee. Then officials of the central office of penitentiary administration may be called upon by the Minister of the Interior to undertake special missions of inquiry. France.

There are, further, certain watch committees (commissions de surveillance) whose duty it is to report upon questions connected with the sanitary condition, building and repairs, the internal regimen, labour, &c. of each prison. These committees are presided over by the préfet or sous-préfet; in towns where sits a court of appeal, the President-in-chief and the Procurator-General, and in other towns, the President of the Court of First Instance and the Procurator of the Republic have ex officio seats on the committee; the remaining numbers are chosen from among persons of position in the town.

Préfets, sous-préfets and mayors have in virtue of their office a right to control the various services of the prisons within their jurisdiction.

GERMANY—PRUSSIA.

As to prisons under the Minister of the Interior.—The inspection of departmental prisons is made by the administrative president, who orders an inspection of the prisons in his department to be made every three months by a higher official. Germany—Prussia.

APPENDIX I.

The supreme inspection of all prisons is made by the Minister of the Interior, who orders an inspection, as a rule, every three years by a commissioner.

As to prisons under the Minister of Justice.—The supervision of the prisons of a province or of a higher land court is in the hands of the Chief State Attorney, who, as a rule, makes a personal inspection every year or every second year, or delegates this duty to another State Attorney.

The supervision of all prisons under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Justice is in the hands of the Minister, who entrusts the inspection to a commissioner whenever he considers it necessary.

AUSTRIA.

Austria.

There is no inspection save by Government officials, sent out periodically by the Procurator-General in whose district the prison lies, or by the Ministry of Justice in cases where circumstances seem to require a special commission of inquiry.

The Procurator-General must make a written report annually to the Ministry of Justice of all the prisons in his particular district, and is bound to visit them all at least once annually, and hear complaints from the prisoners and suggestions from the officials. He may decide matters himself or refer them to the Ministry as he deems best.

HUNGARY.

Hungary.

Prisons attached to the different tribunals are under the superintendence of the Public Prosecutors (Staatsanwalt); those attached to the district courts are under the superintendence of the judge of the district court. The chief Prosecutor (Oberstaatsanwalt) visits these prisons from time to time.

The Minister of Justice superintends the prisons and all houses of detention in general.

Prisons attached to the tribunals and district courts are also inspected by a municipal committee. This committee, consisting of the chief medical officer and four other members of the municipality, visits the said establishments four times a year and submits its report on the subject to the Minister of Justice.

Permanent committees are also attached to each tribunal, whose duty it is to make proposals for the transfer of convicts to the intermediary houses, or for their conditional discharge. This committee, therefore, necessarily superintends at the same time the general condition of the prisons in question.

BELGIUM.

Belgium.

The service of the inspection of prisons comprises three sections, the general inspection of prisons, the inspection of buildings, and the control of accounts, which are entrusted respectively to an inspector general, to an inspector of buildings, and to a comptroller of accounts. The objects of these different inspectors are as follows: In the case of the first, inspection has regard to general questions of penal repression and the various penitentiary systems which exist, to the reformation of prisoners, to the execution or otherwise of the law respecting conditional discharge, to the regimen of the prisoners, and to the proper carrying out of the duties entrusted to the administrative and discipline staff. In the case of the second, inspection has regard to the preparation of the programmes for new constructions, to the examination of the plans and estimates submitted by the Department, to agricultural, industrial, and public work, and to the inspection of penitentiary buildings, both from the point of view of their preservation, as well as their appropriation for the needs of the service. In the case of the third, inspection has regard to the supervision and auditing of accounts.

There is no inspection save by officers appointed by the Government.

SWEDEN.

Sweden.

Inspections of the central prisons are annually made by the Director General of Prisons and by the two chief secretaries commissioned by the Royal Prisons Board to visit a certain number of penal establishments and to give a report of their inspections to the Director General.

Local prisons (including Court-house and Hundred gaols) are also inspected by the same authorities almost yearly. These inspections are made at uncertain times and without previous communication with the prison officials in order that they may be unexpected. The local prisons are also placed under direct supervision of the provincial governments.

The Attorney-General of the Crown and the Solicitor-General and the Comptrollers and Auditors of the Diet are also entitled to visit the penal establishments of the kingdom, and to report thereupon to the Diet.

No other authorities than those mentioned above have any right of inspection with regard to prisons.

Norway.

Norway. The inspection of the penal institution devolves on the Secretary for the Administration Commissioners of Prisons, or some other official belonging to the Administration of Prisons, and that of those prisons for shorter terms of imprisonment, not only on these functionaries, but also on the proper sheriff of the district in which prison is.

At the Penitentiary there is, moreover, an inspecting commission consisting of eight members, half the number nominated by the King and half chosen by the municipal authorities.

At the district prisons there are two to four municipal inspectors at each prison.

Switzerland.

Switzerland. There is no official inspection of prisons, except in the canton of Berne, which has now an inspector. Elsewhere the duty is entrusted to the watch committees (commissions de surveillance).

Persons of both sexes, unconnected with prison administration, are allowed to assist in ameliorating the conditions of prisoners. In cantons possessing modern prisons, there persons are authorised, in virtue of decrees of the legislative authority, to visit prisoners. Members of Prisoners' Aid Societies in particular are allowed free access to their clients. The number of these benevolent visits is not high, speaking relatively, even in cantons where prison reform has many supporters. It is held that such visits should only be allowed with many precautions.

There are modern prisons where the moral education of prisoners is in the hands of officials alone.

In female prisons there are more often found lady visitors, especially in towns which were visited by Elizabeth Fry, and where, at her instigation, societies of lady visitors were established with a view to ministering to females in prison, and finding places for them on discharge. Such a society exists at Zurich, and there the lady visitors give regular lessons to the female prisoners, and direct their religious instruction.

Italy.

Italy. Italian prisons are inspected once a year by the Government inspectors; inspections and inquiries are undertaken by the same inspectors whenever the needs of the service deem to require it. All inspections are carried out under the direct orders of the Ministry.

APPENDIX I.

ADDENDUM.

ELMIRA REFORMATORY, NEW YORK STATE.

The following particulars respecting the New York State Reformatory at Elmira have been extracted from the Report of that institution for the year 1893.

The Reformatory, the buildings of which are on an ambitious scale and ornamental in style, was opened in 1876 for the reception of youthful male felons who are committed there for the statutory term for their particular offence to undergo a process of training and reformation in place of the ordinary imprisonment.

The total number received during the 17 years was 6,551, the age of the inmates varies from 16 years to 30 years, the average age being 21 years. The average number in confinement during 1893 was 1,470. There were 1,378 inmates at the close of the year, with an average period of detention of 17 months. The total cost of maintenance for 1893 was $215,223. The trade earnings amounted to $53,458, leaving a net cost of $161,765.

The Reformatory is provided with 1,258 cells, so that about 400 were necessarily associated two in one room. To avoid still more overcrowding it had been found necessary to transfer 150 of the least promising inmates to the State prisons. This course had been found to act as an incentive to troublesome conduct on the part of inmates in order to secure their transfer to the prison, where an abatement of their sentence might be earned with less exertion on their part.

The prisoners committed to the Reformatory are felons; 45 per cent. of them had previously been in contact with the restraining agencies of the law, 68 per cent. were illiterate, 75 per cent. were without regular occupation, 92 per cent. were without the benefits of good home surroundings. The object of the Reformatory is, as far as practicable, to place the prisoner in "conditions parallel with those of free life," there to work out his institutional career.

The moral inducements to reformation consist of (1) division into grades with differing degrees of comfort and social standing, (2) a wage-earning mark system, (3) the personal influence of the Reformatory staff. Between 70 and 80 per cent. are said to respond to the efforts made for their good. For the remainder compulsion is found necessary either by means of forfeiture of marks, degradation of rank, or personal chastisement. Thirty-four different trades had been taught during the year, and it is claimed that 78 per cent. of the discharged inmates went straight to the trade learned in the Reformatory. Two evenings a week are devoted to education, and 20 of the best educated amongst the inmates assist in this work. Lectures and concerts are given periodically. There is a gymnasium, and 1,175 of the able-bodied inmates were formed into a regiment to go through a course of military drill and training. Prisoners can, at the discretion of the managers, be released on parole, to be brought back again if found to be drifting into crime, but the release is made absolute after six months' satisfactory trial. The total number "paroled" during the 17 years was 3,723. Of these 259 were brought back, 110 were paroled a second time, and 10 a third time. It is claimed that probably about 80 per cent. of the prisoners are reformed, that is "the discharged inmate returns to society not more, but probably less, likely to fall "into crime than the virtuous of the class to which he belongs."

Annual average of ordinary certified cells :—

Annual	742
Maximum of prisoners	657
Excess of cells	85

Explanatory Note.

These two returns are extracted from the Judicial Statistics for England and Wales. Table I. represents the amount of ordinary certified cell accommodation for male prisoners in the London local prisons for the five years ending March 1893. It also represents the maximum number of male prisoners in these local prisons during the five years ended March 1893. It will be seen from this Table that the average maximum number of prisoners exceeded the number of ordinary separate certified cells.

Table II. exhibits the amount of ordinary separate certified cell accommodation for male prisoners and the maximum number of male prisoners in Wandsworth Prison under the county authorities for the five years 1872–76. It will be seen from Table II. that ordinary separate certified cell accommodation exceeded the maximum yearly average of male prisoners to the extent of 85 cells.

Table II. represents the manner in which a local prison should be administered so as to avoid placing more than one prisoner in one cell. According to Table I., on the other hand, even after making allowance for hospital cases, the placing of two or more prisoners in the same cell cannot be avoided. This is owing to the circumstance that there are fewer ordinary certified cells than prisoners; and also to the circumstance that a certain proportion of the cells are only partially available.

Explanatory Note.

The preceding tables are intended to illustrate the extent to which the juvenile offender is a product of adverse individual parental economic and civic conditions. Table I. shows that a high per-centage of juvenile offenders are inferior to the general population, and also to town artizans in height and weight. In many cases it is owing to this condition of physical infirmity that these juveniles are driven into a criminal life. The physical condition of these juveniles is in substantial agremeent with Dr. Warner's inquiries concerning children committed to Industrial Schools.—See Table VIII.

Table I. also exhibits the parental condition of juvenile offenders. It shows that 32 per cent. of these offenders had one or both parents dead; that 46 per cent. of them were living in lodgings, and that 54 per cent. were living at home. It is, however, to be observed that the homes of the 54 per cent. were in a high proportion of cases, little better than homes in name owing to the disreputable character of the parents. Adverse parental circumstances is a second condition which produces juvenile crime.

Table I. also illustrates the economic condition of the juvenile offender. According to this table no less than 77 per cent. of the young offenders in Wandsworth Prison were unskilled labourers. This result agrees with Table II., which shows that 64·9 per cent. of the entire local prison population are unskilled labourers. As unskilled labourers only form 16·6 per cent. of the general population these statistics show that the ranks of unskilled labour contribute much more than their proper proportion to the prison population. Adverse industrial circumstances are accordingly a third condition in the production of juvenile crime.

Table III. is intended to show that on the whole juvenile offenders are most numerous where the population is most dense. In other words juvenile crime is to a large extent a product of town life. In this respect it follows the lines of crime in general, which as we see in Table IV. is also in the main a product of town life. The counties of Surrey, Kent, and Essex are the principal exceptions to this rule, and this exceptional position is largely owing to the fact that these counties contain a high per-centage of the well-to-do classes.

Table V., however, shows that adverse economic conditions as exhibited in the ratio of poor law relief do not necessarily produce a high rate of crime. It is possible that the more liberal administration of the poor law in the country than in towns may have some effect in keeping down the rate of crime in the country and of raising it in the towns. But it is more probable that the higher rate of juvenile and adult crime in the towns is in the main to be attributed to the more complex and less stable economic and social conditions of urban life.

Table VII. is intended to show that juveniles between 16 and 21, in proportion to their numbers in the general population, contribute almost as many offenders to the prisons as adults between 21 and 30.

1879–83	28,341	108
1884–88	23,033	83
1889–93	18,284	62

Comparison of the Decrease of Prison Population and of Committals to Prison between 1883 and 1893. Appendix III.

Average daily prison population:—

1883	27,140
1893	18,233
Decrease	33 per cent.

Committals to prison:—

1883	164,142
1893	158,498
Decrease	3·5 per cent.

B.

Tables showing the Average Number of Persons tried for Indictable Offences in each period of five years from 1874 to 1893, and the Proportion per 100,000 of the Population.

Total Number tried for Indictable Offences, 1874–93.

—	Annual Average for each Period of Five Years.	Proportion to 100,000 Population.
1874–78	53,044	217
1879–83	60,080	230
1884–88	57,385	208
1889–93	56,472	194

Class I.—Offences against the Person.

—	Crimes of Violence.		Crimes against Morality.
	Annual Average for each Period of Five Years.	Proportion to 100,000 Population.	Annual Average for each Period of Five Years.	Proportion to 100,000 Population.
1874–78	1,829	7·54	691	2·84
1879–83	1,581	6·07	750	2·89
1884–88	1,581	5·74	1,291*	4·69
1889–93	1,440	4·95	1,151*	3·96

* This increase is chiefly due to the new offences created by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885.

Class II.—Offences against Property with Violence.

—	Annual Average for each Period of Five Years.	Proportion to 100,000 Population.
1874–78	1,420	5·82
1879–83	1,834	7·04
1884–88	1,887	6·86
1889–93	1,883	6·47

The increase in the second as compared with the first period is caused in part by the fact that certain offences which had previously been erroneously classed as larceny were after 1878 classed as burglary or housebreaking.

INSTRUCTIONS relative to the use of the SCALE of WEEKLY TASKS.

Prison Commission,
Home Office,
Whitehall, S.W.,
January 1886.

Herewith is forwarded a revised scale of weekly tasks, which represent the minimum amount of work of the several descriptions which a prisoner should perform, except in the cases of prisoners who are quite inexperienced in the several trades, who will require some allowance while acquiring the necessary knowledge of them.

Prisoners engaged on articles or work not named in the scale should be tasked proportionately.

By Order,
S. PADBURY,
Store Accountant.

Enclosure to foregoing.

Weekly Tasks for Prisoners employed at the undermentioned Trades or Employments.

N.B.—It is to be understood that the figures in this scale represent the minimum quantities of the work expected from the prisoners, and that every effort is to be made to secure such increase as may be attainable. Due allowance, however, is to be made for inexperience on the part of the prisoners, for variations in the character of the work, and for other modifying circumstances. Other articles or work not named in this list to be tasked in proportion.

II.

INSTRUCTIONS relative to the VALUATION of PRISONERS' LABOUR in LOCAL PRISONS.

Prison Department,
Home Office,
Whitehall, S.W

The Governor of . . . . Prison.

The Commissioners request that you will be good enough to observe the following instructions when filling in the "Return showing the Employment of the "Prisoners and the Value of their Earnings during the "year ending 31st March 18 ."

It must be borne in mind that it will be necessary to take account, not only of the labour expended on articles manufactured or work done, for which payment is received from the public, but also of that which is expended in work done for the Prison or other Government Departments, in which the value of the labour is not recovered.

"In Manufactures, Buildings, &c."—Under this heading should be given the fair value of all labour performed during the year, either for private customers or for the public service, except work specified under the next heading, viz., "Employments in the Ordinary "Service of the Prison, Cooking, Cleaning, &c."

1. For prisoners employed solely in the production of articles for sale to private customers, the actual profit realised, as shown by the cash ledger, should be given, due abatement being made for the loss on tools, for incidental charges, &c.

2. For prisoners employed in industries in connexion with which sales are made to private customers as well as to prisons and Government Departments, the amount to be entered should be arrived at by adding to the actual profit of the cash ledger a proportionate sum for Government work, calculated at per prisoner per annum upon the rate to which the private work tells out, on the basis of the cash ledger results.

3. For industries confined solely to work done for prisons or Government departments, the amount to be entered should be based on the following rates per prisoner per diem.

	Rate per day.
	s. d.
Grinding wheat -	According to quantity calculated at local price.
Making mats and matting for Public Departments - -	0 9½
Basket, brush, and mop making for Public Departments - -	1 8
Coopers, joiners, smiths, and tinners for Public Departments - - - -	2 6
Cotton, woollen, and other weavers for Public Departments - - - -	1 3
Knitters and needlewomen for Public Departments - -	1 0
Moulders for Public Departments	2 6
Printers and bookbinder for Public Departments - -	2 6
Sack and ship-fender makers and twine spinners for Public Departments - - -	1 9
Shoemakers for Public Departments - - - -	1 9
Tailoring for Public Departments	1 9
Washing for do. -	1 6
Woodcutters for do. -	0 6

"In Buildings, &c."—The rates at which the value of labour under this head will be estimated are as follows:—

FOR A DAY OF TEN WORKING HOURS.

	s. d.
Bricklayers or masons - -	2 6
Carpenters or joiners - -	2 6
Labourers - - -	1 8
Plasterers - - - -	2 6
Painters and glaziers - -	2 2
Plumbers and gasfitters - -	2 6
Smiths and fitters - -	2 6
Slaters - - - -	2 6

In the event of the hours of work being less than 10 per diem the average number of hours worked per diem at each trade should be noted in pencil on the margin of the "Annual Return of the Employment and Earnings of Prisoners," and the amount carried out should have reference to the exact number of hours worked, e.g, if only five hours have been worked the rates would be only half those given in the table above.

Where special circumstances seem to the Governor to warrant any variation in the above rates, they should be altered accordingly, and an explanation given.

"Employments in the Ordinary Service of the Prison, Cooking, Cleaning, &c."—The following kinds of work will be considered as "Employments in the Service of the Prison," and pending the issue of a comprehensive list of prices to be charged for labour in local prisons, the value of the various kinds of work will be calculated at the rates here specified:—

	Rate per day.
	s. d.
Pumping water for the service of the prison only.	According to quantity calculated at the local price.
Baking for the prisoners -	1 9
Cooking for the prisoners - -	1 11
Cleaning and jobbing-work in and about the prison and prison yards and buildings (exclusive of building-work of any kind) - - - -	1 3
Nursing and attending sick prisoners - - -	1 6
Washing prisoners' clothing -	1 3
Repairing all kinds of prison clothing, shoes, utensils, books, &c. - - -	1 3
Stoking prison furnaces - -	1 8

Pea sorters	—	4
Pickers (oakum, &c.)	3,678	3,597
Pouch makers	—	114		18,986	13,874

* In instituting any comparison between 1875–6 and 1892–3, it will be necessary to take into account the fact that in the latter period certain additional workers were employed at the occupations marked who, in accordance with the system of classification now adopted, are included under the head "Domestic Prison Services."
These were 35 bookbinders, 28 carpenters, smiths, &c., 76 gardeners, 62 shoemakers, and 431 tailors, needlewomen, &c.
Owing, however, to the difference in the method of classification adopted by the old authority and the Commissioners respectively, no close comparison between the two periods can be made.
It must be borne in mind that the daily average in 1875–6, 18,986, had fallen in 1892–3 to 13,821.

H.M. PRISON, LEWES.

November 14, 1894.

A COMPARATIVE STATEMENT of the SYSTEMS in force at this PRISON with regard to INDUSTRIAL LABOUR under the late PRISON AUTHORITY and the present COMMISSIONERS.

Late Authority.	Commissioners of Prisons.
1. All prisoners on first conviction were, if sentenced to any lengthened term of imprisonment, placed at some form of industrial labour immediately they had been passed "fit" by the medical officer.* On re-conviction they were placed on the crank for one month.	1. Under existing rules† prisoners, whether re-convicted or not, are placed in separate confinement upon the crank or some similar form of labour for the first 28 days of their confinement.
2. Experienced practical instructors were provided, at salaries considerably in excess of the ordinary rate of pay of a warder.	2. At present warders, who have picked up some knowledge of a trade during their general superintendence of prisoners, are, as a rule, detailed to instruct prisoners.
3. The mark system in force enabled an industrious prisoner to earn at least eight marks (value ½*d.*) per day during the whole of his term of imprisonment, and for every mark earned beyond that number he was credited with an additional sum of money equivalent to double the amount he received for the first eight marks. E.g.—A prisoner earning 48 marks per week was credited with 3*d.*; but he required only an additional 24 marks to double this sum. A limit of 2*l.* (unless very special circumstances were apparent) was placed upon a prisoner's earnings, and on second conviction only two-thirds, and on third conviction one-third of his earnings were paid for. A fourth conviction stopped payment altogether unless a special grant were made.	3. The present stage system has a maximum of eight marks per diem only, which, so far as earnings and privileges are concerned, terminates in about seven months from the date of a prisoner's reception, and a maximum gratuity of 10*s.* only is allowed except under very special circumstances.
Letters, visits, and diets were regulated by marks, and all concessions were granted according to the number of marks earned.	No extra marks are now granted, and a minimum period of 84 days is now required before letters and visits are permitted. Diets are regulated by calendar months.
4. Materials were bought by the storekeeper under the directions of the Governor and visiting justices. The large wholesale houses in London were visited, materials inspected, and comparisons instituted according to price and quality.	Brokers are now engaged, who purchase at the dock sales what is now required in the way of yarn and fibre for matmaking, whilst other materials are included in the triennial contracts, and are purchased under these contracts when required.
Manufactured goods were disposed of to wholesale and retail firms in the neighbourhood, and also in London and other large towns away. Exports to Australia and the Cape were not infrequent, and were on the whole a success.	This practice was continued by the Commissioners for some time, with the exception that the collection of the accounts was abolished, and each tradesman requested to send his cheques direct to the Governor.
To ordinary customers credit was given for three months, with a discount of 2½ per cent. If longer credit were taken, no discount was allowed. The storekeeper visited each regular customer quarterly, collected what was due from him, and took his orders for further supplies. A regular intercourse was thus maintained between the customers and the prison authorities, and very great interest was taken by the local ratepapers in the success of the scheme.	At present, however, and for some time past, no orders, with the exception of those for firewood and nose bags, are executed for private customers; the labour of the prisoners being entirely devoted to supplies for Government departments.

CHARLES HALL,
1st Class Clerk, Lewes Prisons.

* But see section 19 and Schedule I., Reg. 34, of Prison Act, 1865.—J. G. L.
† This is in obedience to Section 37 of the Prisons Act, 1877.—J. G. L.

NOTE.—At the Matmakers' deputation to the Home Secretary, on 4th March 1891, some doubt was expressed, despite Mr. Matthews's assurance, whether the contracts for matmaking at prisons were or were not advertised. It may be useful to clear up this point, and to give specimens of the advertisements which were issued by the Prison Department.

MEMORANDUM ON MAT-MAKING IN PRISONS.

By Sir Edmund Du Cane, 1888.

It would be natural to suppose, from the agitation carried on by certain matmakers and dealers against the manufacture of mats and matting in prisons, that the prisons had intruded themselves into the mat-making business, and that, if prison labour was no longer employed in England in this branch of manufacture, the wages of the free persons employed in it and the profits of the dealers might be expected to rise.

How little foundation there is for these notions will appear by considering the facts and history of the manufacture. Mr. Goodacre, of the firm of that name, who has been a very long time connected with this business, states that the manufacture of coir mats was first begun by Messrs. Wildey (now Treloar) in 1834, it was adopted for prisoners in Kirkdale in 1838, and by Wakefield Prison in 1841. He says that at this early period the number of private makers must have been very small, and the production likewise.
